HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

TUESDAY, December 20, 1927

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Do Thou give us Thine open ear, Lord God of Hosts, and we would unbar the doors of our hearts. Let Thy Spirit be the bond of fellowship and may He speak within the circle of our souls. Amid the forces of life we despair of anything like personal independence and mastery. Yet while they often bear us to the very edge of doom, inspire us and hold us with the heroic accent of unquenchable faith. O God, a tragedy has torn the Nation's heart and holds it in a freezing blight. Oh, the cheerless, defiant waters; the charts can not help the vessel that is fast upon their jagged floor. But come Thou to the dear loved ones, who are dazed and speechless in the curtains of their grief. The men, our heroic brothers, the stalwarts of the waves, who in the face of peril never wore a lowering brow in the face of danger, give them great peace and resignation as they pass through the tortures of their transition. At the eternal daydawn, robed in the splendor of a fadeless morning, may their jubilant anchors be cast in the stormless harbor of heaven above. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

JOINT RESOLUTION PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT

Mr. CAMPBELL, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that on December 19, 1927, they presented to the President of the United States for his approval the following joint resolution:

H. J. Res. 92. A joint resolution authorizing the payment of salaries of the officers and employees of Congress for December, 1927, on the 20th day of that month.

SETTLEMENT OF WAR CLAIMS

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 7201) to provide for the settlement of certain claims of American nationals against Germany and of German nationals against the United States, for the ultimate return of all property of German nationals held by the Alien Property Custodian, and for the equitable apportionment among all claimants of certain available funds.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 7201, with Mr. MAPES in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 7201, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. OLDFIELD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin yield to the gentleman from Arkansas for the purpose of propounding a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I do.

Mr. OLDFIELD. Has the Clerk read section 2 of the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. No; the Clerk has read just the first section.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

I am opposed to this bill, Mr. Chairman, on two grounds. In the first place, it authorizes the arbiter that is set up under the provisions of the bill to make an award of as much as $100,000,000 for certain ships and a radio station which were seized after the declaration of war against the Imperial German Government under an act of Congress. In this act of Congress we provided that when these ships and the radio station were seized the value of them should be appraised by an authority set up in the law. This appraisement has been made, and is less than $35,000,000, and yet the Ways and Means Committee brings before us a bill which affirmatively authorizes the arbiter to find an award of as high as $100,000,000.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I yield.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Does not the gentleman think that if we make ourselves judge and jury by picking out the arbiter ourselves that we have gone about far enough? The only solitary thing we give the Germans is a chance to be heard; simply that and nothing else.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I will discuss that viewpoint a little bit. If the Ways and Means Committee wanted to place in the bill a limitation of authority on the part of the decision of the arbiter, why did the committee not place a limitation of $35,000,000 or even $50,000,000, which would have exceeded the value that has already been put upon these ships by the authority which Congress itself fixed in the original law, and which would have made ample allowance for a difference of opinion as to the value of these ships?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman again yield?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Why have any arbiter at all, then? Why not simply appropriate for the ships and say, "We will only pay $1,000,000 or $2,000,000 for them." The result would be, however, under the plan which the gentleman suggests, we would have to pay for the ships out of the reparations fund based upon the reasonable value of them.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Let me answer one question at a time.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. What the Ways and Means Committee has really done is under the guise of a limitation; they have issued an invitation to the arbiter to find a value of as high as $100,000,000, and the whole bill is bottomed upon that theory.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman now yield?

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. My understanding is that the naval board fixed a value of $33,000,000 upon the ships alone about 11 years ago. They fixed no value upon the radio station at Sayville or upon the patents, which are also included in the items to be acted upon by the arbiter.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Oh, yes; but the gentleman knows that the patents and the radio station will be a very small item as compared with the award for the ships.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Oh, no; they will be considerable factors, and then we have the question of interest since that time, of course.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. On this point of value let me read from a brief which has been submitted to the Committee on Ways and Means by Mr. A. W. Lafferty, a former Member of this House and now a practicing lawyer in the city of New York. He says on page 20 of his brief:

> For your information and that of your committee in drafting proposed legislation, we note the following as a general basis of agreement between the American and German interests which we, respectively, represent:
> 1. Twenty per cent of the alien property fund to be temporarily retained * * *.
> 2. Fifty per cent of awards for payment of German ships, radio stations, patents, etc., to be likewise temporarily retained and applied to American claims as soon as it become available.
> Doctor Kisselbach, who signed the foregoing agreement—

That is, the agreement I have just read—> asking that it be made the basis of last year's bill, which it was, testified before the Senate committee (hearings, p. 181) that he represents 100 per cent of the German shipowners.

> Therefore the German shipowners themselves are proposing to Congress that if Congress will appropriate up to $100,000,000 for their ships (appraised by authority of Congress at less than $35,000,000) they will—very graciously, of course—permit Congress to use $50,000,000 of that appropriation temporarily to pay American claims.
> Beware of Greeks bearing gifts.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Now, we had a colloquy yesterday in which the gentleman from Iowa said that those of us who took the position that none of the money paid to these insurance companies that are to be subrogated—none of it should come out of the pockets of the taxpayers. He said we were in error as to our position. Members who were bold enough to make an assertion of that kind were more or less ridiculed on the floor of the House. Now, the gentleman's own report, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] shows that exactly what we said is true, and I am going to read the report and Members can judge for themselves.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The money goes into the pot.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I will show the way it goes into the pot. Page 15 shows how the fund is to be made up. First, 20 per cent of the Alien Property Custodian funds goes into it, as was set out in the agreement that I have just read. That is No. 1. Now, No. 2 is the unallocated interest fund. No. 3 is the amount of the appropriation for the payment of ship claims. That is $50,000,000, and that is out of the taxpayers' pockets.

Here is where Doctor Kisselbach made a concession in order to get the permissive authority for the arbiter to award up to $100,000,000. Fifty per cent is made available only for payment of the ship claims, and the other 50 per cent is made available for what? Just what we said—for payment of general claims, including the payment to insurance companies who subrogate themselves to the rights of the claimants who suffered losses.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to say simply this: The right of subrogation is a right which is recognized in both domestic and international law, and under this right the insurance companies would have the right to press claims against the Imperial German Government and its successor, the Republic of Germany, for losses which they paid to clients whose property they insured. I certainly would not object to the payments of these claims being made by the German Government, but I certainly do object to setting up a special fund, as is done in this bill, and part of which comes out of the pockets of the American taxpayers, out of which to pay them.

Mr. BECK of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Prior to my election to this body I was counsel for a large group of American claimants directly interested in this legislation. For that reason I rise in fairness to state the facts to the House and to ask permission not to take part in the discussion and be excused from voting.

The Clerk read as follows:

DECLARATION OF POLICY

SEC. 2. In pursuance of established American doctrine, it is hereby declared that the claims of nationals of the United States against Germany, as determined by the Mixed Claims Commission, United States and Germany, shall be settled by the ultimate payment in full by Germany; that all property of German nationals held by the Alien Property Custodian as security for the payment of such claims of nationals of the United States against Germany shall ultimately be returned, together with the accrued interest and other earnings thereon; that the claims of German nationals against the United States for reasonable compensation for certain of their ships, radio stations, and patents taken or used by the United States shall be adjudicated and the amounts determined to be due shall ultimately be paid in full.

Mr. OLDFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 8, after the word "custodian," strike out the balance of line 8 and all of line 9.

Mr. OLDFIELD. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is to strike out these words beginning on page 2, line 8, after the word "custodian," "as security for the payment of such claims of nationals of the United States against Germany." I take the position, and I think the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] agrees with me——

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. That is rather a different amendment than the gentleman spoke to me about. I do not know that there is any objection to it as it stands now. It will not alter or affect the paragraph, in my judgment.

Mr. OLDFIELD. Under the Berlin treaty the language was that the property should be held until suitable provision was made for its return. The German people do not like this language. It is not true and it does not affect the legislation.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I do not think it makes any difference whether it is in or out.

Mr. OLDFIELD. All right; I understand the gentleman from Iowa accepts the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arkansas.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the section.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. RAINEY moves, on page 2, line 1, to strike out all of lines 1 to 16, inclusive.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, this section which contains our declaration of policy adds absolutely nothing to this bill. The Senate committee a year ago struck it out and reported the bill with this section out. I move now to strike it out. If it should be incorporated into the law, it might rise up in the future to plague future Congresses.

In the first place, we have no such established American doctrine as is stated in this declaration of policy. In the second place, this absolutely pledges us to pay all the claims of German nationals against the United States on account of their ships, radio stations, and patents, every dollar of them with interest up to the time when they are ultimately paid. The country has been subjected to a large amount of propaganda to the effect that it is our doctrine to return enemy property. We never have returned enemy property. We are going to do it now. I expect to vote for this bill. I think it ought to be returned, but that has not been our policy, and as the years pass and these matters develop, that may not be our policy in the future. This alleged policy is usually referred back to our treaty of 1799 with Prussia, now regarded as a bilateral treaty, and now regarded as void and of no effect by our State Department, as I have already shown in the hearings, in which I incorporated a letter from the Secretary of State. This treaty expired by its own terms in 1810, and we renewed it again in 1820 and it stood until the World War. By that treaty we only agreed with Prussia that the property of alien enemies residing in the other country during the period of the war outside of fortified cities should be returned. That is as far as that treaty went, and we have already done that since the war.

We have returned the property of all alien German enemies residing in the United States during the war, and all these other treaties, and all these other declarations of policy are based on our old treaties with Prussia, which contained only this. We never have returned property of alien enemies residing out of this country, no country in the world ever did, and Germany has not returned our property that she in effect confiscated during the war. We did not have much property there, of course, except bonds held and deposits in her banks, and a few plants. Plants were taken over if they were steel plants or dye plants, and the testimony of one of the witnesses before the committee, and the only testimony we have is that his plant was wrecked during the war and was not returned to him in any condition other than the wrecked condition in which the Germans left it.

These reparation payments are not going to last forever. They reach their peak next year. They have been made so far out of money that we have loaned to Germany. We have loaned her $600,000,000 and the other nations have loaned her $300,000,000. Her balance of trade is against her. Therefore, she has been paying us out of the moneys that she has borrowed from us, and she has been paying the other nations out of the money that she has borrowed from us.

I commend to Members of the House a recent book written by George P. Auld, which made its appearance from the press of Doubleday, Page & Co. just a few days ago. George P. Auld was accountant general of the old Reparation Commission, and he was a member of the Dawes committee of experts. He is qualified to speak on this subject if anybody is. He sets out in his book and clearly shows that these reparation payments, if they continue at the peak, which is to be reached next year, are to end absolutely in 25 years, and those 25 years will be up in 1949. I might read just one clause from this book:

It is, therefore, clear that through the adoption of the Dawes plan by the governments concerned, an annuity of $625,000,000 plus or minus a prosperity adjustment was guaranteed to run for 25 years.

And no longer than that, except that for 15 years after the expiration of the 25-year period Germany may still continue to pay the amount obtained from railroads and from industrial bonds, which amounts to $240,000,000 a year, and that can continue for 15 years longer. But if we get no larger proportion of that than we are now getting out of the reparations now being paid, we will not get very much money during the 15 years that continues to run. This settlement with Germany by the Reparation Commission, effected by all of the nations, out of which they have graciously given us 2¼ per cent, is subjected to amendment as the years pass. It may be increased if Germany is prosperous. It may be diminished if she is not. We all know what the situation is now. Even the payments due us we have difficulty in transferring, and when this bill was reported a year ago there was $6,000,000 due, according to testimony, that we could not get over here, and which had been there for a number of days; but if she can not pay $625,000,000 a year—and a majority of the experts who have considered the question do not think she can pay that much—then she can have it scaled down, and we will get less. But even assuming that she is going to keep it up, it will be 25 years from September 1, 1928, before the $10,700,000 annuity payments per year reimburse us for the amount that we are now expending. Therefore, in view of these facts, and in view of the doubtful future, and in harmony with the decision of the Supreme Court in the Chemical Foundation case, I think we ought not to declare this to be our policy when it is not our policy at all. We did not return any property that we seized during the Civil War. Those claiming that property are required to prove loyalty, and whenever they do that it has been returned or accounted for. We have gone further than that already with enemy aliens living within the country, and I do not think we ought to bind another generation, because it will be that long before this is settled.

And we ought not now to make this charge upon our Treasury and to further commit ourselves upon the theory that the German Government will last for the next 80 years without reorganization and upon the theory they are going to continue these Dawes payments indefinitely when we know they will not.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Does the gentleman withdraw his amendment?

Mr. RAINEY. No; I do not.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. An amendment to strike out the section is pending.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the amendment.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia has been seeking recognition for some time.

Mr. COX. I rise to support the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I make the point of order that the gentleman from Texas said he was opposed to the amendment, and he asks the floor in opposition.

Mr. RAYBURN. I would rather the gentleman from Georgia would proceed.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I rise to support the amendment. I support it because the bill is not reflective in this statement of policy. Unless it be the intent of the bill to make the United States a guarantor for Germany in the satisfaction of the claims of our nationals against Germany the section should be stricken out. That is what I construe this language to mean—

That all property of German nationals held by the Alien Property Custodian shall ultimately be returned.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK] has made fair criticism of the bill, and I agree with him in part. I take the position that the whole structure of the bill is put upon the certainty that Germany will meet its obligations assumed under the Dawes plan. This declaration of policy simply means, if the bill passes in its original form, that it will sail under false colors, as the whole body of the bill violates this declaration of policy set out in this section.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I am unalterably opposed to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois. When the Winslow bill was in the House it will be remembered that we returned property in the hands of the Alien Property Custodian up to $10,000. At that time I offered an amendment to return all the property in the hands of the Alien Property Custodian, and during that debate I said that the indefinite holding of property is confiscation. I tried to point out at that time in the minority report which my colleagues and I filed that if America had any policy at all upon this question—and I contended then and now it has a historic policy in reference to the matter contained in the bill that the gentleman from Illinois seeks to strike out—it was that from the days of Hamilton and Jefferson and Marshall down to now every man who had a reputation that extended beyond the community in which he lived and had spoken and written upon this question said, that long before that time that all civilized nations had looked upon the question of confiscating private property for the satisfaction of a public obligation with obloquy. That has been our policy. Every writer upon international law in America from that time to now who has been recognized as an authority has taken the position that the most savage doctrine ever announced by any people anywhere was that private property should be taken for the satisfaction of a public obligation. The gentleman from Illinois says he is going to vote for this bill. I am not one of those who, if I am going to vote for a bill, am going to place myself in the position of saying I do not agree with its fundamental principles and then turn round and vote for the bill.

Why do we have this bill before us to-day? It is because we do not expect or intend to commit the Government of the United States to the savage doctrine of confiscation of alien property. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] refers to the seizure of cotton in the South by the North during the Civil War. That is one instance that he points out when the United States has not observed its ancient and its fundamental policy upon this question, and I believe that every fair-minded man in the world to-day, both North and South, believes that the United States Government to-day owes and has since the seizure of that cotton owed in honesty that debt to the people of the South. [Applause.] The only time when the United States Government has announced or pursued any other doctrine except the doctrine that alien property should not be seized and held and confiscated is that one instance. In the language of John Marshall, when he spoke upon this question more than 100 years ago, that doctrine of confiscation of private property had been looked upon with obloquy amongst all of the civilized nations for generations, he denouncing it to be "the most savage doctrine that could obtain between civilized countries."

If this bill means anything, it means that the United States Government is going to live up to that great doctrine and resume its stand upon that high plane. If the American Government had never by congressional action announced that as a policy to the world, this greatest and most powerful Nation upon the earth to-day should be the leader and step out and announce the policy as the permanent and continuous policy of this Government.

I hope, therefore, that we shall not by the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] strike from this bill this declaration of policy, which could have only one effect upon the thought of the world, and that is that we do not indorse the policy as laid down in this paragraph. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] to strike out the section.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

CLAIMS OF NATIONALS OF THE UNITED STATES AGAINST GERMANY

SEC. 3. (a) The Secretary of State shall from time to time certify to the Secretary of the Treasury the awards of the Mixed Claims Commission, United States and Germany, established in pursuance of the agreement of August 10, 1922, between the United States and Germany (referred to in this act as the "Mixed Claims Commission").

(b) The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay an amount equal to the principal of each award so certified, plus the interest thereon, at the rate fixed in the award, accruing before January 1, 1928.

(c) The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay annually (as nearly as may be) simple interest, at the rate of 5 per cent per annum, upon the amounts payable under subsection (b) and remaining unpaid, beginning January 1, 1928, until paid.

(d) The payments authorized by subsection (b) or (c) shall be made in accordance with such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, but only out of the special deposit account created by section 5, within the limitations hereinafter prescribed, and in the order of priority provided in subsection (c) of section 5.

(e) There shall be deducted from the amount of each payment, as reimbursement for the expenses incurred by the United States in respect thereof, an amount equal to one-half of 1 per cent thereof. The amount so deducted shall be deposited in the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts. In computing the amounts payable under subsection (c) of section 5 the fact that such deduction is required to be made from the payment when computed or that such deduction has been made from prior payments shall be disregarded.

(f) The amounts awarded to the United States in respect of claims of the United States shall not be payable under this section.

(g) No payment shall be made under this section unless application therefor is made, within two years after the date of the enactment of this act, in accordance with such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe. Payment shall be made only to the person on behalf of whom the award was made, except that—

(1) If such person is deceased or is under a legal disability, payment shall be made to his legal representative, except that if the payment is not over $500 it may be made to the persons found by the Secretary of the Treasury to be entitled thereto without the necessity of compliance with the requirements of law in respect of the administration of estates;

(2) In the case of a partnership, association, or corporation, the existence of which has been terminated, payment shall be made, except as provided in paragraphs (3) and (4), to the person found by the Secretary of the Treasury to be entitled thereto;

(3) If a receiver or trustee for the person on behalf of whom the award was made has been duly appointed by a court in the United States and has not been discharged prior to the date of payment, payment shall be made to the receiver or trustee or in accordance with the order of the court; and

(4) In the case of an assignment of an award, or an assignment (prior to the making of the award) of the claim in respect of which the award was made, by a receiver or trustee for any such person, duly appointed by a court in the United States, such payment shall be made to the assignee.

(h) Nothing in this section shall be construed as the assumption of a liability by the United States for the payment of the awards of the Mixed Claims Commission, nor shall any payment under this section be construed as the satisfaction, in whole or in part, of any of such awards, or as extinguishing or diminishing the liability of Germany for the satisfaction in full of such awards, but shall be considered only as an advance by the United States until all the payments from Germany in satisfaction of the awards have been received. Upon any payment under this section of an amount in respect of an award, the rights in respect of the award and of the claim in respect of which the award was made shall be held to have been assigned pro tanto to the United States, to be enforced by and on behalf of the United States against Germany, in the same manner and to the same extent as such rights would be enforced on behalf of the American national.

(i) Any person who makes application for payment under this section shall be held to have consented to all the provisions of this act.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RAINEY: At the end of line 24, page 2, strike out the period, insert a comma, and the following: "except that no award shall be certified if the rights of the person or corporation on behalf of whom such award was made were acquired by subrogation of the rights of a beneficiary under a policy or a contract of insurance."

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is an attempt on my part to prevent these insurance companies writing marine insurance during the period of the World War from being reimbursed for losses they did not sustain. Some of these claims are very large; five of them on this list I have here run from $2,000,000 to $7,000,000.

The claims of 40 or 50 of these insurance companies were allowed by the Mixed Claims Commission as claims against Germany. This is the only opportunity we shall ever have to prevent their payment at this time. My information is, with reference to the French spoliation claims, that that portion of those claims which were allowed 100 years ago and which yet remain unpaid consists largely of insurance claims just like this. Before we entered the World War we had less than 40 companies engaged in writing marine insurance. The number was greatly augmented after 1914, but when we entered the war we had only 40. The number quickly rose to 100, and now the number again has been reduced to less than 40. I do not know how much these insurance companies made, but I know that they did not lose anything. Mr. Mills, of New York, a member of the committee, in presenting this matter on the floor a year ago—he is now Undersecretary of the Treasury—said this on this floor:

Frankly, I do not know whether these insurance companies made a profit or not.

Now, if he feels that way about it, the chances are that they made a profit. He would not say they did not, and he was supporting this bill.

I expect to vote for this bill, but I want to make it as good as I can before I vote for it. I want to do just as much as I can for my conscience in these matters. I am, unlike the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN], concerned in making this bill as good as I can before I am compelled to vote for it. I believe in the doctrine of returning confiscated property. The doctrine is now being established for the first time in the world, notwithstanding we have most untactfully declared that it has always been our policy. I tried to strike that out of the bill, but the committee would not do it.

Now, there are 45 insurance companies, according to the evidence, that collected in premiums, from August 1, 1914, to July 2, 1921, $248,000,000; and their losses, according to the evidence as near as it can be ascertained, in spite of the fact that they tried to cover it up as much as they could, after salvage and after reinsurance, amounted to only $169,000,000. Our Government went into the insurance business during the war, and our policy was to write insurance upon such ships as were to be exposed in such dangerous seas that the possible loss was too great to be assumed by private companies. We took the worst of these losses, and we collected $40,000,000, and our losses were less than $25,000,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, may I have five minutes more? This is the last amendment I am going to offer, except perhaps pro forma amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAINEY. These insurance rates varied, depending upon the zone to which the merchant vessels proposed to sail. Before the war these same insurance companies charged for marine insurance less than 1 per cent.

During the war they charged less than 2 per cent, but after we entered the war their rates rose until they charged sometimes as much as 30 per cent and sometimes more than that. They never made as much money as they did during the war, and they did not lose one cent. Under the bill we are considering now they will get, each one of them, $100,000 on every one of these claims and we have already paid $10,000 on all claims. By this declaration of policy, which we have retained in this bill, and which has absolutely no place in it, hereafter we agree we are going to pay them in full in some way for something they never have lost. The effect of striking this out of the bill will be simply to postpone the claims of these insurance companies until all of these other claims which we are now providing for are paid, and it will take 25 years for that; it will take more than that, as a matter of fact, because these reparation payments will stop, according to Mr. Auld in his book, in 1949, but upon the theory that they are going to last until 1953 we are adopting the provisions of this bill. Therefore, under the most favorable conditions for Germany, if there is no adjustment downward of the amount of the reparations she is expected to pay, there will be a period of four years, from 1949 to 1953, during which we will not get one cent on account of these reparations, unless the Reparation Commission and the nations interested therein—and the Reparation Commission is functioning under the League of Nations and the Versailles treaty—agree to give us 2¼ per cent of $240,000,000 for the 15 years following 1949, which amount will be absolutely negligible.

This does not destroy these claims; it simply postpones the time when these insurance companies, which have not suffered a dollar of loss, can present their claims and in some way get the money from Germany if they can.

I do not want to have these insurance companies paid the claims which have been allowed against Germany by the Mixed Claims Commission on the technical doctrine of subrogation only. The United States ought not to pay them. Let them wait and get this out of Germany if they can.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Is it not true that these insurance companies, according to the hearings, have already reaped very large profits from the business they have done, and therefore have sustained no losses?

Mr. RAINEY. That is the point I am trying to make in this argument and that is the gist of my entire argument. They have not lost a dollar but have made profits such as they never made before in all their history, and now under the technical doctrine of subrogation we are going to reimburse them for the losses they have paid. The real losers on account of the sinking of these ships are the men who paid the 30 and 40 per cent insurance premiums. The Americans who paid them these insurance premiums on ships and on cargoes presented their claims to the Mixed Claims Commission, but that commission disallowed them and none of them are carried here.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has again expired.

Mr. OLDFIELD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am opposed to the amendment offered by my friend from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] and I hope it will not prevail.

Gentlemen, we are called upon to decide a practical question.

In the first place, by the treaty of Berlin, in 1922, the Mixed Claims Commission was established. That commission was made up of one German citizen, one American citizen, and an umpire, Judge Parker, of Texas, another American citizen. Judge Parker testified before the committee, and he is an outstanding citizen of Texas. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] told the committee there was no better or more upright and able citizen of the State of Texas than Judge Parker. He told us this: He said that every large claim, and especially every insurance claim, that came before the commission and the umpire was thrasheed out just like a lawsuit. Both sides were heard.

If he thought a claim was a just claim he recommended an award; if he thought it was an unjust claim he recommended that it be disallowed; or if he thought the claim was too much he recommended that it be cut down.

Gentlemen, how can we go back of the Mixed Claims Commission? It is absolutely impossible for the House of Representatives or for the Senate of the United States to investigate individually all of these thousands of claims.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLDFIELD. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. And failure to carry out the recommendations of this Mixed Claims Commission would simply be a repudiation of the treaty?

Mr. OLDFIELD. Absolutely; we would be repudiating the treaty. In addition to that, the German Government and the German people pay these claims. It is not like the ship claims and the claims for the radio station and patents. They agreed to pay them, and if the Mixed Claims Commission says they agreed to pay them and they are just it is impossible for us to go behind the action of that commission. If you want to kill this sort of legislation you will cut this provision out of the bill, but I hope you will not do so.

Mr. RAINEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLDFIELD. Yes.

Mr. RAINEY. The only question the Mixed Claims Commission considered was the legal question of subrogation, and the only thing they had before them was reinsurance and salvage, which would cut down these apparent losses—is not that true?

Mr. OLDFIELD. Judge Parker said they made a thorough examination and had a real trial in his office with respect to all of these various claims, insurance, and everything else.

Mr. RAINEY. Under the technical doctrine of subrogation.

Mr. OLDFIELD. I believe he said that.

Mr. RAINEY. Judge Parker did not say these companies ever lost these amounts.

Mr. OLDFIELD. Now, my friends, we are up against this situation: We could have returned the German property in 1923 if the Republican side had voted like we voted, but the American claimants felt they had rights, and there are thousands upon thousands of them and probably 99 per cent of them were absolutely just and ought to be paid by somebody. However, they prevented the passage of legislation which would have returned it all. You will remember that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] offered the amendment and practically as a unit we on this side voted to return all the property to its German owners.

There are two things I am very much interested in. One is getting rid of this question and the other is getting this two or three hundred million dollars out of the hands of the Alien Property Custodian. I do not think anything else is good policy. This ought to have been settled 8 or 10 years ago.

If we amend the bill in important particulars like this, it will be another 8 or 10 years before the matter is settled. The German people do not want this to happen and, of course, the American claimants do not want it to happen, and we ought not to want it to happen. Therefore I hope the amendment will be voted down.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. I believe if you set back the insurance claims as proposed by the amendment, you have got to set back a certain amount of the German alien property to secure the insurance claims, and therefore instead of forwarding this great settlement, you are putting off the settlement for a term of 15 or 20 years.

Any amendment that does not contribute to a settlement, I oppose. I have here before me the brief of the United States Government, appearing on behalf of the War Risk Insurance Bureau and on behalf of the insurance companies of America, arguing for the allowance of the insurance company claims before the Mixed Claims Commission. I intend to summarize this brief and insert it in the RECORD under permission to extend my remarks.

The first proposition I believe in is this: The insurance companies are the financial right arm of the American merchant marine. There is not a shipowner that will cast a rope from a pier until the hull of his ship is insured. There is not a cargo shipper that will load a cargo into a ship until the cargo is insured. All of the American business men want the headache of the risk to be transferred to the insurance company. Under the policies written during the period of the war, both with the Federal Government and with the insurance companies, the insurance companies were subrogated to the rights of the insured to recover whatever they could from whatever source was available.

I believe this doctrine should be upheld. It has been upheld in every international arbitration that has ever occurred. It is the civil law of every State in the Union. It is the civil law of the Federal courts. There have been decisions from the beginning of this Government down to the present day upholding it in the common practice between the merchants, the insurance companies, the railroads, and so forth, throughout our land. It has never been contested. No legislature has sought to repeal it.

If we do not sustain the doctrine upon which the Mixed Claims Commission acted, a doctrine which runs foursquare with all of the domestic law and policy of our States and of our Nation, we have the burden of proof upon us to show why we depart from it.

I never heard of a defense to an insurance claim in a State court where the defendant could write into his answer that the insurance company made money and therefore is not liable for the damage called for under the policy. I have never heard of this defense. No lawyer in this House has ever used it in a court of law. I say to you now that if the insurance companies are not making money, they are worse than a plague of smallpox to the business men of the Nation.

The testimony before the Ways and Means Committee shows that these companies broke dead even on their ocean war-risk insurance. When you find an insurance company that is in a state of collapse, mark you, every business man that relies upon it is in danger of ruin.

I have in my pocket a telegram from the counsel to the State superintendent of insurance of New York asking me to present as far as I can an argument on behalf of the payment of the insurance claim. He has under liquidation or in the hands of a receiver three or four great New York companies at this moment, and they have awards payable under this bill. He called my attention the other day to the fact that the overwriting of war risks was a contributing cause to the collapse of these companies.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of New York. I yield.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Their present plight can not be attributed to war business, can it?

Mr. OLIVER of New York. I have the information from him and I will put the telegram in the RECORD.

NEW YORK, N. Y., December 19, 1927.

Hon. FRANK OLIVER,

House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

Represent State superintendent of insurance in liquidation of Liberty Marine Insurance Co., New York National Insurance Co., and North Atlantic Insurance Co., who have awards rendered in their favor by Mixed Claims Commission for losses paid on hulls and cargoes. These companies are in liquidation for benefit of American creditors who are dependent on these awards for payment of their claims. The awards of Mixed Claims Commission were rendered by an international court of highest standing, whose decisions are by treaty binding on our Government. Further, no basic difference between claims of insurance companies and those of large corporations, who are self-insurers. Many other moral and legal arguments exist against any suggestion of discrimination. I make this appeal for American creditors who are vitally interested in result of liquidation of foregoing companies. Your kind efforts in their behalf will be widely appreciated.

VINCENT L. LEIBELL.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It is my impression they did a very prosperous business during the war, and then following the war business slackened off. I am not talking about the particular companies which the gentleman has in mind, but insurance companies in general.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. The insurance companies in general, according to the evidence, showed they broke about dead even on the premiums and the losses paid, plus the expenses of the insurance companies. That is the evidence in the hearings.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Then this would all be velvet?

Mr. OLIVER of New York. This would be their velvet, as you call it, but I deem it their payment for their rights under their contracts.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But I think they ought to take the last place in priority.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. Why should Germany, who caused the payment of these high rates that gentlemen complain of, get away scot-free when a contract is presented by which the insurance company is subrogated to the rights of the insured, and proof is put in showing payment of loss?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But I would put them at the foot of the list.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three more minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] made a magnificent argument, showing that if we allow a nation to plead that simply because the insurance companies made money, therefore that nation had the right to destroy all the ships possible and not pay a nickel for them, then we are announcing a very strange and at the same time most dangerous international doctrine.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of New York. For an easy question. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Does the gentleman think, however, that the United States Government should come in and in any sense assume any of these liabilities of the German Government? That is what is done under this bill.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. That is not done under this bill.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. That is denied by gentlemen who have prepared the bill. I think when the Government of the United States holds money for the payment of the ships, radio station, and patents, which should have been paid long ago, that payment by the Government from such a fund is not a payment by the Treasury of the United States out of money belonging to the taxpayer.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. It is money belonging to the Germans.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. And the Germans have consented that it may be so applied and it is not the taxpayer's money at all.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. Not at all; a trust is impressed upon it for the benefit of the shipowners and the owners of the radio station and patents, and no matter what disposition the Government of the United States makes of it, it does not seem to me to be of any concern to the taxpayer as long as they fulfill the trust obligations imposed upon it.

However, I intend, as I said, to summarize this brief and to put in the argument made by the counsel for the Government of the United States demanding the right of subrogation for the Government itself, which went into the insurance business, and showing in this brief that the Government of the United States was coinsurer with the private insurance companies and that allowances were made, on the sinking of the same ship, to both the Government and the private insurance companies on the same basis.

They stand on a parity. I shall present a brief analysis of the Alabama claims and the awards. Gentlemen here have used the argument that the principles of that case should be followed in this settlement. The American counsel presented an analysis of the Alabama claims and the awards to the Mixed Claims Commission, which shows conclusively that the action of the Congress of 1882, which legislated on the subject of the Alabama claims, was based on a political and not a judicial principle.

Gentlemen here have contended that if an insurance company shows a net profit on its business during the war that it should be deprived of its recovery against a foreign nation which caused it to pay out losses to its policyholders. It is argued that as far as insurance companies are concerned a test of the condition of their treasuries should be taken in determining their rights under their contracts.

If they have lost money their contracts should be allowed to stand in a court of justice. If they made money their contracts should be considered null and void. A litigant must take a pauper's oath before his suit will be considered by the court. Fallacious and unsound as this argument is, the gentlemen who advance it intend that as far as this bill is concerned it shall apply only to insurance companies and not to the other claimants who will recover under the terms of the bill. The Standard Oil Co. receives an award. Why not find out first if it made or lost money during the war. The Singer Manufacturing Co., the International Harvester Co., the Guaranty Trust Co. of New York, and hundreds of other large corporations will recover their claims when this bill passes. Yet no one asks that their profit or loss sheets be taken into consideration in determining their entitlement to recover. The awards they received by the judgment of the Mixed Claims Commission are accepted as final. They should be accepted as final. We agreed to abide by them. The decisions of the commission were based upon the accepted rules of international law. We can not refuse to honor their decisions without defying the accepted rules of international law.

The United States Government established the War Risk Insurance Bureau during the war. It took from the insurance companies a group of its most expert underwriters. These men wrote the Government policies, collected the premiums, and paid out the losses just as they had been accustomed to do when conducting a private business. The Government of the United States paid out losses of about $26,000,000. It collected premiums of about $46,000,000. It made on its war-risk insurance about $20,000,000. It has been awarded by the Mixed Claims Commission every dollar of the losses paid out. The Government stands to gain $46,000,000 by its war-insurance business.

Under leave to print I submit a summary of the brief submitted by counsel for the United States Government on behalf of the War Risk Insurance Bureau.

[Before the Mixed Claims Commission, United States and Germany, organized under the agreement of August 10, 1922, between the United States and Germany]

United States of America v. Germany, No. 8.

United States of America on behalf of the Bennettt Trading Co. (Inc.); United States Veterans' Bureau; Globe & Rutgers Fire Insurance Co.; Insurance Co. of North America; and the Automobile Insurance Co. of Hartford, claimants, v. Germany, No. 94.

United States of America, and the United States of America on behalf of the National Fire & Marine Insurance Co., claimants, v. Germany, No. 208.

BRIEF ON BEHALF OF THE UNITED STATES

In these cases the United States presents:

A claim against Germany to recover the sum of $250,000 paid to the Texas Steamship Co. on May 16, 1917, by the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, Treasury Department of the United States, following the destruction of the company's steamship Illinois by a German submarine on March 18, 1917.

The claim of the Bennett Trading Co. (Inc.), owner of the bark Christiane, the United States Veterans' Bureau, the Globe & Rutgers Fire Insurance Co., Insurance Co. of North America, and the Automobile Insurance Co. of Hartford, to recover from Germany the sum of $127,220.72, with interest, on account of the sinking of the bark Christiane on August 7, 1917, by a German submarine.

The claim of the United States of America, and the United States of America on behalf of the National Fire & Marine Insurance Co., against Germany to recover, with interest, the sum of $49,776.76 paid to the Equitable Trust Co. on July 20, 1917, by the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, Treasury Department of the United States, and the further sum of $2,500 paid to the Foreign & Domestic Transportation Co. on May 7, 1917, by the National Fire & Marine Insurance Co., following the destruction of the American schooner Edwin R. Hunt by a German submarine on April 7, 1917.

PART V

THE PRINCIPLE OF SUBROGATION IN CASE OF INSURANCE PAID ON PROPERTY LOSSES IS THOROUGHLY ESTABLISHED IN AMERICAN, ENGLISH, FRENCH, AND GERMAN LAW

* * * * * * *

In short, a doctrine of subrogation is that one who has been compelled to pay an obligation which ought to have been paid by another is entitled to exercise all the remedies which the creditor possessed against that other, and to be indemnified from the fund out of which should have been made the payment which he has made. As above stated, it is a mode which equity adopts, and its purpose is to compel the ultimate discharge of a debt by him who, in equity and good conscience, ought to pay it, and to relieve him whom none but the creditor could ask to pay. (For a discussion of the subject see Sheldon on Subrogation, 2d ed., pp. 1, 2, 3, and 15.)

In treating of the question of subrogation, Winter, in his work on Marine Insurance, page 339, says:

"The right of subrogation: No consideration of the subject of marine losses would be complete without making some reference to the right of subrogation. While the underwriter may be liable under the policy of insurance for the loss incurred, it does not necessarily follow that he alone is responsible for the injury suffered. In many cases there arises, because of the accident causing the loss, a liability on the part of some third party to respond for under their policies of insurance. It would be manifestly unfair, however, for the underwriters to respond for the loss for the owner to retain his right of action against the owners of the offending vessel. Accordingly, in order that the equities may be reserved upon the payment of loss by the underwriters, they are by law vested with the benefits accruing from the right of action which has arisen in favor of the assured. This is known as the right of subrogation. Through this right the underwriter is clothed with all the benefits arising from claims against third parties which have arisen since the date of the casualty, and the assured is obligated to lend his name and good offices in the collection of such claims. The expense of collection, legal and otherwise, will, of course, be assumed by the underwriters in proportion to the interest which they have in the claim. If the settlement under a policy covering the entire interest has been for a total loss, the underwriter is entitled to the benefit of the right of action in full; if, on the other hand, the loss is but partial or the property is not fully insured, the underwriter will be subrogated only to the extent that the assured has been indemnified. The right of subrogation arises at the moment of payment."

The mission and purpose of subrogation are lucidly explained as follows by Joyce in his work on The Law of Insurance (2d ed., vol. 5, pp. 5879, 5880):

"The doctrine of subrogation in insurance does not primarily arise from, nor is it dependent upon, any of the terms of the contract, although in many cases policies now provide for the subrogation of the insurer to the rights of the insured. We have already seen that marine and fire insurance is a contract of indemnity, and it is for the purpose of carrying out this principle that the doctrine of subrogation has been adopted. In other words, in the absence of this doctrine the insured might often recover more than a full indemnity, and to prevent such result the courts have adopted the rule that the insured shall be entitled to only one full indemnity for the injury sustained, and from this the doctrine of subrogation has arisen. As a general rule, therefore, if the insurer pays to the insured the amount of the loss, the former will be entitled to be subrogated to all rights which may exist in behalf of the insured against third parties who may be liable to the insured in any way for the loss * * *."

* * * * * * *

"* * * It may also be stated," continues Joyce, "that from the very nature of the contract of insurance, as a contract of indemnity, the insurer, when he has paid to the assured the amount of the indemnity agreed upon between them, is entitled, by way of salvage, to the benefit of anything that may be received, either from the remnants of the goods, or from damages paid by the third persons for the same loss." (Joyce on Insurance, vol. 5, p. 5880.)

UNITED STATES SUPREME COURT DECISIONS

The Supreme Court of the United States, in a great number of cases, has recognized and affirmed and reaffirmed the equitable principle of subrogation inuring to an insurance company upon its having indemnified a property owner for a loss sustained at the hands of a tortfeasor. A leading case by the Supreme Court on this subject, that of Comegys v. Vasse (1 Peters, 193), is treated of elsewhere in this brief.

A very lucid definition of the doctrine of subrogation is made by Mr. Justice Strong, of the United States Supreme Court, in the case of Hall v. Nashville & Chattanooga Railroad Co., reported in Eightieth United States, 367, as follows:

"It is too well settled by the authorities to admit of question that, as between a common carrier of goods and an underwriter upon them, the liability to the owner for their loss or destruction is primarily upon the carrier, while the liability of the insurer is only secondary. The contract of the carrier may not be first in order of time, but it is first and principal in ultimate liability. In respect to the ownership of the goods, and the risk incident thereto, the owner and the insurer are considered but one person, having together the beneficial right to the indemnity due from the carrier for a breach of his contract or for nonperformance of his legal duty. Standing thus, as the insurer does, practically in the position of a surety, stipulating that the goods shall not be lost or injured in consequence of the peril insured against, whenever he has indemnified the owner for the loss, he is entitled to all the means of indemnity which the satisfied owner held against the party primarily liable. His right rests upon familiar principles of equity. It is the doctrine of subrogation, dependent not at all upon privity of contract, but worked out through the right of the creditor or owner. Hence it has often been ruled that an insurer who has paid a loss may use the name of the assured in an action to obtain redress from the carrier whose failure of duty caused the loss.

"From the very nature of the contract of insurance as a contract of indemnity, the insurer, when he has paid to the assured the amount of the indemnity agreed on between them, is entitled, by way of salvage, to the benefit of anything that may be received, either from the remnants of the goods or from damages paid by third persons for the same loss. (Phoenix Insurance Co. v. Erie & W. Transportation Co., 117 U. S. 312.)

"Payment to the owner by the insurer does not bar the right against another party originally liable for the loss, but the owner, by recovering payment from the underwriters, becomes trustee for them and by necessary implication makes an equitable assignment to them of his right to recover in his name. (U. S. v. American Tobacco Co., 166 U. S. 468.)

"The right of the insurer to recover from the carrier for the loss of goods is not contingent upon the loss having been total, or upon its having been followed by an abandonment, but rests upon the ground that his contract is in the nature of a contract of indemnity and that he is therefore entitled, upon paying a sum for which others are primarily liable to the assured, to be proportionally subrogated to his right of action against them. (Hall v. Nashville & C. R. Co., 13 Wall. 367.)

"As between a common carrier of goods and an underwriter upon them, the liability of the owner for their loss is primarily upon the carrier, while the liability of the insurer is only secondary. (Wager v. Providence Insurance Co., 150 U. S. 99.)

"An insurance company which has paid losses by fire to the shippers is subrogated to their claims for such losses against the owner of the vessel. (Garrison v. Memphis Insurance Co., 19 How. 312.)"

SUBROGATION A PART OF GERMAN CIVIL LAW

The following excerpts from German civil law show that the principle of subrogation is firmly intrenched in Germany, where it is known that the law of insurance has attained a high degree of development:

"Creditor's right of subrogation in respect of debtor's claims for indemnity: If the circumstances or event by which the debtor's performance has been rendered impossible is one entitling him to partial or total indemnity from another (e. g., from an insurance company, which has taken the risk of such circumstances or event, or from a wrongdoer who is liable for the damage caused thereby), the creditor is entitled, in satisfaction pro tanto of his claim for compensation, to an assignment of the claim for indemnity, or to the delivery or payment of any object or sum of money received by the debtor in respect of such claim. (German Civil Code 281; German Civil Law, by E. J. Schuster. p. 169.)

"Right of subrogation: A person who compensates another for the loss of a thing or a right is entitled to the assignment of the claims which the person receiving compensation has against any third party, in respect of the thing or right for which compensation has been given. (German Civil Code, 255.)

"Illustration: A bailee who compensates the owner of the bailed goods wrongfully taken out of the bailee's custody may ask for an assignment of the owner's right to recover the goods from their unlawful possessor.

THE ALABAMA CLAIMS

It therefore becomes pertinent to give the precise history in connection with the treatment of claims of underwriters in the distribution of the Alabama award. This history reveals that Congress was faced with a distinct political situation. There was a comparatively small fund available out of which to pay claims. This fund of $15,500,000 had been covered into the Treasury of the United States. Congress was about to create a local commission or court for the distribution of the fund. The Government of the United States in this proceeding, instead of pressing claims against a foreign government, was now defending the Treasury against its own citizens. There was a small army of claimants against this fund. A few of these claimants were underwriters who had in a legal way, through indemnification, been substituted to the rights of action of American citizens who suffered losses of ships and cargoes during the Civil War at the hands of the Confederacy. The underwriters were few in number and were corporations. The so-called war premium men were thousands in number. It was manifestly the view of Congress that the fund was insufficient to pay both classes of claimants. After stormy debates, Congress enacted a law the purpose of which was to break down the equitable and time-honored principle of subrogation in property insurance and to set aside the legal rights acquired by insurance companies by way of assignment following indemnification by them of the original owners who had suffered property losses.

* * * * * * *

CONGRESS AND THE ALABAMA CLAIMS ARBITRATION

Under the Alabama claims arbitration, provided by the treaty of Washington May 8, 1871, between the United States and Great Britain, a fund of $15,500,000 was awarded to the Government of the United States in satisfaction of its claims against Great Britain for unneutral conduct toward the Government of the United States on the part of Great Britain during the Civil War as constituted in the depredations of the Confederate cruisers built and equipped by Great Britain and in some cases manned by British subjects.

In this case the contracting parties were two friendly States, and after the arbitration commission had awarded $15,500,000 as a lump sum the fund was distributed strictly through American agencies. These agencies were two courts known as the first and second courts, and which were provided for by acts of Congress. The first court made awards amounting to $9,315,753 for direct losses to claimants occasioned by the inculpated cruisers; that is, the cruisers whose possession in the hands of the Confederacy was traceable to the action of British subjects. A second court was created, which paid in full claims arising through acts of exculpated cruisers; that is, cruisers not having had any connection with British subjects in the case of their origin or equipment. In this class claims amounting to $3,346,016.32 were paid in full, the payments including interest and principal. The commission, following the instructions of Congress laid down in the act creating the court, disallowed all insurance company claims, except in cases where the sum of the company's losses in respect to the war risk assumed by it exceeded the sum of the premium and their gain in respect to such risk. The court held that such a course was regulated under section 12 of the act of Congress of 1882 creating the second court. The effect of this holding was practically to cut out and bar insurance company claims, and assignees of insurance companies were likewise and for the same reason barred. The war-risk premium men, however, were paid in part, the fund remaining being prorated among the holders of some 3,662 judgments, amounting in principal and interest to $16,312,994.53. (Moore's Int. Arbitrations, vol. V, pp. 4654–4664.)

The action of the majority in Congress in barring insurance claims was severely criticized during a debate on the subject on the floor in both Houses, particularly in the Senate. Senator Thurman, for instance, in discussing the action of Congress in barring insurance companies unless they had lost money, said:

"* * * I never can vote for any bill that does that great injustice, as I believe; and I do say now, and say it in all solemnity, that in my humble judgment there was never so deleterious an example set by any government in the world as is set by the provision in this bill, that insurance companies shall recover upon their claims if they have not made profit, but shall not recover if they have made profit. Stripped of its verbiage, stripped of its disguise, tearing away the sophistry of it, it amounts to this, that the Congress of the United States says to the people of the United States a man shall recover upon his claim, not according to the validity of his claim, but according to the length or brevity of his purse. If he is already rich enough, no matter how legal or valid his claim shall be, the court shall turn him away from its doors and say, 'You have enough already'; but if he has been unfortunate in business or improvident in business or in rash and unprincipled speculations, or has taken hazards that no prudent person would take. * * * You agree to pay the owner in the one case and you refuse to pay the man who paid him for his losses under a contract for insurance in the other. This principle is entirely familiar in our Congress; it is beyond contradiction or the possibility of contradiction that the man who insures another upon a lawful voyage and then, upon the occasion of loss, has paid the other the amount of his insurance stands directly in his shoes with all the rights, legal and equitable, which his insured had at the time of the loss. There is no gainsaying these propositions, but here for the first time the attempt is made to stamp the contract of insurance as illegal, as impolitic, as not to be favored by the law.

"Mr. President, the contract is directly the reverse. The contract of insurance is legal and is in every respect to be encouraged and to be protected by law. Such contracts ever have been protected by law; and if the Government of the United States, with a view of diverting or perverting this fund from the plain course which an execution of their trust would lead them to make, it follows they do this at the cost of the law as set forth by their own highest tribunals, and I fear they will do it at the cost of the respect of every respectable nation of the world. I would not desire to see my Government stand in that attitude * * *. This is an attempt to escape from principles of law, we will ascertain, and which are now denied for the first time in the history of our legislature."

It is seen from the above quotation that in the view of certain Members of Congress that body could do justice to claimants, but a constituted court of the land could not. An examination of the acts of Congress of June 23, 1874, and June 5, 1882, establishing, respectively, the first and second "Court of commissioners of Alabama claims," reveals that Congress handled the situation in the only way in which it could have been handled so as to disallow the claims of American underwriters. Congress passed two laws which, as shown above, set aside the legal and equitable principle of subrogation and likewise rights obtained under implied, or even express, assignments to underwriters. The majority report shows that Congress was afraid for these underwriters' claims to go before a duly constituted court, and instead set up two courts of its own and provided in the instrument erecting these courts that claims of underwriters should be disallowed unless the sum total of their operations throughout the war showed a net loss.

This test of the right of an underwriter to make claim for sums paid out by him by way of indemnification, when analyzed, is found to be without legal basis and, according to Senator Thurman, founded on sophistry.

In order to show the utter legal fallacy of the rule or test put to underwriters by Congress in connection with the Alabama award it is only necessary to recite a few suppositious cases.

Suppose a large oil company during the recent war ran a fleet of tankers. The business of the company was to sell oil and to make a profit thereon, if possible. The price obtaining for oil during the war, it must be admitted, was influenced by the existence of the war, increased cost of labor, increased freight rates, and risks and perils incident to the existence of the war. The company was in all probability charging war-time prices because of the war. One of these tankers is sunk by a German submarine. Can it be argued for one moment that before the oil company could appear before this commission as a claimant with respect to the tanker it lost it must be shown to the satisfaction of the commission that the company suffered a net loss with respect to the operations of its other tankers during the war?

An American importer runs a large store in New York with branches in Chicago and elsewhere. War conditions affect the prices charged by him as in the case of the oil company. A shipment of goods en route from Europe to New York is lost in the sinking of a ship destroyed by a German submarine. Must this importer, before he could recover upon the shipment of goods lost by him, show to the commission that he suffered a net loss upon the other importations handled by him and which were not sunk?

A Texas lumber company is engaged in cutting cypress in southeast Texas and southwest Louisiana. A shipment of lumber to a European port is lost on a vessel sunk by a German submarine. If the business of the lumber company on shipments which were not sunk showed a net profit, would the lumber company be barred from pressing a claim against Germany before this commission?

A Gloucester fisherman, from that famous old port in Massachusetts, owned a fleet of fishing vessels during the recent war. One of them, laden with swordfish, was sunk by a German submarine in the Atlantic raid of June, 1918. Before the Gloucester fisherman can appear as a claimant before this commission, must he show that the sum total of his operations during the war with respect of his other fishing vessels showed a net loss?

A still more striking illustration would be furnished in the following: Realizing that extreme speed in a vessel would probably render it immune from submarine attack, and that on account of war conditions good money could be made in getting goods to Europe, a group of New York business men form a corporation and buy two fast liners, which they convert into cargo carriers for the express purpose of making money out of the war. One of these boats, despite its great speed, is sunk by a German submarine. Before the American owners of the sunken ship could appear before this commission as claimants, must they show that the operations of the other vessel during the war showed a net loss?

Instances and illustrations in line with the above might be multiplied. It is believed these few are sufficient to illustrate the sophistry contained in the position of Congress in legislating underwriters out of their claims and the legal and equitable rights which the law had conferred upon them.

The insurance companies were engaged in the business of selling, of marketing, insurance. The merchants referred to above were engaged in selling commodities. Each was a business. Each concern was operating during the war with a view to making whatever profit it could legitimately make out of the war and war-time conditions. Yet is there any instance on record either in this or any other country where the rule which Congress built up to eliminate underwriters' claims has been invoked against any other business in order to shut off the claim of a country's national?

PAYMENT OF FRENCH SPOLIATION AWARDS BY CONGRESS

Under the act of March 3, 1891, to pay the findings of the Court of Claims for indemnity for spoliations by the French prior to July 31, 1801, Congress tacked on a proviso that in all cases where the original sufferers were adjudicated bankrupts the awards should be made on behalf of the next of kin instead of to the assignees in bankruptcy, and that the awards in cases of individual claimants should not be paid until the Court of Claims should certify to the Secretary of the Treasury that the personal representatives on whose behalf the award was made represented the next of kin and the courts which granted the administrations, respectively, should have certified that the legal representatives had given adequate security for the legal disbursement of the awards. (26 Stat. L. 908.)

The act of March 3, 1899, contained the same proviso in connection with the payment of French spoliation claims (30 Stat. L. 1191); likewise the act of May 27, 1902 (32 Stat. L. 218).

The act of May 27, 1902, contained a further proviso to this effect: "Provided, however, That any French spoliation claim appropriated for in this act shall not be paid if held by assignment or owned by any insurance company * * *." (32 Stat. L. 233.)

It will be noted that this provision did not undertake to deduct from the claim any insurance that might have been collected by the original owner of the property in question, and that apparently it was entirely possible for a claimant to have been indemnified twice, once by an insurance company and once by the Government of the United States.

The act of February 24, 1905, making further appropriations on account of French spoliations, contained both the proviso as to the next of kin of original sufferers who had been adjudicated bankrupts and a proviso that any French spoliation claim appropriated for in the act should not be paid if held by an assignment or owned by any insurance company. (33 Stat. L. 780, 800.)

PART VIII

GERMAN CONTENTION THAT PRINCIPLE OF SUBROGATION IS NOT APPLICABLE TO WAR-RISK INSURANCE IS NOT BORNE OUT BY ANY LAW OR PRECEDENT—ON THE CONTRARY NUMEROUS CASES IN INTERNATIONAL LAW SHOW RULE TO BE OTHERWISE

The positions of the learned agent and counsel as set forth above, are as novel as they are difficult to substantiate. International law books, particularly works on international arbitrations, which are essentially and necessarily the fullest and most complete expositions of the rules of international law obtaining in the mutual adjustment of the relations and affairs of nations with each other, reveal numerous instances in which the principle of subrogation was applied to insurance placed on war risks.

A war broke out between Spain and Great Britain in the year 1796. On the 20th of April, 1802, President Jefferson called to the attention of the House of Representatives a communication to that body and report of Mr. Madison, as Secretary of State, containing information regarding French spoliations of American property since October 1, 1796. These spoliations were grouped into six classes as follows:

1. Vessels taken at sea and brought into Spanish ports by the French.
2. Vessels similarly treated by the Spaniards.
3. Vessels seized in Spanish territory and either condemned there or sent to French ports by the French.
4. Vessels seized or condemned by the Spaniards in Spanish ports.
5. Cargoes belonging to citizens of the United States seized or embargoed by the Spaniards on American vessels.
6. Cargoes belonging to citizens of the United States seized by the Spaniards on foreign vessels other than American.

By far the greatest number of complaints fell within the first and third classes, comprising captures and condemnations by the French.

An early and leading case in which the Supreme Court of the United States confirmed the right of an underwriter to recover on a policy written upon a war risk is that of Cornelius Comegys and Andrew Pettit, plaintiffs in error, v. Ambrose Vasse, defendant in error, reported in First Peters, 191. Previous to the year 1802, Vasse was an underwriter on various vessels and cargoes, the property of citizens of the United States, which were captured and carried into the ports of Spain and her dependencies; he paid the losses arising therefrom prior to the year 1802 and an assignment was made thereof to Vasse by the owners. Vasse became embarrassed in his affairs and his creditors proceeded against him as a bankrupt. An assignment was accordingly made to one Jacob Shoemaker, and Comegys and Pettit proceeded to take upon themselves the duties of assignees. Vasse obtained a discharge in bankruptcy in 1802. In the year 1824 the sum of $8,846.14 was received by Comegys and Pettit from the Treasurer of the United States, the sum being the amount awarded by the commissioners sitting at Washington under the treaty with Spain on February 22, 1819, on account of the captures and losses growing out of the war of 1796 between Great Britain and Spain. A controversy arose between Vasse and the assignees, Comegys and Pettit, as to who was entitled to the proceeds of the award of the commissioners.

Mr. Justice Story wrote:

"We do not think that, upon an examination of the doctrines of insurance, there is any difficulty in this part of the case. It does not appear on the record whether there was in this instance any formal instrument of abandonment or not, nor is it material, for the law gives to the act of abandonment, when accepted, all the effects which the most accurately drawn assignment would accomplish. By the act of abandonment the insured renounces and yields up to the underwriter all his right, title, and claims to what may be saved, and leaves it to him to make the most of it for his own benefit. The underwriter then stands in the place of the insured and becomes legally entitled to all that can be rescued from destruction."

The opinion of Mr. Justice Story in the case of Comegys v. Pettit and Vasse is regarded as a classic on the question of abandonment and subrogation resulting from losses suffered at sea in time of war, and this case is justly regarded as a leading one on these subjects. In deciding the case, Mr. Justice Story held that the duty of the American commissioners was to look for the original claim for damages and injuries against Spain itself and that it was wholly immaterial for this purpose upon whom it may in the intermediate time have devolved or who was the legal as properly distinguished from the equitable owner, provided he was an American citizen; that if the claim was to be allowed as against Spain, the present ownership of it, whether in assignees or personal representatives or bona fide purchasers, was not necessary to be ascertained in order to exercise their functions in the fullest manner.

If any doubt existed as to the right of the insurance company to the remedies which might thereafter become open to him, and that the insurer is not limited to rights which might be in his mind, or which might only exist at the time insurance was placed, the following further language of Mr. Justice Story in the case of Comegys v. Pettit and Vasse would seem to be conclusive:

"Mr. Marshall and Mr. Park manifestly contemplate the case as establishing the principle that any indemnity, however arising, is a trust for the underwriters after they have paid the loss. (Park on Ins. ch. 8, p. 229; Mar. on Ins. B. 1, ch. 14, s. 4.)

"The case of Gracie v. The New York Insurance Co. (8 Johns. R. 237) recognizes the same principle in its full extent. That was a case of abandonment after a capture, and where there had been a final condemnation, not only by the courts in France but an express confirmation of the condemnation by the sovereign himself. One question was whether the jury were at liberty to deduct from the total loss the value of the spes recuperandi. The court held they were not. Mr. Chief Justice Kent in delivering the opinion of the court, said:

"'If France should, at any future period, agree to and actually make compensation for the capture and condemnation in question, the Government of the United States, to whom the compensation would, in the first instance, be payable, become trustee for the party having the equitable title to the reimbursement; and this would clearly be the defendants (the underwriters) if they should pay the amount, etc.' The case of Watson v. The Insurance Co. of North America (1 Binn. R. 47) proceeds upon the same principles. It admits that the spes recuperandi passes by an abandonment to the underwriter; and the question there was, whether its value, when not abandoned, was to be deducted from the total loss. We consider it, then, clear, upon authority, that the right to the compensation in this case was in its nature assignable, and passed by abandonment to Vasse; and, upon principle, we should arrive at the same conclusion. The right to indemnity for an unjust capture, whether against the captors or the sovereign; whether remediable in his own courts, or by his own extraordinary interposition and grants upon private petition, or upon public negotiation, is a right attached to the ownership of the property itself, and passes by cession to the use of the ultimate sufferer. If so assignable to Vasse, it was equally in its own nature capable of assignment to others; and the only remaining inquiry would be whether it had so passed by assignment from him.

Mr. Justice Story, in the course of his opinion, cited various instances of insurance placed upon war risks and in which it has been affirmed that the principle of subrogation obtained. The paragraph last above quoted shows that an underwriter in asserting rights obtained by him through subrogation may invoke those obtained either in his own courts or through public negotiations between sovereign governments.

By the above holding American underwriters are clearly entitled to invoke not only whatever remedies might be available to them in municipal law but rights which have since become available by treaty or other diplomatic negotiation.

The Government of the United States had numerous claims submitted against it under the twelfth article of the treaty of May 8, 1871, between the United States and Great Britain, these claims being predicated in each and every instance upon war risks. In all of these cases—and there were many of them—the principle of subrogation was recognized, and insurance companies were following the practice of international arbitrations, which, like that of admiralty and equity courts, is to permit insurance companies to come in and claim in their own right. In the case of the Sir William Peel, before the Washington arbitration, one Edwin Gerard appeared as claimant for himself and certain insurance underwriters. This British vessel had been captured by an American man-of-war on September 11, 1863, while lying at anchor at the mouth of the Rio Grande River. A considerable portion of the argument in the case was directed to the point as to whether the vessel was in delicto when captured, the Government of the United States taking this position and contending, therefore, that insurance companies would have no greater rights than the owners of the vessel, and that if the owners had no right to recovery, neither did the underwriters. In this case insurance companies had made certain assignments of their rights. In further defending, however, the Government of the United States admitted that by abandonment and acceptance of the same, and payment as for total loss, entire right to any and all the proceeds of the vessel passed from the owners of the ship and cargo to the insurers, irrespective of the legality of the contract of the insured, the contract being a voluntary one by the act of the parties. The United States further contended, however, that the undertaking of the insurance companies was to indemnify British subjects for losses resulting from an illegal act—that is, a violation by the British of rights of the United States in blockading the South. The commission, in deciding the cases, held that the capture of the vessel within the neutral waters of Mexico was a violation of law, that the assignment by the insurance company was a valid one, "and that the contracts of insurance were also valid and entitled to recognition and protection under international law." (Vol. 6, Papers Relating to the Treaty of Washington, pp. 100–110, Hale Report.)

Here was a further instance in which the right of subrogation was recognized in case of war risk.

In the case of the steamship Circassian, a British vessel captured by a United States cruiser on May 4, 1862, off the coast of Cuba, insurance companies and underwriters claimed £52,636, with interest, the value of the cargo insured by them, which was abandoned by the owners, and on which the underwriters paid the insurance as a total loss. The British Government urged on behalf of the insurance companies that—

"* * * those claims were the legitimate subject of reclamation before this commission, as well in respect of those portions of the insured cargo originally owned by French merchants as of those owned by British subjects; that upon abandonment and payment the title of the underwriters became absolute to all interest of the insured in the property and to all right of reclamation in respect of the same, and that such title related back to the date of insurance."

The Government of the United States in this case took the position that the cargo in question had been British owned and that the insurers had acquired title or right to claim from them. On this point the United States urged:

"* * * That the abandonment by the insured to the insurers after capture, the acceptance of such abandonment by the insurers, and payment as for a total loss simply operated as a transfer to the insurers of the rights of the assured in respect of the capture; and that the insurers stood merely as subrogated to the rights of the owners at the time of the capture and as their equitable assignees. That such transfer by operation of law gave to the insurers as equitable assignees no better standing before the commission than they would have in case of a claim for any other injuries to the persons or property of individuals not subjects of Her Britannic Majesty, but who had assigned their claim against the United States for such injuries to a British subject."

The commission made an award on behalf of the insurance companies and included in the award the proceeds of the cargo which belonged to French merchants as well as the portion which belonged to British subjects. (Hale report, Papers Relating to Treaty of Washington, vol. 6, pp. 141–148.)

In the case of the British bark Springbok, which was captured by an American cruiser east of Nassau, one John Riley appeared before the Washington arbitration and claimed, as manager of the London A1 Insurance Association, the A1 Guarantee Insurance Association, and the Colonial A1 Insurance Association, insurers of the vessel, and who had, on abandonment by the owners, paid as for a total loss.

The commission unanimously allowed the claims of the insurance companies for reimbursement of the amounts paid by them for the losses on the vessel. (Hale report, Papers Relating to Treaty of Washington, vol. 6, Washington Arbitrations, pp. 117–123.)

On the 14th of September, 1807, Denmark, suddenly forced by Great Britain from the position of neutrality from which Napoleon had already prepared to drive her, issued instructions to her privateers to bring in not only all British vessels but all vessels which there was ground to suspect of not being neutral. In the latter part of 1809 American merchants began to complain of the seizure of their vessels by Danish privateers. Between April and October, 1809, upward of 50 American vessels were seized and carried into Danish ports, and 21 on the list were condemned. The whole number of American vessels captured in 1809–10 was 160, of which 42 were condemned.

By a convention of March 28, 1830, the Government of Denmark agreed to pay 650,000 Spanish milled dollars "on account of the citizens of the United States who have preferred claims relating to the seizure, detention, condemnation, or confiscation of their vessels, cargoes, or property whatsoever by the public and private armed ships or by the tribunals of Denmark, or in the States subject to the Danish scepter." An American court of commissioners appointed by the President to distribute this fund made awards amounting to $2,154,425 and allowed insurance claims. (Moore's International Arbitrations, vol. 5, pp. 4549–4573.) Under the treaty of July 4, 1831, with France, the latter country agreed to pay the United States the sum of 25,000,000 francs for French spoliations against American commerce, which grew out of the famous Berlin and Milan decrees of Napoleon during the progress of the Napoleonic wars. The commission which distributed this indemnity allowed payment for vessels lost, for freight, lost cargoes, insurance premiums, and wages of crews, and insurance companies were permitted to appear as claimants. (Moore's International Arbitrations, vol. 5, pp. 4460–4485.)

Under the Van Ness convention between the United States and Spain of February 17, 1834, the commissioners appointed to determine the claims against Spain allowed insurers to recover the sums which had actually been paid by them, except in cases especially adjusted between the parties where the intention of the parties entering into the contract was allowed to be carried out. These claims grew out of Spanish spoliations on American commerce in consequence of the war between Spain and her American colonies. (Moore's International Arbitrations, vol. 5, pp. 4533–4547.)

The claims of underwriters to reimbursement for insurance paid on the cargo of a vessel owned by Stephen B. Howe, which had been seized by the Government of Peru, were allowed under the terms of the convention of March 17, 1841, in connection with which Peru undertook to satisfy the United States on account of seizures, captures, sequestrations, and confiscations of American vessels and their cargoes at sea or in Peruvian ports. (Moore's International Arbitrations, vol. 5, pp. 4591–4607.)

It is shown from the foregoing that, contrary to the German contention, it has been the practice among nations to recognize the application of the equitable doctrine of subrogation in cases where insurance was taken upon war risks, and that in each and every instance the insurance company, in the final analysis, was permitted to revoke whatever rights were made finally available to it by its own Government through negotiations or otherwise; that these rights were builded upon and made possible the realization of whatever rights the insurance companies may originally have attained from the assured by reason of the payment of the losses and the subrogation of the insurance company thereby to the rights of the insured.

Numerous other instances might be cited, but it is believed that these are sufficient to show the inaccuracy of the German position, and the learned German agent and counsel are called upon to produce any authorities or precedents showing that the principle of subrogation may not be invoked in cases of war-risk insurance.

Germany appears in this record asking that the United States and its nationals shall receive through international law less than would be accorded them under American, English, French, or German law.

PART IX

GERMANY, AS TORT-FEASOR, BOUND TO MAKE INDEMNIFICATION FOR LOSSES CAUSED BY HER, CAN NOT INVOKE, WITH A VIEW TO DIMINISHING OR DISCHARGING THIS LIABILITY, THE BENEFITS OF INSURANCE PAID FOR BY OTHERS

On page 12 of the German "Observation on the Lusitania rules," the following significant passage occurs:

"* * * It thus follows that in the case of reparation losses which may be charged to Germany's account under the treaties and agreements between the German and United States Governments, no individual American citizen or corporation should, in principle, be regarded as entitled to claim damages for loss of goods if the loss has been fully covered by insurance."

Germany by the above has plainly taken the position that the owner of property lost during the recent war at the hands of Germany can not nevertheless prefer a claim or maintain an action against Germany if the owner theretofore has collected insurance on the property from another. The relation of Germany in these proceedings is that of a tort-feasor, a wrongdoer who is and must be held liable for war losses caused by her. The analogy in fact is complete, and Germany, as tort-feasor, appears in the present record undertaking to reap the benefits of insurance taken out by another, paid for by another, and for which Germany was in no way responsible except by creating the condition which necessitated the taking out of insurance.

"The fact that the insured has recovered payment for the loss from the insurer will not prevent the former from recovering from the person or persons by whose negligence the loss was occasioned, and the payment by the insurer will not be in mitigation of the damages sustained." (Joyce on Insurance, vol. 5, p. 5914.)

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, under the treaty between Germany and the United States, Germany accepted liability for losses sustained by the sinking of ships and by the destruction of cargoes. The insurance companies, by operation of law, under legal principles recognized in every jurisdiction and in every system of law, became subrogated to the rights of the insured. The only question here is whether Germany shall pay the full amount of the losses sustained by the sinking of the ships and by the destruction of the cargoes.

These insurance companies are all American nationals. Wherever an American insurance company had reinsured in a foreign company the amount of damage covered by such reinsurance was deducted from the amount paid to the American insurance company. So these awards are all for the benefit of American nationals.

Some one has said that the insurance companies made profits out of their business during the war. The United States Government was in the insurance business during the war. The United States Government insured ships under the war risk insurance act, and upon that business conducted by the United States there was a profit of $17,000,000 over and above all losses.

And still, notwithstanding that profit of $17,000,000, the Mixed Claims Commission made awards in favor of the United States of $24,000,000, thereby subrogating the United States for losses sustained by those who were insured by the United States under the war risk insurance act. So we are in the position that the United States Government has made a profit of $17,000,000 over and above the $24,000,000 for which the awards have been made by the Mixed Claims Commission, and still we are to collect these awards of $24,000,000 from Germany.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I will.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. The bill provides that the United States Government shall not receive any pay out of this fund.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. It does not. The United States Government ultimately will be paid under this bill.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I am talking about the fund set up in the bill.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. If the gentleman means the special deposit fund, yes, in a way, because the special deposit fund is created principally for the purpose of taking care of small claims—first the return of 80 per cent of Germany property, and secondly for taking care of the claims of American nationals for death and personal-injury losses, paying claims of American nationals amounting to less than $100,000 and paying $100,000 upon the larger claims. Of course, it would be folly to urge that the United States Government upon its claim of $24,000,000 should get payment of $100,000. We might put that in if we wanted to, but it would seem almost picayunish.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. At the same time, the United States Government is receiving $13,000,000 annually on its debt against Germany.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Yes; it is constantly receiving $13,000,000 a year, and also $10,700,000 a year through the Reparations Commission. In terms of German currency we are receiving 55,000,000 gold marks annually in payment of the cost of the Army of occupation and 45,000,000 gold marks for the payment of 2¼ per cent out of the allotment of the Reparation Commission. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, under extension of remarks I wish simply to add that the so-called "special deposit fund" will continue until all German property has been returned to its owners and all claims of the United States and its nationals, including the Government of the United States, have been fully paid. This fund will be created in and be disbursed by the Treasury Department of the United States. The assets in the hands of the Alien Property Custodian will be distributed to their owners to the extent of 80 per cent, and the balance of 20 per cent and other nondistributed assets will be deposited in the Treasury to become a part of the special deposit fund, out of which the Treasury Department will eventually return this balance of 20 per cent to its German owners in accordance with the plan outlined in the bill.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following substitute for the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 4, after the figures "1928," insert the following: "Provided, That no claim shall be allowed or paid under the provisions of this act in behalf of any insurance company or any insurer, either in its own right or as assignee in the right of a person or party insured, unless such claimant shall show to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury that during the period within which such losses arose the sum of such losses in respect to such company's or insurer's war risks exceeded the sum of its premiums or other gains upon or in respect to such war risks, and in the case of any such allowance the same shall not be greater than such excess of loss."

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I have followed in this amendment the exact language of the stipulation that was made more than a half century ago in reference to the Alabama claims. In other words, in settling the Alabama claims it was provided that the insurance companies should be paid only what they could show their actual losses to be; that is, their excess losses over their excess premiums during the war. They were permitted to make their normal profits on their normal business, and if their excess losses due to the war period exceeded their excess premiums they were allowed the amount of that excess. It seems to me that would be fair. Those claims were almost a deadly parallel to these. They who seek equity should do equity.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. In a moment. I want first to make my statement. In the cases at bar the insurance companies collected, according to the evidence, all the way from 1 or 2 per cent up, and in some instances 30 to 40 per cent excess premiums. After the war came on it was found that the dangers of the war, so far as they were concerned, were not anything as great as they had anticipated, and they all made money, some of them a great deal of money. There is not any indication that any of them lost any money, but if they did lose, this amendment I have offered would permit them to recoup those losses. They collected these excess premiums. I do not blame them for that. It was their right to protect themselves.

The technical argument of subrogation is made. It would carry much weight if there had been great losses and if we were not underwriting any portion of it. But the American Government is appropriating $50,000,000, at least, to be used temporarily in connection with these claims, so that the taxpayer, in the event the reparation payments are not continued, may be forced to pay a portion of it.

The argument is made that the Germans—as if that justified any course of dealing—are paying this, and that they agreed to it. Of course they agreed to it. If you put a pistol to a man's head he will agree to anything, and if you have circumstances thrown around him in such shape that he can not do other than agree to what those who hold the whip hand are in a position to dictate, of course he will agree to it. It is not a question of whether Germany agreed to it; it is a question of whether it is right; and I do not believe that insurance companies that collected these excess premiums by virtue of the war and who made money should be allowed to collect this excess amount, and in view of the circumstances I do not think they should want to.

If it could go back to the people who paid the premiums, that would be a different thing—just as when we refund the excise taxes, we do not give them back unless it is shown that the people who receive them are paying them back to the person who paid them in the first place.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Does the gentleman intend that the Government of the United States shall surrender its award of $24,000,000 for profits which it had made?

Mr. JONES. That is altogether a different question.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Oh, no; the Government was in the insurance business.

Mr. JONES. I do not agree to that feature of the bill, if it is in here, but whether it is or not, two wrongs do not make a right, and if an insurance company has collected tremendous premiums and made great profits, whether our people are paying those profits or a helpless people are paying them, it is not right to allow them to collect a lot of other money that they did not earn.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that there is no provision at all in this bill making provision that the Government shall be paid its claim. On the contrary there is provision that expressly says that the amounts awarded the United States in respect to claims of the United States shall not be payable under this.

Mr. JONES. That was my understanding of it, but whether it does or not makes no difference. I understand even according to the gentleman's own construction that it will be paid only in the event that these reparations are paid, which is entirely different from saying that they shall be paid 100 per cent after collecting these tremendous premiums and making a lot of money. Of course, they are not to be paid 100 per cent first thing, right off the reel, but they will as soon as the matter gets into working order. They are among the first to be paid.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Only to the extent of $100,000 in the first place.

Mr. JONES. But that will take care of a good part of it, and then finally the remainder will be paid; as soon as the death and other claims are taken care of those will be settled.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. If the gentleman will look in the hearings he can get the amounts of the insurance awards, and they are in very large amounts. They are paid up to $100,000 first.

Mr. JONES. That is all the greater reason why we should not take money out of the Treasury and pay them. If these claims run over a hundred thousand dollars each, evidently they collected many hundreds of thousands of dollars in premiums, because the witness, as shown by the hearings, who presented the argument in behalf of the insurance companies said that their losses were not as great as they had anticipated, and they could have reduced the rates if they had known the full facts.

I have no objection to any of these fair claims being paid, and I think the property should be returned. I think if an insurance company lost anything, not getting sufficient to pay its war losses, it should be compensated. But here we are trying to settle a great many complicated and troublesome claims and issues. Everyone should be fair. They should be paid, if at all, out of reparations and not in any circumstances out of direct appropriations.

Here is the provision that was put in in reference to the insurance companies in the Alabama case, which is a parallel claim. I can not recognize the distinction that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] drew, although I always listen with great interest to anything that he has to say.

Here is the provision:

No claim shall be admissible or allowed by said court by or on or in behalf of any insurance company or insurer, either in its or his own right, or as assignee, or otherwise, in the right of a person or party insured as aforesaid, unless such claimant shall show to the satisfaction of said court that during the late rebellion the sum of its or his losses, in respect to its or his war risks, exceeded the sum of its or his premiums or other gains upon or in respect to such war risks; and in case of any such allowance the same shall not be greater than such excess of loss.

That is the exact principle we applied to the British insurance companies.

Mr. RAINEY. If the gentleman will yield, I wish to state to the gentleman his amendment is better than mine, and as soon as I get the floor I will withdraw my amendment and accept his substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. JONES. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, in two minutes I can not correct all the careless statements made by the gentleman from Illinois, who spoke about the insurance companies getting $10,000, and the gentleman from Texas, about their being paid at once by the provisions of the bill, but there are two reasons, either one of which is sufficient to cause Members of the House to vote against this amendment. In the first place, it violates the solemn promise of our treaty we entered into. It is agreed both on the part of the United States and on the part of Germany that these claims should be referred to the mixed commission, and we would abide by the awards. Now, some gentlemen urge that we repudiate a treaty we solemnly entered into in order to put off the insurance claims a little further.

Mr. RAINEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I have only two minutes. There is another reason why this amendment should be defeated. The gentleman would not accomplish anything if he succeeded in his amendment. Under the Berlin treaty 2¼ per cent of the reparations is being paid regularly to our Government, and part must be applied to the payment of the insurance claims. Nothing will be accomplished by the amendment, and I insist it ought to be voted down.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my amendment and accept the substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the noes appeared to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. RAINEY) there were—ayes 33, noes 82.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. All debate on this section and all amendments thereto have been closed.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I did not mean on this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. All amendments to the section have been closed on motion of the gentleman from Iowa.

The Clerk read as follows:

CLAIMS OF GERMAN NATIONALS AGAINST UNITED STATES

SEC. 4. (a) There shall be a German claims arbiter (hereinafter referred to as the "arbiter"), who shall be appointed by the President, at a salary to be fixed by the President not in excess of $15,000 a year; or any officer or agent of the United States may be designated by the President as arbiter. Any officer or agent so designated shall receive as arbiter, notwithstanding any other provision of law, a salary to be fixed by the President in an amount, if any, which when added to any other salary will make his total salary from the United States not in excess of $15,000 a year.

(b) It shall be the duty of the arbiter, within the limitations hereinafter prescribed, to hear the claims of any German national (as hereinafter defined), and to determine the fair compensation to be paid by the United States, in respect of—

(1) Any merchant vessel (including any equipment, appurtenances, and property contained therein), title to which was taken by or on behalf of the United States under the authority of the joint resolution of May 12, 1917 (40 Stats. 75). Such compensation shall be the fair value, as nearly as may be determined, of such vessel to the owner immediately prior to the time exclusive possession was taken under the authority of such joint resolution, and in its condition at such time, taking into consideration the fact that such owner could not use or permit the use of such vessel, or charter or sell or otherwise dispose of such vessel for use or delivery, prior to the termination of the war, and that the war was not terminated until July 2, 1921, except that there shall be deducted from such value any consideration paid for such vessel by the United States.

(2) Any radio station (including any equipment, appurtenances, and property contained therein) which was sold to the United States by or under the direction of the Alien Property Custodian under authority of the trading with the enemy act, or any amendment thereto. Such compensation shall be the fair value, as nearly as may be determined, which such radio station would have had on July 2, 1921, if returned to the owner on such date in the same condition as on the date on which it was seized by or on behalf of the United States, or on which it was conveyed or delivered to, or seized by, the Alien Property Custodian, whichever date is earlier, except that there shall be deducted from such value any consideration paid for such radio station by the United States.

(3) Any patent (or any right therein or claim thereto, and including an application therefor and any patent issued pursuant to any such application) which was licensed, assigned, or sold by the Alien Property Custodian to the United States. Such compensation shall be the amount as nearly as may be determined, which would have been paid if such patent, right, claim, or application had been licensed, assigned, or sold to the United States by a citizen of the United States, except that there shall be deducted from such amount any consideration paid therefor by the United States (other than consideration which is returned to the United States under section 27 of the trading with the enemy act, as amended).

(4) The use by or for the United States of any invention described in and covered by any patent (including an application therefor and any patent issued pursuant to any such application) which was conveyed, transferred, or assigned to, or seized by, the Alien Property Custodian, but not including any use during any period between April 6, 1917, and November 11, 1918, both dates inclusive, or on or after the date on which such patent was licensed, assigned, or sold by the Alien Property Custodian, in determining such compensation, any defense, general or special, available to a defendant in an action for infringement or in any suit in equity for relief against an alleged infringement, shall be available to the United States.

(c) The proceedings of the arbiter shall be conducted in accordance with such rules of procedure as he may prescribe. The arbiter, or any referee designated by him, is authorized to administer oaths, to hold hearings at such places within or without the United States as the arbiter deems necessary, and to contract for the reporting of such hearings. Any witness appearing for the United States before the arbiter or any such referee at any place within or without the United States may be paid the same fees and mileage as witnesses in courts of the United States. Such payments shall be made out of any funds in the special deposit account hereinafter provided for, and may be made in advance.

(d) The arbiter may, from time to time, and shall, upon the determination by him of the fair compensation in respect of all such vessels, radio stations, and patents, make a tentative award to each claimant of the fair compensation to be paid in respect of his claim, including simple interest, at the rate of 5 per cent per annum, on the amount of such compensation from July 2, 1921, to January 1, 1928.

(e) The total amount to be awarded under this section shall not exceed $100,000,000, minus the sum of (1) the expenditures in carrying out the provisions of this section (including a reasonable estimate for such expenditures to be incurred prior to the expiration of the term of office of the arbiter), and (2) the aggregate consideration paid by the United States in respect of the acquisition of such vessels and radio stations, and the use, license, assignment, and sale of such patents (other than consideration which is returned to the United States under section 27 of the trading with the enemy act, as amended).

(f) If the aggregate amount of the tentative awards exceeds the amount which may be awarded under subsection (e), the arbiter shall reduce pro rata the amount of each tentative award. The arbiter shall enter an award of the amount to be paid such claimant, and thereupon shall certify such awards to the Secretary of the Treasury.

(g) The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay the amount of the awards certified under subsection (f).

(h) The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay annually (as nearly as may be) simple interest, at the rate of 5 per cent per annum, upon the amount of any such award remaining unpaid, beginning January 1, 1928, until paid.

(i) The payments authorized by subsection (g), (h), or (s) shall be made in accordance with such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe, but only out of the special deposit account created by section 5, within the limitations hereinafter prescribed, and in the order of priority provided in subsections (c) and (d) of section 5.

(j) The Secretary of the Treasury shall not pay any amount in respect of any award made in respect of any claim by or on behalf of the German Government or any member of the former ruling family, but the amount of any such award shall be credited upon the final payment due the United States from the German Government for the purpose of satisfying the awards of the Mixed Claims Commission.

(k) No payment shall be made under this section unless application therefor is made, within two years after the date the award is certified, in accordance with such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe. Payment of any amount in respect of any award may be made, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, in money of the United States or in lawful German money, and shall be made only to the person on behalf of whom the award was made, except that—

(1) If such person is deceased or is under a legal disability, payment shall be made to his legal representative, except that if the payment is not over $500 it may be made to the persons found by the Secretary of the Treasury to be entitled thereto, without the necessity of compliance with the requirements of law in respect of the administration of estates;

(2) In the case of a partnership, association, or corporation the existence of which has been terminated, payment shall be made, except as provided in paragraphs (3) and (4), to the person who, in the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury, is entitled thereto;

(3) If a receiver or trustee for the person on behalf of whom the award was made has been duly appointed by a court of competent jurisdiction and has not been discharged prior to the date of payment, payment shall be made to the receiver or trustee or in accordance with the order of the court; and

(4) In the case of an assignment of an award, or of an assignment (prior to the making of the award) of the claim in respect of which such award was made, by a receiver or trustee for any such person, duly appointed by a court of competent jurisdiction, payment shall be made to the assignee.

(l) The head of any executive department, independent establishment or agency in the executive branch of Government, including the Alien Property Custodian and the Comptroller General, shall, upon request of the arbiter, furnish such records, documents, papers, correspondence, and information in the possession of such department or independent establishment as may assist the arbiter, furnish him statements and assistance of the same character as is described in section 188 of the Revised Statutes, and may temporarily detail any officers or employees of such department or independent establishment to assist the arbiter, or to act as a referee, in carrying out the provisions of this section. The Attorney General shall assign such officers and employees of the Department of Justice as may be necessary to represent the United States in the proceedings under this section.

(m) The arbiter, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, is authorized to (1) appoint and fix the salaries of such officers, referees, and employees, without regard to the civil service laws and regulations or to the classification act of 1923, and (2) make such expenditures (including expenditures for rent and personal services at the seat of government and elsewhere, law books, periodicals, books of reference, and printing and binding), as may be necessary for carrying out the provisions of this section and within the funds available therefor. Any officer or employee detailed or assigned under subsection (l) shall be entitled to receive (notwithstanding any provision of law to the contrary) such additional compensation as the arbiter, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may prescribe. The arbiter and officers and employees appointed, detailed, or assigned shall be entitled to receive their necessary traveling expenses and actual expenses incurred for subsistence (without regard to any limitations imposed by law) while away from the District of Columbia on business required by this section.

(n) On the date on which the awards are certified to the Secretary of the Treasury under subsection (f), the terms of office of the arbiter, and of the officers and employees appointed by the arbiter, shall expire, and the books, papers, records, correspondence, property, and equipment of the office shall be transferred to the Department of the Treasury.

(o) No award or tentative award shall be made by the arbiter in respect of any claim if (1) such claim is filed after the expiration of four months from the date on which the arbiter takes office, or (2) any judgment or decree awarding compensation or damages in respect thereof has been rendered against the United States, and if such judgment or decree has become final (whether before or after the enactment of this act), or (3) any suit or proceeding against the United States, or any agency thereof, is commenced or is pending in respect thereof and is not dismissed upon motion of the person by or on behalf of whom it was commenced, made before the expiration of six months from the date on which the arbiter takes office and before any judgment or decree awarding compensation or damages becomes final.

(p) There is hereby authorized to be appropriated, to be immediately available and to remain available until expended, the sum of $50,000,000, and, after the date on which the awards of the arbiter are certified to the Secretary of the Treasury, such additional amounts as, when added to the amounts previously appropriated, will be equivalent to the aggregate amount of such awards plus the amounts necessary for the expenditures authorized by subsections (c) and (m) of this section, except that the aggregate of such appropriations shall not exceed $100,000,000.

(q) The provisions of this section shall constitute the exclusive method for the presentation and payment of claims arising out of any of the acts by or on behalf of the United States for which this section provides a remedy. Any person who files any claim or makes application for any payment under this section shall be held to have consented to all the provisions of this act.

(r) If the aggregate amount to be awarded in respect of any vessel, radio station, or patent is awarded in respect of two or more claims, such amounts shall be apportioned among such claims by the arbiter as he determines to be just and equitable and as the interests of the claimants may appear.

(s) The Secretary of the Treasury, upon the certification of any of the tentative awards made under subsection (d) and the recommendation of the arbiter, may make such pro rata payments in respect of such tentative awards as he deems advisable, but the aggregate of such payments shall not exceed $25,000,000.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

On page 9, line 22, after the word "exceed," strike out "$100,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$50,000,000."

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, this action—covered by my amendment—was taken by the Senate Committee on Finance after this bill went over to the Senate during the last Congress. It simply reduces the authorization for the payment of ships, radio stations, and patents from the maximum of $100,000,000 to $50,000,000. I wish to remind Members of the fact that there seems to have been no distinction made by the committee or any distinction in debate between ships and other alien property, whereas there is a distinction in fact and under international law and practice and under the treaties. Now, the German nationals in their claims rely upon the treaties of 1799 and 1828 between Germany and the United States. As has been explained by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY], and as stated by Secretary of State Kellogg, these treaties are no longer in force and effect. Even when they were in force and effect they had no application whatever to ships, as the terms of the treaties themselves specifically show. We are under no obligation, either legally or morally, to pay the German shipowners anything whatever for these ships which we seized in time of war. We are under no obligation, according to the old treaty between Germany and this country, and we are under no such obligation under any provision of subsequent treaty or the present treaty. We are under no obligation, according to international law or practice, because the ships of an enemy seized by a combatant in warfare have never been returned or paid for. Competent authorities on international law and custom have stated before the committees, and it is stated generally, that there is no instance in which this has been done by this country or by any other country. And our allies are making no pretense of paying for German ships which they seized.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Or any other property.

Mr. DAVIS. I know. They are under no obligation to do so. And no nation ever has paid for a ship seized in warfare. It is not construed as confiscation. They are prizes of war. That is true whether they are seized on the high seas or in a harbor or anywhere else. This has likewise been the universal custom on the part of the United States and all other nations with respect to all other property of either an enemy nation or the nationals of an enemy nation so seized, unless such property was specifically protected by treaty between the combatant nations.

However, perhaps the political exigencies have not heretofore been so great.

There is not any question about it, and I presume nobody will dispute that it has been the undisputed international law and custom throughout all the tide of time.

We are under no obligation to pay for any of these ships under our own law, or under the acts and proclamations under which we seized them, and the Supreme Court of the United States, in the noted Chemical Foundation case, held that expressly with respect to patents, the court declaring in part as follows:

> There is no support for a construction that would restrain the force of the broad language used. Congress was untrammeled and free to authorize the seizure, use, or appropriation of such properties without any compensation to the owners. There is no constitutional prohibition against confiscation of enemy properties. And the act makes no provision for compensation. The former enemy owners have no claim against the patents or the proceeds derived from the sales.

Patents, if anything, stand upon higher equitable ground than do ships, because under the treaties of 1799 and 1828, which were abrogated by the treaty of 1921, it was provided that German nationals residing in this country should be protected in their persons and their goods and homes and lands.

In view of the fact that the administration and so many Members, even from the South, are disposed to be so considerate of our late enemies, and so generous in donating to them such large sums collected from the American taxpayers, I wish to remind them of what the practice and conduct of this Government has been toward its own nationals. As is well known, during the War between the States, the Union Armies throughout the South seized, used, and destroyed immense amounts of property of every description belonging to the citizens; they frequently tore down churches and other buildings in order to use the lumber for building barracks; the Federal officers frequently purchased or seized stock, grain, meat, and various other properties, giving the citizens receipts therefor or orders on the Government for payment thereof. None of those receipts or orders have ever been redeemed, or any of the purchased, seized, or destroyed property paid for by this Government, unless and until the owner had commenced action and obtained judgment in the United States Court of Claims, one of the prerequisites to a recovery being that the claimant must prove that he was loyal to the Union during the said war. There are still thousands of such claims which could be proven even according to that test, but many years ago this Congress enacted a law which has since prevented such claimants from asserting their claims in the Court of Claims or elsewhere, and this Congress will not even entertain a bill for the payment of any such claims. As to the owners of such property who were not loyal to the Union during the War between the States, and who were consequently classed as enemies, they have never had a day in court, and not one of them has ever been paid for his property so seized, purchased, or destroyed, notwithstanding the fact that after that unfortunate war was concluded they demonstrated their unalloyed loyalty to this Government in every conceivable manner. And yet many of the Representatives of those very people and their descendents are eagerly advocating the donation to our late German enemies of several times the value of their property which was seized by this Government during the World War, including ships which have never heretofore in all history been regarded or treated as otherwise than prizes of war.

I would paraphrase the old adage that "Charity should begin at home" into "Justice should begin at home."

However, I am aware of the fact that it has become the confirmed practice in this country to be generous to aliens, to be more generous to aliens than to our own nationals, and I shall not undertake at this time to change the policy of this Government in that respect. But I do say this: That if we are to pay for these ships, not because of any legal or moral obligation, but merely as a matter of grace—and that is what it amounts to—we should at least protect this Government against paying more than the value of those ships. This bill as it now stands will authorize the payment of much more than the value of those ships that were seized.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

Mr. DAVIS. Now, let us look for a moment to the value of these German ship for which we propose to authorize a payment of $100,000,000. You may rest assured that they will be paid whatever is allowed. You know how those things go. The committee in its report upon this question correctly states that the Naval Board of Survey, appointed under the provisions of the seizure act, made a survey of those ships and estimated their value at the time of seizure to be about $33,000,000. And then against that this report states the former German owners brought suit in the Court of Claims against the United States and alleged that their ships were worth $250,000,000.

The report is about as accurate in that respect as it is in other respects, because they only alleged that the ships were worth $230,000,000. But the lawyers in the House know that allegations in complaints as to amounts which they claim they are entitled to recover are not entitled to much consideration, and that is particularly true when a plaintiff is kicked out of court, as was the case with these plaintiffs in the Court of Claims.

Now, the only other evidence on the value of these ships furnished to us by the committee is a statement made by the chairman of the committee that it was shown that the United States had sold 44 of these ships, as he said, for $14,000,000; and that is a mistake. This statement of the chairman was based solely on the fact that the attorney for these former German shipowners presented to the committee a statement of 44 ships which he claimed had been sold by the Shipping Board for $14,976,520.

The fact of the business is that the major portion of these ships were sold upon long time with a cash payment, ranging all the way from nothing to not exceeding 25 per cent, and were turned back on the Government because the purchasers were irresponsible and could not meet their payments. That was true with respect to all of the more valuable ships, as I could show from the record if I had time to do so. So that is no evidence at all.

The fact of the business is this: That the survey and appraisal by this naval board, which was very carefully and specifically made, was done by men fully capable of performing that service.

On this subject the report of the Senate Committee on Finance, submitted by the chairman, Senator SMOOT, declared:

> The methods employed by the board were proper and the appraisals seem to have been fairly made. The bill as reported to the Senate consequently eliminates the provisions of the House bill for a new appraisal and provides for the payment for the ships upon the basis of the appraisals made by the Navy Board of Surveys.

The Navy board made exhaustive, detailed, and voluminous reports, and they reached the conclusion that those ships were worth only $33,000,000 at the time of their seizure, and that sum included some ships that belonged to the Government of Germany, and it included some ships that belonged to the nationals of other countries.

The average age of these ships at the time of seizure was about 15 years. Many of them were 30 or 40 years old and had been previously put out of service, but pulled out because of the war demands for tonnage; and all experts will tell you that the useful life of a ship is only 20 years. In other words, after operation for 20 years it becomes so expensive to keep operating it and make necessary repairs that it does not pay, and if you want to operate a ship for a longer period than that you must go to the expense of reconditioning it, putting in new machinery, and so forth. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has again expired.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Chairman, I am going to ask the indulgence of the committee for five minutes more. This is an important matter and I should like to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

Mr. DAVIS. In addition to the age and general condition of these ships, I want to call your attention to the fact that with respect to nearly all of them the German crews had practiced sabotage; in other words, they had destroyed the machinery and put the ships out of commission.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Under the terms we pay for them only in the condition they were in.

Mr. DAVIS. That is what I am talking about. They were in bad shape. This survey was very liberal; I say it was exceedingly liberal. The Navy board did not reduce the physical value of the ships by reason of the fact that they were wholly unavailable and useless to the German owners at least until after the treaty of peace was signed four years later, even if we had not seized them. On that point your committee called before them Mr. Neagle, from the Navy Department, to give them information and advice, and here is what he said about the appraisal:

> Mr. MAPES. This bill, as you know, instructs the arbiter to take into consideration in fixing the value the fact that the owners "could not use or permit the use of such vessel or charter or sell or otherwise dispose of such vessel for use or delivery prior to the termination of the war, and that the war was not terminated until July 2, 1921." Did this board consider that in arriving at its valuation?
> Mr. NEAGLE. No; I am convinced that the board did not. I do not see how it could, because the vessels when they were seized came entirely to the Government—that is, the title came to the United States—and when the war ended, on July 2, 1921, the vessels were just as unavailable at that time to a German national as they were at any time during the war; and any agreement that he might have made, as suggested in the bill, for delivery of the vessel after the war would have been impossible, because the Government still had it just as completely. So that would have been of no value at all.
> Mr. MAPES. Have you anything upon which to base a judgment as to the difference in valuation that there would be between what the board valued these ships at and what the arbiter, using this standard, would value them at?
> Mr. NEAGLE. I do not see how the arbiter could very well arrive at a reasonably good determination of that, because of the time that has passed since the occurrence and the unavailability of the vessels. The board saw the vessels themselves, and were able to get an impression that could not be obtained at this time. So I do not think that a determination of the value at this time would be very valuable.
> Mr. MAPES. Would it be your judgment, then, that it would be as well, perhaps, to take the valuation fixed by the board as to provide for this way of fixing a valuation on them?
> Mr. NEAGLE. I believe that would be the only practical and reasonable thing to do.
> Mr. MILLS. And, of course, whatever value these ships had to the German owners was such value as might be derived from their right to sell these vessels for delivery after the war.
> Mr. NEAGLE. Well, if it is based on that, I am afraid the Germans would come out with a very small chance.

And so they would. In January, 1920, the International Mercantile Marine Corporation submitted to the Shipping Board a bid of $27,400,000 for the cream of all of these German seized ships, including the Leviathan, George Washington, America, Republic, and all of the ships they thought were worth purchasing. They proposed to pay for the ships in 16 years' time and agreed to operate them under the American flag. John Barton Payne was then chairman of the Shipping Board. He felt it was a good proposition and that it ought to be accepted, but there was one member of the board who felt differently. Finally they sought the views of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, which has jurisdiction over shipping matters for the House.

They appeared before our committee in executive session and each of them stated his position and his contention, one that we should accept the bid and the other that we should not sell the ships. After hearing the statements our committee, regardless of party, as I recall, were unanimously of the opinion, and so advised Chairman Payne, that they should accept the offer. That was true in the light of the condition of those ships, their age, and all that sort of business, although at that time, in January, 1920, as you know, shipping and ocean freight rates were at their peak, and all ships that were able to traverse the seas were in use. Before the Shipping Board could consummate the sale, William R. Hearst filed a bill enjoining the sale. The Shipping Board won the suit in the Supreme Court of the District. Hearst appealed and the Shipping Board won the suit on appeal, but by that time the slump in shipping had come and the company that had proposed to buy these ships did not want them, and there has never been a time since that those ships could be sold for one-third of what we could have sold them for at that time; and they could have been sold for as much at that time, and even more, than they could at the time the ships were seized.

The treaty of peace between Germany and the United States of America was signed August 22, 1921. This would have been the first time the ships would have been available to the German owners if they had been permitted to remain interned in our harbors and had never been seized as enemy ships by our Government and it had then been desired to permit the Germans to repair and replace the ship machinery, which they had willfully destroyed, and to withdraw the ships. At least a year before the signing of this peace treaty there had come the greatest world slump in shipping in all history; there was such a decrease in commerce that thousands of ships all over the world became surplus and were laid up; it was impossible to sell ships at any price. As suggested by Mr. Neagle, the market value of these ships at that time was practically nothing.

In their bid for these ships in 1920 the International Mercantile Marine Corporation, after calling attention to the extreme age of the vessels and their generally bad condition, stated that reconditioning and repairing of the ships would probably entail "an expenditure of from forty to fifty millions of dollars; that the cost of repairs in a number of instances will exceed the original cost of the steamers, which when repaired will still be vessels of advanced age; and that the combined amount of the bids and of the expenditures required for repairs, rehabilitation, renewal of equipment, and outfits will closely approximate the present cost of new construction."

As a matter of fact, after the war the Shipping Board expended over $30,000,000 in reconditioning only a small number of these former German ships before they were fit for commercial usage. Practically all of such ships which were thus reconditioned and have since been sold were sold for much less than the cost of reconditioning; in some cases the ships being sold for a small percentage of the cost of reconditioning. For example, $2,405,920 was spent on the City of Los Angeles—the former German name being Gr. Kurfurst—and she was subsequently sold for only $100,000. This ship was appraised for $606,350 by the Navy board. The records show many other cases just as illuminating. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has again expired.

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to delay the House or to delay the vote, but I rise to oppose the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS]. I will freely admit that the gentleman from Tennessee was right when he said—and I think every member of the committee who has spoken has admitted—that we could have taken these ships and could have confiscated them just the same as we could have confiscated every dollar's worth of property of any other German national which the Alien Property Custodian now holds, but the United States, as I take it, does not believe in that policy, enunciated some 2,500 years ago when the vandal chief, after capturing Rome and demanding so many pounds in gold for his removal, put his sword on the scales when the gold was being weighed out and said, upon remonstrances being made, "Woe to the vanquished." That is not the policy our Government is going to proceed on.

They talk about these ships being prizes of war. That is true; but they are not prizes of war like going out upon the high seas and wresting them from another nation. These ships came into our ports when we were at peace with Germany and when we were a neutral nation. They came here and they were dismantled. At that time they were in such condition that they could not get away even had we applied the 24 hour law, which the laws of nations give to vessels to get away from an unfriendly port after they had entered a port that had theretofore been friendly. After they entered our ports and were dismantled it would have been absolutely impossible for these vessels to have gotten away.

Now, as to the cost of these vessels and as to whether they are worth $100,000,000 or not. I said the other day that I believed $50,000,000 or $60,000,000 would be the amount which the arbiter would fix. We hope, trust, and believe the amount will not exceed $50,000,000. What is the value to be placed on these ships? The value to be placed on them, as the gentleman from Tennessee read to you a few moments ago, is what they were worth when they came into our ports minus what they would be worth to Germany after the war was over, which, as Mr. Neagle stated, would make them worth very little. To proceed on the theory that we might be appropriating more than the value of the ships would be to say we have no confidence in the arbiter. In fact, my friends, the whole argument against this bill is based on a lack of confidence in Germany's meeting its obligations and a lack of confidence that we are going to have an arbiter who is a fair man. I take it—and I will always take it—that when the President of the United States looks over this country for the purpose of appointing a man who, in his judgment, will fulfill his public duty that he will finally appoint a man who is going to be faithful and one who will honestly perform the duty imposed upon him; if it appears the ships are only worth $40,000,000, he will so find. I am not going to say in advance that the arbiter who is going to be appointed is one who will be swayed by improper influences and one who will make the assessed valuation of these ships very largely in excess of what they are worth.

Then let us remember another thing. The gentleman talks about the fact that the cream of the ships were only worth a certain amount. What is he going to say about those vessels we used during the war? Of course, many of them were dismantled, but we did use them, and we used them at a time, my friends, when a ship was worth ten times as much to us as it is now.

We did not have the great merchant marine which was necessary in order to transport all our supplies and our men across the seas. This was a time when we asked every owner of a private ship or a private yacht to come to our assistance; and let us take into consideration now the fact that these vessels which came into our port when it was friendly, and which were taken and used by us, were worth a great deal to the United States during the war. If $100,000,000 is too much, if the arbiter is honest, we will get back all that is not expended.

I hope, my friends, the amendment of my good friend from Tennessee does not pass.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. DAVIS) there were—ayes 30, noes 71.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I make this pro forma motion in order to ask a question and have a reply incorporated in the RECORD.

I want to know of the chairman of the committee if this bill contains a provision which will clarify the situation which was raised by the so-called Sturchler decision which the New York courts handed down about a year ago. This decision was that upon death or transfer of the title of property that those who acquired the property subsequent to its seizure are not entitled to either the income or the principal.

In the case which I have in mind a former leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra of over a generation ago, who had left our shores but had all of his money invested in securities in this country, found himself in destitute circumstances. Finally the Alien Property Custodian rendered a decision which allowed him to receive his income, which he enjoyed for about a year. He then died and for some little time after that the income from his estate was paid to his widow, who was then 80 years of age and had the care of an invalid daughter. Suddenly these payments ceased without notice. She waited some two or three months and then wrote to the Alien Property Custodian, and he wrote her back, as follows:

We are in receipt of your favor of the 26th bearing inquiry as to income accruing to the estate of Wilhelm Gericke, and regret to advise you that subsequent to our 1925–26 remittance an opinion has been rendered, known as the Sturchler decision, which prohibits returns being made to claimants who acquired title to property subsequent to seizure.

As the principal, Wilhelm Gericke, died October 27, 1925, the case of heirs falls within the Sturchler decision, and it will be impossible for us to make returns in this case pending the final determination of this decision.

I communicated with the Alien Property Custodian's office and asked him if in the meantime Mrs. Gericke and her daughter should starve to death, and he said the court took no cognizance of that.

I want to ask the chairman of the committee if this case and others like it are covered by this bill?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I will have to say to the gentleman that I have not examined the decision to which he refers and do not know just exactly on what the decision is based; but I assume the decision was based on the trading with the enemy act, which, of course, would be amended by this bill. But even under the trading with the enemy act, offhand, I doubt whether the decision would stand; but in any event we have three provisions here with reference to assignees, one on page 28, subsection (d), one on page 29, subsection (g), both giving rights to the legal representatives of a deceased person—this was a case where the party was deceased, was it not?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. These provisions, I think, would take care of the situation. Then we have a further provision on page 34 with reference to assignees and funds in trust. I think these provisions will care for the situation which the gentleman mentions.

Mr. UNDERHILL. And pending the passage of this bill the chairman holds that under the trading with the enemy act it was not the intention of the committee or of the Congress that any such interpretation should be placed upon that act.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Offhand I do not think the trading with the enemy act authorized the decision which was made, but I may be wrong about that. I have not seen the decision myself.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. It would be hard to assume that Congress passed legislation which recognized the right of an original owner and cut off legal heirs, devisees, and assigns.

Mr. UNDERHILL. That is the position I held, but the court held differently.

The Clerk read as follows:

FUNDS AVAILABLE FOR PAYMENT

SEC. 5. (a) There is hereby created in the Treasury a special deposit account, into which shall be deposited all funds hereinafter specified and from which shall be disbursed all payments authorized by section 3 or 4, including the expenditures authorized under subsections (c) and (m) of section 4 and subsection (e) of this section.

(b) The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to deposit in the special deposit account—

(1) All sums invested or transferred by the Alien Property Custodian, under the provisions of section 25 of the trading with the enemy act, as amended;

(2) The amounts appropriated under the authority of section 4;

(3) All money (including the proceeds of any property, rights, or benefits which may be sold or otherwise disposed of, upon such terms as he may prescribe) received, whether before or after the enactment of this act, by the United States in respect of claims of the United States against Germany on account of the awards of the Mixed Claims Commission.

(c) The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed, out of the funds in the special deposit account, subject to the provisions of subsection (d), and in the following order of priority—

(1) To make the payments of expenses of administration authorized by subsections (c) and (m) of section 4 or subsection (e) of this section;

(2) To make so much of each payment (in respect of an award of the Mixed Claims Commission authorized by subsection (b) of section 3, as is attributable to an award on account of death or personal injury, together with interest thereon as provided in subsection (c) of section 3;

(3) To make each payment (in respect of an award of the Mixed Claims Commission) authorized by subsection (b) of section 3, if the amount thereof is not payable under paragraph (2) of this subsection and does not exceed $100,000, and to pay interest thereon as provided in subsection (c) of section 3;

(4) To pay the amount of $100,000 in respect of each payment authorized by subsection (b) of section 3, if the amount of such authorized payment is in excess of $100,000 and is not payable in full under paragraph (2) of this subsection. No person shall be paid under this paragraph and paragraph (3) an amount in excess of $100,000 (exclusive of interest beginning January 1, 1928), irrespective of the number of awards made on behalf of such person;

(5) To make additional payments (in respect of awards of the Mixed Claims Commission) authorized by subsection (b) of section 3, in such amounts as will make the aggregate payments (authorized by such subsection) under this paragraph and paragraphs (2), (3), and (4) of this subsection equal to 80 per cent of the aggregate amount of all payments authorized by subsection (b) of section 3. Payments under this paragraph shall be prorated on the basis of the amount of the respective payments authorized by subsection (b) of section 3 and remaining unpaid;

(6) To pay amounts determined by the Secretary of the Treasury to be payable in respect of the tentative awards of the arbiter, in accordance with the provisions of subsection (s) of section 4;

(7) To pay to German nationals such amounts as will make the aggregate payments equal to 50 per cent of the amounts awarded under section 4. Payments authorized by this paragraph or paragraph (6) may, to the extent of funds available under the provisions of subsection (d) of this section, be made whether or not the payments under paragraphs (1) to (5), inclusive, of this subsection have been completed;

(8) To pay accrued interest upon the participating certificates evidencing the amounts invested by the Alien Property Custodian under subsection (a) of section 25 of the trading with the enemy act, as amended;

(9) To pay the accrued interest payable under subsection (c) of section 3 and subsection (h) of section 4;

(10) To make such payments as are necessary (A) to repay the amounts invested by the Alien Property Custodian under subsection (a) of section 25 of the trading with the enemy act, as amended, (B) to pay amounts equal to the difference between the aggregate payments (in respect of claims of German nationals) authorized by subsections (g) and (h) of section 4, and the amounts previously paid in respect thereof, and (C) to pay amounts equal to the difference between the aggregate payments (in respect of awards of the Mixed Claims Commission) authorized by subsections (b) and (c) of section 3, and the amounts previously paid in respect thereof. If funds available are not sufficient to make the total payments authorized by this paragraph, the amount of payments made from time to time shall be apportioned among the payments authorized under clauses (A), (B), and (C) according to the aggregate amount remaining unpaid under each clause;

(11) To make such payments as are necessary to repay the amount invested by the Alien Property Custodian under subsection (b) of section 25 of the trading with the enemy act, as amended; but the amount payable under this paragraph shall not exceed the aggregate amount allocated to the trusts described in subsection (c) of section 26 of such act;

(12) To pay into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts the amount of the awards of the Mixed Claims Commission to the United States, on its own behalf, on account of claims of the United States against Germany; and

(13) To pay into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts any funds remaining in the special deposit account after the payments authorized by paragraphs (1) to (12) have been completed.

(d) Fifty per cent of the amounts appropriated under the authority of section 4 shall be available for payments under paragraphs (6) and (7) of subsection (c) of this section and shall be available only for such payments until such time as the payments authorized by such paragraphs have been completed.

(e) The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to pay, from funds in the special deposit account, such amounts, not in excess of $25,000 per annum, as may be necessary for the payment of the expenses in carrying out the provisions of this section and sections 25 and 26 of the trading with the enemy act, as amended, including personal services at the seat of government.

(f) The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to invest and reinvest from time to time in bonds, notes, or certificates of indebtedness of the United States any of the funds in the special deposit account, and to deposit to the credit of such account the interest or other earnings thereon.

(g) There shall be deducted from the amounts first payable under this section to any American national in respect of any debt the amount, if any, paid by the Alien Property Custodian in respect of such debt which was not credited by the Mixed Claims Commission in making its award.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to say to my colleagues that I do not expect to contribute anything to the argument either for or against the bill. My main purpose in rising is to undertake to secure a little information from some member of the committee who can give it to me to clarify some uncertainty that has arisen with reference to the question of the amount of security in sight to guarantee, or reasonably assure, the payment of the amount that will be awarded to our nationals by the Mixed Claims Commission and the ultimate method of collection of these sums.

As I understand it—and if I am not correct I will thank the chairman to correct me—the Mixed Claims Commission is not a creature of Congress. It is a diplomatic forum set up between the representatives of Germany and the United States to attempt to adjust outside of Congress the amounts and conditions of settlement of these disputed items.

The report of the committee shows, at least it is estimated, that the aggregate of the amount which will ultimately be due American nationals as fixed by the Mixed Claims Commission will amount approximately to $186,000,000. It is also in the report that the amount to be reserved for ultimate payment of these claims is not, as a matter of fact, in sum sufficient to guarantee the payment of this amount.

In other words, the payment of at least a part of these claims is based on certain contingencies to arise in the future. For instance, you are depending on a certain amount annually, to be collected under the reparations agreement from the German Government, to be applied to the payment of the claims of the American nationals.

It was suggested in argument by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] that, although it may not be entirely probable, it is at least entirely possible that in the course of a few years there may be some substantial breach in these relations—I do not mean a breach of good feeling but some financial change, because Germany is contending for it.

So there is a contingency by which all amounts due the American nationals are not assured by the terms of the bill.

I want to say further that there are a number of claims pending before the Mixed Claims Commission amounting in the aggregate to thirty or forty million dollars. My information is that some of these claims are based on sabotage claimed by American nationals during the period of our neutrality, and before we declared war against Germany for the wanton and ruthless destruction of American property. It is assumed, of course, before the Mixed Claims Commission gets through that it will adjudicate all the claims now pending before it.

I want to ask the chairman of the committee if there is anything in the convention establishing it that makes it sure that the Mixed Claims Commission will function until all claims have been adjudicated and whether or not there is any limit of time for the functioning of that commission?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. There is no limit of time. The Mixed Claims Commission will continue to function until they are through adjusting claims, which will not be very long.

Mr. BANKHEAD. That brings up another thing that is in my mind. If we are to adopt the policy of this bill—and in the main I agree with its terms—I think we ought to endeavor, if humanly possible, to safeguard every possible contingency that may arise with reference to these conditions, that the time may not come in the future when we will have a repetition of the Alabama claims, the French spoliation claims, and other claims which will hang like a cloud over the Congress of the United States generation after generation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I ask for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BANKHEAD. And the very fact, as stated in the report of this committee and the answers to the interrogatories I submitted to the chairman of the committee, demonstrate that such a situation will be possible.

Now, my thought was—I do not propose to offer any amendment, for I realize it is too late now, with the temper of the House and the general situation of this bill, to hope to amend it in any substantial degree, but this is only the beginning of the passage of this bill, for the other body must act on it, too—it seems to me that there should be some consideration of what I have suggested with reference to the certainty of security of the ultimate payment of every just claim—that it ought to be fixed by the terms of this bill and not left to conjecture. I hope that the Senate will so amend the bill as to provide not only that the claims commission may be requested to continue their work until all claims are adjusted, but to fix expeditious and certain methods of collection for American claimants. If I had my way about it, I would reserve more than 20 per cent of the amount of German property that we hold in order to assure that those conditions will be carried out; but I do indulge the hope that in view of the fact that there are a number of claims of large amounts still unadjusted, in view of the fact, as I believe, that these bills will be paid in the order of their filing with the Treasury Department, that we do not in the ultimate passage of this bill leave this question open in any particular for future Congresses to help to determine.

An expression was used here—a poker term—about a jack pot. With my very limited knowledge of that game, I say that when the final show-down comes on this whole propostion I do not want the American nationals to have to shove the "stack" over to the German people, when, as a matter of fact, America and the American nationals hold the best hand. That is exactly what I have in mind in offering these suggestions.

Mr. O'CONNELL. Does the gentleman from Alabama contend that he does not know what a jack pot is?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Oh, no; I know what a jack pot is.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] has inquired with reference to the final allowances of these claims by the Mixed Claims Commission. The committee did not deem it advisable to put an express time limit on the claims commission, but the committee did consider that the claims commission ought to get through in six months at the very least, and perhaps before that time.

With reference to the absolute guaranty of these claims, which have been allowed in favor of Americans, I say frankly to the gentleman that it is not in the bill. There is no absolute certainty that they will be paid in accordance with the terms of the bill, because part of it is dependent upon the payment by the Germans of the reparation allowance. But there is this. The gentleman would want to hold out more of the German property, while the gentleman from Georgia objects because we are keeping out so much. We have to strike a medium somewhere between. I think the House would be very much opposed to paying the Germans in full, as advocated by the gentleman from Georgia, and then leaving the American claimants to collect their claims as best they could, or making an appropriation out of the Treasury for their payment.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. In view of this declaration of policy contained in section 2, I ask this question: In the event that ultimately the structure of your payments should collapse, and the American nationals should not be paid, does the gentleman not regard this declaration of policy which we have just adopted as an absolute commitment in principle that if that contingency arises and they do not collect out of Germany, then the Government of the United States is an insurer of the payment of these claims?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Oh, that is taken care of in another part of the bill.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. But whether or not it is written in the bill, is it not the square thing for the American Government to pay these claims in that event. If I should be a Member of Congress when such a contingency arises, I know that I would vote for it. I intend to vote for this bill, but we have a fund in hand now, and if you turn this fund back, then I hope to stay here long enough so that if these American claimants are not paid I can vote to pay those claims. We have got to treat our people right.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. But we are not proposing to turn this all over to the Germans.

Mr. BUTLER. But you are reserving only 20 per cent.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. And the unallocated interest, which amounts to nearly 40 per cent.

Mr. BUTLER. But we have this thing in hand now, and we ought to keep it.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Then, we are reserving part of the ship money, which belongs to the Germans and not to the American taxpayer as some one suggested. We expect to reserve a part of that, and all together we think we have the matter fixed so that everyone will receive their money. In all events we have it fixed so that the American claimants on account of death losses will get their money at once, and that the Germans and the Americans will get the greater part of their claims paid, and then we will have done something with this great mass of money which we have in our hands and have done nothing with for so long.

Mr. BUTLER. But it is desirable to keep enough back so that the American claimants will be secure.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the section. This bill comes from the Committee on Ways and Means, but it is a bureau bill just the same. It has the Ogden Mills earmarks upon it, just the same, and I can not go as far as our big-hearted friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] who says that he is voting for the bill merely because he has confidence in the committee.

Whenever a trustee takes charge of property for a cestui que trust he charges the trust estate up with all expenses of handling the trust. That is the general proposition sanctioned by law in our courts, which is followed everywhere; yet in this case we are forcing the innocent American taxpayers to pay all of the enormous expense of handling this alien property.

Mr. BUTLER. But if we turn this thing back, are we not morally responsible to make good?

Mr. BLANTON. But we have made the American taxpayers pay all of the expenses of handling it, and my friend knows how many scandals have been connected with the handling of this property during lo, these many years. I am not willing to charge the American taxpayers up with all these expenses, plus the graft scandals that have been connected with this Alien Property Custodian's office, and I am one here who is going to vote against this bill.

I am in accord with the general proposition of restoring to others that which is their just due, but I am in accord with only part of this bill. I am in accord with a number of the principles enunciated by my friend from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER], but I am not in accord with charging the American taxpayers with all of the extravagance and waste and everything else that has gone with the handling of this property for the German aliens.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. We ought to have charged the German aliens, the wrongs of whose country forced us to take this property in charge, with the expenses of handling their trust property, if you please. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. If the charges are true, which I am not granting——

Mr. BLANTON. Is the gentleman denying there has been scandal?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Oh, no.

Mr. BLANTON. Is the gentleman denying that there has been waste and extravagance?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I do not know whether there has been or not.

Mr. BLANTON. Is the gentleman denying it has cost the taxpayers millions of dollars?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Then the gentleman is not yielding?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; I yield. I was trying to find out where the gentleman stood.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I am trying to find out where the gentleman from Texas stands.

Mr. BLANTON. It is mighty easy always to find out where the gentleman from Texas stands. I announce my position on every bill that comes up in the House, both on the floor and by my vote.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman from Texas is claiming there has been some extravagance in the management of this money and he would charge it to Germany. Is that the gentleman's theory?

Mr. BLANTON. If the Alien Property Custodian has been extravagant, it ought not to be charged against innocent American taxpayers but ought to be charged against the property that he handled. He has been handling it for the German aliens. It has been a favor to them to take charge of the property and a favor to them to turn it back, because all other countries of the world confiscate it, and if there has been expense and extravagance it ought to come out of their pockets and not out of the pockets of the American taxpayer.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I will.

Mr. TILSON. Do I understand the gentleman that because there has been some waste and extravagance in the keeping of this property for 10 years instead of returning it to its owners the gentleman would hold it indefinitely so that there might be more waste?

Mr. BLANTON. No; I would have turned it back years ago, but I would like to charge up all the waste and extravagance and the expense of handling it and turning it back to the estate of these aliens. That is as far as I would go. I would not make our innocent American taxpayers suffer for the wrongs of others.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

RETURN TO GERMAN NATIONALS OF PROPERTY HELD BY ALIEN PROPERTY CUSTODIAN

SEC. 9. Subsection (b) of section 9 of the trading with the enemy act, as amended, is amended by striking out the punctuation at the end of paragraph (11) and inserting in lieu thereof a semicolon and the word "or" and inserting after paragraph (11) the following new paragraphs:

"(12) A partnership, association, or other unincorporated body of individuals, or a corporation, and was entirely owned at such time by subjects or citizens of nations, states, or free cities other than Austria or Hungary or Austria-Hungary and is so owned at the time of the return of its money or other property hereunder, and has filed the written consent provided for in subsection (m); or

"(13) A partnership, association, or other unincorporated body of individuals, having its principal place of business within any country other than Austria, Hungary, or Austria-Hungary, or a corporation organized or incorporated within any country other than Austria, Hungary, or Austria-Hungary, and that more than 50 per cent of the interest or voting power in any such partnership, association, other unincorporated body of individuals, or corporation, was at such time, and is at the time of the return of any money or other property, vested in citizens or subjects of nations, states, or free cities other than Austria, Hungary, or Austria-Hungary, and that the written consent provided for in subsection (m) has been filed; or

"(14) An individual who at such time was a citizen or subject of Germany or who, at the time of the return of any money or other property, is a citizen or subject of Germany or is not a citizen or subject of any nation, state, or free city, and that the written consent provided for in subsection (m) has been filed; or

"(15) The Austro-Hungarian Bank, except that the money or other property thereof shall be returned only to the liquidators thereof, and only if such liquidators give a bond, in a penal sum and with sureties satisfactory to the President or to the court, as the case may be, conditioned that they will redeliver to the Alien Property Custodian all such money or other property distributable to the Government of Austria, Hungary, or Austria-Hungary; or

"(16) An individual who at the time of the return of such money or other property is not a citizen or subject of Austria, Hungary, or Austria-Hungary, and that the written consent provided for in subsection (m) has been filed, and that no suit or proceeding against the United States or any agency thereof is pending in respect of such return, and that such individual has filed a written waiver renouncing on behalf of himself, his heirs, successors, and assigns any claim based upon the fact that at the time of such return he was in fact entitled to such return under any other provision of this act."

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 27, line 4, beginning with the word "that," strike out through the word "and," in line 10.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I understand this is entirely agreeable to the gentlemen on the other side. It is merely a perfecting amendment in view of the fact that Austria-Hungary matters will subsequently be taken up, and it strikes out what is not at all necessary now, and this is a complicated provision, anyway.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. There is an old adage that people who live in glass houses should not throw stones. It was never better illustrated than a few minutes ago when the gentleman from Texas took the floor and criticized certain features of the bill and asserted that the American taxpayers' money was being spent extravagantly and wastefully. I think that is substantially the remark he made. I agree with him; we should save the money of the American taxpayers. We should not be wasteful and extravagant with it, and it is therefore for that reason that I desire to call attention to the extravagance and waste of the taxpayers' money by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON]. Under an abuse of the leave-to-print privilege which is extended to Members, inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD dated February 14, 1927, 87 pages of closely printed material, practically all of which had been previously printed either in the RECORD or in committee hearings. It affected a case which had been closed and which was of no interest to the taxpayers of the country or to any citizen of this Union.

I was astonished when that RECORD came to my home and I realized the abuse that had been perpetrated upon the taxpayers in the form of waste and extravagance by the gentleman from Texas. I took pains to inquire as to the amount of the expenditure that had been caused to the American taxpayers by the extravagance and waste of the gentleman from Texas, and I found that that extension, covering a third of that large print of the RECORD, cost the American taxpayers in extravagance and waste the enormous sum of $4,670.16.

Therefore I say that a man who lives in a glass house ought to be more careful how he throws stones, because they may come back to break his own house.

Further than that, I want to venture the statement that if the gentleman from Texas had been paying his own bills, rather than calling upon the Treasury of the United States and taking it from the taxpayers' money, that document would never have been printed. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized.

Mr. BLANTON. I am glad I got under one gentleman's skin.

The gentleman from Massachusetts refers to my report on Frederick A. Fenning, one of the bellwethers of the gentleman's party, who by his own President was placed in authority here in Washington as a commissioner of the Government; a man who for 25 years had robbed the veterans of the country, the veterans of the Civil War, out in St. Elizabeths; the veterans of the Spanish-American War out in St. Elizabeths; and the poor shell-shocked veterans of the World War, 900 of whom had been incarcerated in St. Elizabeths without law and without reason.

Oh, I was after the gentleman's bellwether when I went after Mr. Fenning, and I leave it to my colleagues here to say if for four months I did not work 18 hours a day, night and day, before I was able to bring enough evidence before our committees to dislodge that man who had been robbing the soldiers. I was working without stint. I worked when it meant the loss of health. I spent several thousand dollars all together out of my own pocket before I got through with it; and if you will write to your Public Printer he will tell you that I have paid to the Government Printing Office over $11,000 in cash for reprints of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to send out. To my constituents, to let them know? No. I did not need to send reprints to them. They know my record here.

I have sent reprints of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD into every State of this Union, to thinking minds, to try to remedy existing conditions here; and because I called attention to the waste and extravagance and the graft that had been in this Alien Property Custodian's Office—one of the gentleman's Republican offices, if you please, and I was getting under the Republican's hide, if you please—he could not stand it, and he had to get up here and engage in personal abuse of me. I leave it to my colleagues that the printing of that report stands as a valuable permanent record here of the infamy of a man who would rob soldiers.

Among the many cases I cited in such report there was a poor woman in Connecticut who gave three sons to the war. Two were left in France; one came back shell shocked. He was placed in St. Elizabeths on the motion of the gentleman's protégé, Mr. Fenning. He was confined there as of unsound mind; he was robbed there. His $11,000 estate was taken over, and Mr. Fenning, having put him there as a crazy man, after handling his estate several years, went into court and got an order to let that poor fellow of unsound mind make a will disinheriting his own mother, upon the allegation of Mr. Fenning that the mother was not a moral character. I brought some of the best people in Connecticut here, who testified before the Judiciary Committee that the poor woman, after giving her three sons to the war, was forced to take in washing to make a living, and that she was a splendid, moral woman. She had been robbed of her son and of his estate by the man concerning whose case I filed the report for the information of my colleagues. The gentleman from Massachusetts does not want that put in the RECORD. He strains at an expenditure he estimates at $4,000, and yet he pays no attention to the waste of $400,000,000. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired. The pro forma amendment will be withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 10. (a) Subsection (d) of section 9 of the trading with the enemy act, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"(d) Whenever a person, deceased, would have been entitled, if living, to the return of his money or other property hereunder, then his legal representative may proceed for the return of such money or other property as provided in subsection (a) hereof, and such money or other property may be returned to such legal representative without requiring the appointment of an administrator, or an ancillary administrator, by a court in the United States, or to any such ancillary administrator for distribution directly to the persons entitled thereto: Provided, However, That the President or the court, as the case may be, before granting such relief shall impose such conditions by way of security or otherwise, as the President or the court, respectively, shall deem sufficient to insure that such legal representative, administrator, or ancillary administrator will redeliver to the Alien Property Custodian such portion of the money or other property so received by him as shall be distributable to any person not eligible as a claimant under subsection (a), (b), or (n) hereof."

(b) Subsection (e) of section 9 of the trading with the enemy act, as amended, is amended by striking out the period at the end thereof and inserting a semicolon and the following: "nor shall a debt be allowed under this section unless notice of the claim has been filed, or application therefor has been made, prior to the date of the enactment of the settlement of war claims act of 1928."

(c) Subsection (g) of section 9 of the trading with the enemy act is amended to read as follows:

"(g) The legal representative of a person, deceased, whose money or other property has been conveyed, transferred, assigned, delivered, or paid to the Alien Property Custodian or seized by him hereunder and held by him or by the Treasurer of the United States, may (if not entitled to proceed under subsection (d) of this section) proceed under subsection (a) for the recovery of any interest, right, or title in any such money or other property which has, by reason of the death of such person, become the interest, right, or title of a citizen of the United States, unless such citizenship was acquired through naturalization proceedings in which the declaration of intention was filed after November 11, 1918, or has become, prior to the enactment of the settlement of war claims act of 1928, the interest, right, or title of a person eligible as a claimant under subsection (a), (b), or (n) of this section. Such legal representative shall give a bond, in a penal sum and with sureties satisfactory to the President or the court, as the case may be, conditioned that he will redeliver to the Alien Property Custodian all such money or other property not distributed to such citizen or person so eligible, or, if deceased, to his heirs or legal representatives."

Mr. SIROVICH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. SIROVICH. Mr. Chairman and fellow Members of the House, when Rome was mistress of the world and her nation the mightiest of its time it was the custom of every Roman citizen to carry upon his standard the three Latin words "Civis Romanus sum," "I am a Roman citizen," and woe indeed to that nation or to that race that would dare to desecrate the rights and privileges of Roman citizenship. Ancient Rome has fallen into the ashes of time. To-day the mightiest Nation of the world is America. In the hearts of every one of us there pulsates the paraphrase of the Roman sentiment "Civis Americanus sum," "I am an American citizen," which is the greatest heritage that can be bequeathed to us and which we in turn can hand down to the generations that are to be.

In this historic Hall, the great House of Representatives, is at the present time being enacted a great American drama. Ten years ago we declared war against the Imperial German Government, that symbolized autocracy, tyrannical monarchy, and imperialism. Arrayed against it were the forces of democracy, with liberty and freedom of opportunity. Democracy triumphed.

To-day we behold the magnanimous spirit of our beloved American Nation extending its hand of good fellowship to its great sister Republic of Germany.

The bitterness of war, hatred, and rancor has now disappeared and in its stead we find the great humanitarian heart and soul of America, desirous of doing justice to the nationals of Germany and the nationals of America who suffered untold hardships in the loss of life, limb, and property when they were caught in the whirlpool of war.

Through this bill that is being sponsored by the two great political parties, the Republican and the Democratic Parties, we are going to do justice to those whose cries for help have been unanswered during the last 10 years, during which time they have suffered from the confiscation of their properties and the destruction of life that is so near and dear to them.

It is a great privilege, indeed, for me to pay the tribute of my regard to that genial, generous, kind-hearted leader of the Ways and Means Committee [Mr. GREEN of Iowa] for sponsoring this measure, in which he has been so ably assisted by that eloquent and venerable statesman from Ohio, Congressman

BURTON, reinforced by that militant, aggressive, and versatile legislator, Mr. CHINDBLOM, of Illinois. While from the great Democratic Party, to which I have the honor to belong, have been heard the earnest, sincere, and enlightened words of Congressman OLDFIELD, of Arkansas, in cooperation with the fiery sentiments expressed by my confrère, Mr. COLLIER, of Mississippi, as well as the scholarly opinion of Mr. RAYBURN, of Texas. Here we find the symbolization of true Americanism, as Republicans and Democrats have united and cooperated together to put through this bill to vindicate to the world that America entered this war not for conquest but for humanitarian ideals that would make the world safe for democracy. [Applause.]

Through the passage of this alien property bill we are not assisting the Imperial Government of Germany, but we are coming to the rescue of Germany that has given to the world such eminent names as Goethe, Schiller, Heine, Lessing, Kant, Schopenhauer, Erlich, Hahnemann, Wassermann, Koch, Einstein, Wagner, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Holbein, and Karl Marx, men whose names are famous in the rôles of science, art, literature, philosophy, medicine, economics, music, and painting. To the nation that has produced such wonderful scholars America is proud to welcome them in the forefront of the civilized nations of the world. [Applause.]

Another reason for my voting for this alien property bill, which provides for the settlement of claims of American nationals against Germany and of German nationals against the United States, for the legitimate return of all property of German nationals held by the Alien Property Custodian and for an equitable apportionment among all claimants of funds due to them, is the fact that the Republic of Germany has treated its racial minorities with the most magnanimous, humane, tender, and sympathetic consideration. Mr. Chairman and my colleagues in the House, I hereby serve notice upon the membership of this historic body that when the claims of Hungary and Rumania shall come before this House I shall raise my voice in mighty protest not to grant to these nations any consideration from this great Republic of ours, because of the outrageous treatment that Rumania and Hungary are according its racial minorities, and shall arraign Hungary and Rumania before the bar of the public opinion and the conscience of our country as nations that are outlaws in the family of humanity and unworthy of any consideration, because of the inhuman and barbarous treatment they have accorded to the Jewish citizens of those nations.

In this the twentieth century of civilization the time has come when we Americans, liberty loving as we are, shall raise our voices, through the membership of this House, that religious intolerance and religious bigotry practiced through pogroms, massacres, and persecutions must cease. In the name of the people of the United States and in behalf of the fourteenth congressional district of New York, which I have the honor to represent in Congress, I demand that the Hungarian and Rumanian Governments grant equal political protection to all of its subjects under its jurisdiction and, above all, at once stop the barbarous and cruel treatment of innocent Jewish citizens and protect their life and property, in accordance with the covenants of existing treaties between the Kingdoms of Hungary and Rumania and the Government of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to incorporate in my remarks a resolution I have received from the Jewish Veterans of the Wars of the Republic.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SIROVICH. The resolution is as follows:

Resolution adopted by national executive committee of the Jewish Veterans of Wars of the Republic at a special meeting held on December 18, 1927, at the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel in New York City

Whereas our good comrade, Hon. WILLIAM I. SIROVICH, has presented in the first session of the Seventieth Congress a resolution (H. J. Res. 91) calling upon President Calvin Coolidge to intercede in the name of humanity against the outrageous treatment of Rumanian minorities, and failing in that to bring about the abrogation of the treaties between the Empire of Rumania and the Government of the United States; and

Whereas the historical policy of the United States enunciated by that great American Secretary of State, John Hay, resulted in our abrogation of all treaty relations with the Russian Empire because of the barbarous brutalities under the régime of the late Czar: Be it therefore

Resolved, That the national executive committee of the Jewish Veterans of Wars of the Republic, whose muster rolls embrace the American sailors and soldiers of the Jewish faith who served under the colors of the Nation during the American Revolution, the War of 1812, the Mexican War, the Civil War, the war with Spain, the Philippine insurrection, the Boxer uprising in China, and the World War, in special meeting assembled this 18th day of December, 1927, at the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel in New York City, do most heartily commend our good comrade, Doctor SIROVICH, for his efforts to further the cause of humanity, and do therefore call upon him to make similar representations on behalf of the Hungarian minorities, who are to-day the victims of the same atrocious, barbarous, and inhuman treatment under the Hungarian Government; and be it further

Resolved, That we request our distinguished Secretary of State, Mr. Kellogg, to proceed immediately to collect the Rumanian and Hungarian debts to this country, which are now due or past due, and that we withdraw all credits from these barbaric countries until by their actions they prove themselves worthy of intercourse with civilized peoples; and therefore be it also

Resolved, That we send copies of these resolutions to the President of the United States, the Vice President of the United States, the Secretary of State, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and the Senate of the United States.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 12. Section 9 of the trading with the enemy act, as amended, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsections:

"(m) No money or other property shall be returned under paragraph (12), (13), (14), or (16) of subsection (b) or under subsection (n) unless the person entitled thereto files a written consent to a postponement of the return of an amount equal to 20 per cent of the aggregate value of such money or other property (at the time, as nearly as may be, of the return), as determined by the Alien Property Custodian, and the investment of such amount in accordance with the provisions of section 25. Such amount shall be deducted from the money to be returned to such person, so far as possible, and the balance shall be deducted from the proceeds of the sale (in accordance with the provisions of section 12) of so much of the property as may be necessary, unless such person pays the balance to the Alien Property Custodian, except that no property shall be so sold prior to the expiration of six years from the date of the enactment of the settlement of war claims act of 1928 without the consent of the person entitled thereto. The amounts so deducted shall be returned to the persons entitled thereto as provided in subsection (e) of section 25.

"(n) In the case of property consisting of stock or other interest in any corporation, association, company, or trust, or bonded, or other indebtedness thereof, evidenced by certificates of stock or by bonds or by other certificates of interest therein or indebtedness thereof, or consisting of dividends or interest or other accruals thereon, where the right, title, and interest in the property (but not the actual certificate or bond or other certificate of interest or indebtedness) was conveyed, transferred, assigned, delivered, or paid to the Alien Property Custodian, or seized by him, if the President determines that the owner thereof or of any interest therein has acquired such ownership by assignment, transfer, or sale of such certificate or bond or other certificate of interest or indebtedness (it being the intent of this subsection that such assignment, transfer, or sale shall not be deemed invalid hereunder by reason of such conveyance, transfer, assignment, delivery, or payment to the Alien Property Custodian or seizure by him) and that the written consent provided in subsection (m) has been filed, then the President may make in respect of such property an order of the same character, upon the same conditions, and with the same effect as in cases provided for in subsection (b), including the benefits of subsection (c).

"(o) The provisions of paragraph (12), (13), or (14) of subsection (b), or of subsection (m) or (n) of this section, and (except to the extent therein provided) the provisions of paragraph (16) of subsection (b), shall not be construed as diminishing or extinguishing any right under any other provision of this act in force immediately prior to the enactment of the settlement of war claims act of 1928.

"(p) If a person whose money or other property was conveyed, transferred, assigned, delivered, or paid to the Alien Property Custodian or seized by him hereunder, dies (or, in the case of a corporation, association, or partnership, if its existence has terminated) the Alien Property Custodian shall transfer the money or other property in the trust to trusts in the names of the persons (including the German Government and members of the former ruling family) who have succeeded to the claim or interest of such person; and the provisions of subsection (a) of this section relating to the collection of a debt (by order of the President or of a court) out of money or other property held by the Alien Property Custodian or the Treasurer of the United States shall be applicable to the debts of such successor and any such debt may be collected out of the money or other property in any of such trusts if not returnable under subsection (a) or (g) of this section."

Mr. EATON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. EATON: On page 32, line 9, after the figures "25" and before the period, insert the following: "or until all damages suffered and all expenditures made or incurred by any purchaser from the Alien Property Custodian in defending or establishing title to the property so purchased shall have been paid to such purchaser out of the proceeds of the sale of such property. The amount of such damage suffered and all expenditures made or incurred by such purchaser shall be determined by the arbiter upon evidence submitted to him and under such rules and regulations as the said arbiter shall prescribe."

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. EATON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I have not taken any of your time in any discussion of this bill, but I now bring to your attention a matter of vital importance to many of our American taxpayers and business men. While I do not wish to interfere with the wave of sweetness and good will which is rolling over this august assemblage at the present time, I still feel we owe something to the American taxpayer, and I present to you a concrete illustration, which is better than any speech I can make, setting forth what I mean.

Before the war and for years since a great German institution has been conducting an industrial and financial business in Germany. Before the war they had a branch in this country, which did a great business here and throughout the world. The name of that firm is the Orenstein & Koppel-Arthur Koppel Aktiengesellschaft. They actually did business under that name.

When the war came on their German business outside of Germany was shut down and the American branch carried it on. They did an enormous business in and with this country, with the Allies, and with others. Then we went into the war and their property in this country was seized and handed over to the Alien Property Custodian. He advertised for buyers; bids were made, and on September 12, 1918, an American company known as the Koppel Industrial Car & Equipment Co., of Pennsylvania, purchased this property, its good will, its name, its patents, and its rights for $1,312,000 in cash. Then they started to do business, and as soon as the armistice was signed they were blocked at every point in this country and throughout the world by the original Koppel Co. in Germany.

Take one illustration: The American Koppel Industrial Car & Equipment Co. sold $15,000 worth of car equipment in Mexico. Immediately the original German company appeared on the scene and got an injunction against them for using the name of Koppel in Mexico. The American company went through all the courts of that country and received a unanimous decision from the Mexican Supreme Court in their favor. That lawsuit cost them $20,000. Meanwhile, the company to whom they had agreed to deliver the goods sued them because they had not delivered the goods, so at the present time this American Koppel Industrial Car & Equipment Co. has had to pay out over $50,000 to defend a right for which it paid $1,312,000 in cash.

The American Koppel Car & Industrial Equipment Co. received from the Alien Property Custodian in Washington, under date of February 19, 1921, a statement setting forth that they had bought the name, paid for it, and were entitled to the use of it. I am going to ask unanimous consent to insert in my remarks this letter, which is not very long.

So I ask consideration of this amendment on the part of the House. Let us not forget that we are still in America, and that our American people still have some rights; and let us see to it that our vote here on this amendment will establish the right of giving to these people who have spent their good money in good faith for these properties some protection without being robbed continuously in the courts of the world.

This is the whole story. The American company has no recourse here. They can not enter suit in this country because the original Koppel company is in Germany and has no property here. So I ask you to consider my amendment as proper and necessary and fair, and I hope the distinguished chairman of the committee and the other members of the committee will give heed to this request for relief.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New Jersey has expired.

Mr. EATON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting this short letter.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 19, 1921.

KOPPEL INDUSTRIAL CAR & EQUIPMENT CO.,
Koppel, Pa.

GENTLEMEN: On September 12, 1918, the Alien Property Custodian sold to the Koppel Industrial Car & Equipment Co., at public auction for $1,312,000, the property of Orenstein & Koppel-Arthur Koppel Aktiengeselischaft, registered under the laws of Pennsylvania as a foreign corporation, and its subsidiaries, including the Pennsylvania Car & Manufacturing Co.

The deed and bill of sale is dated December 24, 1918, and conveyed inter alia all and singular the property, real and personal, tangible and intangible rights, claims, titles, interests, effects, and assets of every kind and description whatsoever of the said Orenstein & Koppel-Arthur Koppel Aktiengesellschaft and all incidents and appurtenances thereto, including the business as a going concern and the good will possessed, held, and enjoyed by, in the name of, or for, or on behalf of the companies whose properties were sold, and each of them.

The deed also conveyed "any and all registered trade-marks, trade names, and the like * * * belonging to, owned, possessed, held, used or enjoyed by, in the name of, or for, or on behalf of, the said companies and concerns, and each and all of them."

By your letter of February 17, 1921, to me it has been called to my attention that proceedings have been brought against the Koppel Industrial Car & Equipment Co. by the Orenstein & Koppel-Arthur Koppel Aktiengesellschaft, or its agents, interfering with or to restrain in certain foreign countries, including Mexico and the Argentine Republic, your use of the word "Koppel," not only as your trade name or trade-mark, but as part of your trade name or trade-mark.

As requested in your letter of the 17th instant, I wish to assure you—

(1) That it is the judgment of the Alien Property Custodian that the Koppel Industrial Car & Equipment Co., under its deed of conveyance from the Alien Property Custodian, acquired the right to use in foreign countries the trade name and trade-mark "Koppel" and any other trade-marks, registered and/or unregistered, used by the American business of the Orenstein & Koppel-Arthur Koppel Aktiengesellschaft and the Pennsylvania Car & Manufacturing Co., an American subsidiary of the German company, in the same way and to the same extent as had been or was enjoyed by the American business of the Orenstein & Koppel-Arthur Koppel Aktiengesellschaft and by the Pennsylvania Car & Manufacturing Co., an American subsidiary of the German company, as evidenced by shipments made by either of them from the United States to foreign countries prior to the war between the United States and Germany.

(2) That it is the judgment of the Alien Property Custodian that the Orenstein & Koppel-Arthur Koppel Aktiengesellschaft should be required, before any of the proceeds of the sale of its property by the Alien Property Custodian are returned to it or to any one in its behalf.

(3) To acknowledge, in writing, to the Koppel Industrial Car & Equipment Co. and the Pennsylvania Car & Manufacturing Co. their right to use in foreign countries the trade name and trade-mark "Koppel" and other trade-marks and trade names, registered and/or unregistered, of the Orenstein & Koppel-Arthur Koppel Aktiengesellschaft to the same extent as was enjoyed by the American business of the Germany company and by the Pennsylvania Car & Manufacturing Co. at the time they were sold to the Koppel Industrial Car & Equipment Co. by the Alien Property Custodian, as evidenced by shipments made by the American business of the Orenstein & Koppel-Arthur Koppel Aktiengesellschaft and by the Pennsylvania Car & Manufacturing Co. from the United States to foreign countries prior to the war between the United States and Germany, and to this end to execute and deliver to the Koppel Industrial Car & Equipment Co. such instruments properly legalized and in such form as for this purpose may be required by the laws of the various foreign countries.

(b) To reimburse the Koppel Industrial Car & Equipment Co. its reasonable expenses expended protecting its rights and in defending in foreign countries suits and proceedings brought or instituted against it and/or the Pennsylvania Car & Manufacturing Co. in foreign countries by the Orenstein & Koppel-Arthur Koppel Aktiengesellschaft to restrain and/or prevent and/or interfering with the use and enjoyment by the Koppel Industrial Car & Equipment Co. and/or the Pennsylvania Car & Manufacturing Co. of the trade-marks and trade names used and enjoyed by the American business of the Orenstein & Koppel-Arthur Koppel Aktiengesellschaft and the Pennsylvania Car & Manufacturing Co. prior to the war between the United States and Germany.

I have executed this letter in duplicate and have attached one copy to the trust file in this case. I may further add that I have discussed this matter with Attorney General Palmer, formerly Alien Property Custodian when this sale was made, and he is in accord and indorses these findings.

Yours truly,

(Signed) FRANCIS P. GARVAN,
Alien Property Custodian.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I would not make this point of order if I thought this claim was meritorious. People sometimes buy lawsuits. These people got just exactly what they contracted for, and they got into some trouble as a result of it. We gave the matter careful consideration in the committee.

I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman, this amendment is not germane to the bill in any respect. This is a bill to provide for the settlement of certain claims of American nationals against Germany and of German nationals against the United States and the ultimate return of German property. In short, it is a bill for the payment of American claims and of German claims which are specially provided for in the bill. The amendment is for the payment of some damages by the Alien Property Custodian, which are claimed to have been suffered by some parties after they came in possession of some property sold by the Alien Property Custodian. I think the amendment is not germane to anything in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New Jersey desire to discuss the point of order?

Mr. EATON. Mr. Chairman, I do not feel competent to discuss a point of order against the distinguished judge and lawyer from Iowa, Mr. GREEN. I do not know whether this amendment is germane, but I know one thing—it is not German; it is American. [Laughter.] Whether we are going to strain at a gnat and swallow a camel remains for this House to decide. What I want is to see these American people who spent their good money and bought a thing in good faith, guaranteed by the custodian, get a square deal, and I hope the gentleman will not be so meticulous in his objections as to make it impossible to extend relief even to American citizens at this time of good will.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I regret I shall have to insist on my point of order. These gentlemen bought at a small price very valuable property and came off well enough.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. MAPES). The amendment, it seems to the Chair, attempts to bring into consideration an entirely new subject. The amendment covers the rights of purchasers. The bill has to do with the rights of German claimants or American claimants only, whose property has been damaged or seized. It seems to the Chair the amendment comes within the rule relating to germaneness, which provides that an amendment should not embrace a subject foreign to the bill. The Chair therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. LUCE. I move to strike out the last word in order to inquire of the chairman or some other member of the committee in regard to paragraph (m) on page 32, and to ask if this paragraph contemplates a contingency under which some or all of 20 per cent will not eventually be returned to the German nationals. Is the postponement of the payment of 20 per cent made in contemplation of such a contingency?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. No; the expectation is it will all be returned.

Mr. LUCE. The gentleman speaks of an expectation——

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. We think it is a fairly reasonable certainty that it will be returned.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LUCE. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The reason for the retention of the 20 per cent is to make possible the scheme of payment involved here; or to be precise, in order to create the special deposit fund out of which the smaller claims may be immediately paid.

Mr. LUCE. That I had gathered from reading the report and from the debate.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. This particular paragraph is placed in here to put all German claimants upon a parity so that all of them will contribute the 20 per cent to the special deposit fund and all will be subject to the postponement of the 20 per cent.

Mr. LUCE. I still find myself unable to be in position to explain to my constituents why 20 per cent is retained, and I would return to my original question. Is there in contemplation any contingency under which the whole 20 per cent will not ultimately be returned?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. There is not.

Mr. LUCE. Then why do you retain it, if there is no such contingency in sight?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. In order to provide an immediate fund out of which the smaller claimants, both German nationals and American nationals, may be paid at once. The larger claims of both German and American nationals will ultimately be paid as well, but their payment will be deferred in order to make possible the application of payments under the Dawes plan into the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. LUCE. Has the committee any computation indicating how long it is likely to be before that 20 per cent may be returned?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. At the end of the report there is a computation of 25 years for the payment of all claims, both German and American.

Mr. LUCE. Then it is possible this 20 per cent may be held for 25 years?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. It is.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. A small portion of it.

Mr. LUCE. Does the committee think it of importance to carry the more trifling amounts of this sort over that period?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The payment of all of these claims depends on the creation of the special deposit fund. You can not make fish of some and fowl of others.

Mr. LUCE. How am I going to be able to explain to my constituents when I get back home why we are holding back any of this money, why we take it back from these claimants, instead of taking it out of the Treasury as an advance?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I will make the same reply as I did to the gentleman from Georgia. I myself would prefer to have all German property returned immediately, but it can not be done. You can not pass that kind of a bill. I invited the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cox] to offer a motion to recommit and test the temper of the House. We are satisfied that it can not be done, and so are the parties in interest here, nearly all of whom have consented to this arrangement.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 13. The trading with the enemy act, as amended, is amended by adding thereto the following new sections:

"SEC. 26. (a) The Alien Property Custodian shall allocate among the various trusts the funds in the 'unallocated interest fund' (as defined in section 28). Such allocation shall be made under regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury and shall be based upon the average rate of earnings (determined by the Secretary of the Treasury) on the total amounts deposited under section 12.

"(b) The Alien Property Custodian, when the allocation has been made, is authorized and directed to pay to persons entitled, in accordance with a final decision of a court of the United States or of the District of Columbia, or of an opinion of the Attorney General, to the distribution of any portion of such unallocated interest fund, the amount allocated to his trust.

"(c) In the case of persons entitled, under paragraph (12), (13), (14), or (16) of subsection (b) of section 9, to such return, and in the case of persons who would be entitled to such return thereunder if all such money or property had not been returned under paragraph (9) or (10) of such subsection, and in the case of persons entitled to such return under subsection (n) of section 9, an amount equal to the aggregate amount allocated to their trusts shall be credited against the sum of $25,000,000 invested in participating certificates under paragraph (1) of subsection (b) of section 25. If the aggregate amount so allocated is in excess of $25,000,000, an amount equal to the excess shall be invested in the same manner. Upon the repayment of any of the amounts so invested, under the provisions of section 5 of the settlement of war claims act of 1928, the amount so repaid shall be distributed pro rata among such persons, notwithstanding any receipts or releases given by them.

"(d) In the case of any other enemy or ally of enemy entitled to such return, the Alien Property Custodian shall deposit the amount allocated to his trust in the Treasury in the name of such person until otherwise directed by Congress.

"(e) The payment provided for in subsection (a), the investment provided for in subsection (c), and the deposit provided for in subsection (d), shall be made out of the unallocated interest fund.

"SEC. 27. The Alien Property Custodian is authorized and directed to return to the United States any consideration paid to him by the United States under any license, assignment, or sale by the Alien Property Custodian to the United States of any patent (or any right therein or claim thereto, and including an application therefor and any patent issued pursuant to any such application).

"SEC. 28. As used in this act, the term 'unallocated interest fund' means the sum of (1) the earnings and profits accumulated prior to March 4, 1923, and attributable to investments and reinvestments under section 12 by the Secretary of the Treasury, plus (2) the earnings and profits accumulated on or after March 4, 1923, in respect of the earnings and profits referred to in clause (1) of this section.

"SEC. 29. (a) Where the Alien Property Custodian has made demand or requirement for the conveyance, transfer, assignment, delivery, or payment to him of any money or other property of any enemy or ally of enemy (whether or not suit or proceeding for the enforcement thereof has been begun and whether or not any judgment or decree in respect thereof has been made or entered) and where the whole or any part of such money or other property would, if conveyed, transferred, assigned, delivered, or paid to him, be returnable under paragraph (12), (13), (14), or (16) of subsection (b) of section 9, the Alien Property Custodian may, in his discretion, and on such terms and conditions as he may prescribe, waive such demand or requirement, or accept in full satisfaction of such demand, requirement, judgment, or decree, a less amount than that demanded or required by him.

"(b) The Alien Property Custodian shall not make any such waiver or compromise unless, after compliance with the terms and conditions thereof, he or the Treasurer of the United States will hold (in respect of such enemy or ally of enemy) for investment as provided in section 25 an amount equal to 20 per cent of the sum of (1) the value of the money or other property held by the Alien Property Custodian or the Treasurer of the United States at the time of such waiver or compromise, plus (2) the value of the money or other property to which the Alien Property Custodian would be entitled under such demand or requirement if the waiver or compromise had not been made."

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 38, line 6, after the period, insert the following as a new section:

SEC. 14. SEC. 22. No person shall be entitled to the return of any property or money under any provisions of this act, or any amendment of this act, who is a fugitive from justice of the United States or any State or Territory thereof or the District of Columbia.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is to prevent the return under the provisions of this bill of any money or property to Grover Cleveland Bergdoll, who is a fugitive from justice and a notorious draft evader.

I am authorized to state that the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means is willing to accept this amendment.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I do not think that the amendment is necessary, but I see no objection to it.

Mr. TARVER. Mr. Chairman, I want to state that while many Members of the House do not think that the amendment is necessary, yet it has been deemed necessary to incorporate in this bill in subparagraph (o) to section 12 a provision preserving the rights of the Government and of individual claimants under existing laws notwithstanding the provisions of this bill.

The trading with the enemy act, section 22, as amended by the Winslow Act in 1923, prohibited the delivery under the provisions of this act of property or the return of property to those who are fugitives from justice. This bill creates additional classes who are entitled to the return of their property, but there is no specific inhibition in the bill against the return of such property to those who may be fugitives from justice.

If the amendment is necessary, we ought not to have any opposition to it. If it is of doubtful necessity, then it ought to be adopted, for surely no Member of this House desires to vote for the return of several hundred thousand dollars of property to this notorious draft dodger.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman's same amendment was adopted last year and put in the bill, was it not?

Mr. RAINEY. No. I offered the amendment but it was not adopted, the contention being that the trading with the enemy act covered it.

Mr. BLANTON. It was then admitted here by the committee to be sound, even though it was not adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

RETURN OF INCOME

SEC. 14. Section 23 of the trading with the enemy act, as amended, is amended by inserting "(a)" after the section number and by adding at the end of such section a new subsection to read as follows:

"(b) In the case of any person entitled to the return of money or other property under the provisions of paragraph (12), (13), (14), or (16) of subsection (b) of section 9, the amount of net income, dividends, interest, annuities, or other earnings accrued and collected after March 4, 1923, and prior to the date of the enactment of the settlement of war claims act of 1928, which has not been paid under subsection (a) of this section by reason of the $10,000 limitation therein, shall be returnable to such persons under and subject to the conditions of such paragraph (12), (13), (14), or (16); and any net income, dividend, interest, annuity, or other earnings accruing and collected on and after the date of the settlement of war claims act of 1928 shall be paid to such persons under subsection (a) of this section without regard to such $10,000 limitation."

Mr. NEWTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the figures in line 26. What is the purpose of this section?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, I am about to offer an amendment striking out practically all of this section, and I think that my explanation of that amendment will answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. NEWTON. Very well.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

RETURN OF INCOME

Amendment offered by Mr. GREEN of Iowa: Page 38, line 9, beginning with the word "by," strike out through line 26 and insert in lieu thereof the following, to read as follows:

"SEC. 23. The Alien Property Custodian is directed to pay to the person entitled thereto, from and after the time this section takes effect, the net income, dividend, interest, annuity, or other earnings, accruing and collected thereafter, on any property or money held in trust for such person by the Alien Property Custodian or by the Treasurer of the United States for the account of the Alien Property Custodian, under such rules and regulations as the President may prescribe."

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, the effect of this amendment, which is agreed to by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLIER], is to remove from the 80 per cent provision all of the income that may hereafter be received on the property in the hands of the Alien Property Custodian. In other words, from the time of the passage of this bill, if it is passed, the Alien Property Custodian will turn over all of the net income, dividends, interest, or other annuity on the property in his hands. At present it has been subject to the $10,000 limitation. I will say to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NEWTON] that that is the way that figure came in in the paragraph as it stood, and under the other provisions of the bill it would be subject to the 80 per cent limitation.

Mr. NEWTON. And this restores it to about where it was a year ago when the bill went over to the Senate.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I think that is correct.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Does that mean that we are going to continue the office of Alien Property Custodian in that department indefinitely?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Oh, no; we will get rid of all this property eventually.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But I refer to the custodian and the bureau.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. It has to be continued until this property has been turned over, but that should not be long.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

INCOME TAX

Amendment offered by Mr. GREEN of Iowa: Page 38, after line 26, insert the following new section:

"SEC. 15. Section 24 of the trading with the enemy act is amended by inserting '(a)' after the section number and by adding at the end of such section a new subsection to read as follows:

"'(b) In the case of income, war profits, excess profits, or estate taxes imposed by any act of Congress, the amount thereof shall be computed in the same manner as though the money or other property had not been seized by or paid to the Alien Property Custodian, and shall be paid, as far as practicable, in accordance with subsection (a) of this section.'"

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is simply to clear up a doubt and protect the Government in the matter of taxation.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. We are approaching the end of this bill. In fact, we have completed the bill, except the definition section, and at this time I rise to put into the RECORD a brief statement of the unfortunate circumstances due to the inexcusable bungling of this administration and of the last administration which has made necessary this bill, with its unfortunate provisions.

In 1918 the war ended with the armistice. In 1919, 25 nations participated in the treaty of Versailles, including the United States and China. Every one of those nations signed the treaty of Versailles. It was not ratified by two of them. The United States and China did not ratify that treaty.

In 1921 under the Harding administration, anxious to obtain all the benefits for the United States of the treaty of Versailles without assuming any of its obligations, we entered into the treaty of Berlin, and the treaty of Berlin is not worth the paper it is written on. We are finding that out now. In 1922, although we had already entered into the treaty of Berlin, Mr. Hughes, then Secretary of State, delivered his address in New Haven, Conn., in which he said, among other things:

> We are not seeking reparations. We are, indeed, asking for the reimbursement of the costs of our army of occupation. Others have been paid and we have not been paid, but we are not seeking general reparations. We are bearing our own burdens, and through our loans a large part of Europe's burden in addition. No demands of ours stand in the way of the reparations question.

Then afterward, when the old commission on reparations was functioning, from this administration came the suggestion of the appointment of a committee of experts, known afterward as the Dawes committee. We did not realize until then the situation in which we found ourselves. We could not get a dollar under our treaty of Berlin with Germany. The other nations in signing up the treaty of Versailles, 23 of them altogether, had obtained by that treaty and through the Reparations Commission a first mortgage on all the revenues of the German Government, and the second mortgage that we got under the treaty of Berlin was not worth the paper it was written on. Then followed the unfortunate speech of Mr. Hughes in New Haven in 1922.

In 1925, even this administration blundering along as it did during the year following its accession to power through the elections of 1920, commenced to realize that we had to get something out of the Reparations Commission. Bear in mind the Reparation Commission was appointed as a result of the treaty of Versailles, which we would not sign.

The Reparation Commission is also in fact a subsidiary of the League of Nations, with which we pretend to have nothing whatever to do. We say we are avoiding entangling alliances. But, however, in our public policies we are encouraging and indorsing loans to nations until we have now loaned them, I do not know how many billions of dollars, but a tremendous amount, until we are making entangling alliances absolutely inevitable. But in 1925 after the blistering exchange of notes between Mr. Hughes and Mr. Chamberlain, embraced in the Senate document which I think is not now a secret document, although it was a year ago, in which Mr. Chamberlain called attention to his New Haven speech, we were permitted humbly and with bended knees to crawl into the conference at London of the Reparation Commission and they threw us this pittance of 2¼ per cent reparation under which they expect to commence collecting next year $625,000,000 a year. In the interval which elapsed between the armistice and the treaty of Versailles and the London conference—six years—the other nations which entered into the reparation arrangements succeeded in collecting from Germany revenues amounting to $1,280,000,000. We did not get a cent of that amount. We are now accepting Germany's promise to pay $13,000,000 on the amount each year, and so far for a year she has been able to pay it, and then we are expecting $10,700,000 a year from the Reparations Commission, a creation under the Versailles treaty and really subsidiary of the League of Nations. This is the blundering arrangement into which we have been forced by this administration and the last administration which makes it necessary for those of us who want now to return this German property to vote for this bill as it is.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. In a moment. We lost $170,0000,000 of interest alone on account of the blundering of these two administrations in the matter of reparation payments alone, and we have endangered the entire amount we may expect to obtain from Germany these next 25 years. The amount we are expecting to be paid under this bill will not be paid in 25 years if she keeps up these payments. That is the situation in which we find ourselves and which makes it necessary for Democrats on this side of the House who regret the bad things in this bill to vote for it. We are helping you get out of the blunders you have been making during the last two administrations.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I wish, first, to ask unanimous consent that the Clerk may have leave to correct section numbers and references thereto.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

> On page 39, lines 11 to 12, strike out the words "partnership, association, or corporation" and insert in lieu thereof "partnership or association."

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I have not risen to discuss this amendment, which is simply a perfecting amendment to which, I think, no one has any objection nor have I any desire to discuss the diplomatic history of the last 10 years which has been referred to by the gentleman from Illinois. It is true that possibly we could have obtained better terms from Germany if we had cared to plunge this Nation into the struggles and conflicts which now harass Europe. We have kept out of that, and I am glad we have, and in the long run we will be better off, notwithstanding what the gentleman from Illinois says.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. If the gentleman will yield in that connection, all in the world we would have had to do was to have kept in touch with the Reparations Commission in collecting these debts and we would have kept entirely aloof from the political side of the question.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman is in error. We had removed our Army from Europe. We had no opportunity to compel anything in the way of reparations, whereas the other nations were still holding Germany under their control. They had their feet on the neck of the German nation, and they could control these reparations absolutely. The only way we could have an award other than what the Allies were willing to grant us with reference to these reparations was by sending an army over there to fight for it. We did not do it, and it is well we did not.

But I did not want to discuss that matter. I only wanted to express my thanks to the Members of the House for the cooperation they have given on the bill in making such rapid progress we have had to-day.

This bill marks a distinct step in the course of nations. Alone and solitary among all the victors in the great struggle of the war, we are willing to turn back the property that came into our hands. No other nation has offered to pay back even so much as a penny of the property they seized. We alone have taken our stand upon this high principle, which we expect to enforce and will continue to uphold. [Applause.]

Now, there are some who would like to pay the Germans at once for all their property taken. I sympathize with them to some extent in that theory, but this would make necessary an appropriation out of the American Treasury for the purpose of paying the American claims. A bill of that kind can not be passed through this House and can not be got through the Senate. A bill that makes the German claims superior to the American claims has no chance of passage; neither could we get through a bill that puts the American claims superior to the German claims. All we have done in this bill is to put all of them on an equality, as nearly as possible. Under this bill we pay 80 per cent of the German claims and almost that amount of the American claims. The claims that received our special attention were the claims of people who are suffering and in want, and we believed that they should be paid at once. As a result the larger claims are deferred, but those are all of companies that can spare the money for the time being. They will get interest on their claims and they are all desirous that this bill be passed.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I would like to proceed for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Before the gentleman proceeds in his general remarks I would like to ask him what is the effect of his amendment?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The effect of the amendment is simply to include "partnership or association."

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Or corporations?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes; corporations. It is simply a perfecting amendment.

Mr. Chairman, among the claimants on both sides are people who are actually praying that this bill be passed. We have held this money for nearly 10 years. It still lies in the Treasury. If action is longer delayed it may be years more before action is taken.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. Out of what funds is the interest on the unpaid accounts to be drawn?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. It is drawn from various funds. As shown by the report, part of it is from payments on the reparation funds.

Mr. MADDEN. Are there means by which the interest is earned?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. There are some funds out of which the interest on these claims will be paid.

Mr. MADDEN. What funds? I was not here during all the debate.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The fund was created, first, by taking 20 per cent of the value of the German property; and, second, the unallocated interest; and, third, $25,000,000 of German money, appropriated for payments on the ships, patents, and radio stations, and the money received on reparation payments. Altogether this amounts to $113,000,000. Of course the German property is only temporarily retained.

We make no appropriations except to pay for the ships, radio stations, and patents. The American taxpayer is out nothing except for the past debts of the Government. The bill is fair and just as between the American claimants on one side and the German claimants on the other, and should pass by an overwhelming majority.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has again expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with the amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be adopted and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MAPES, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having under consideration the bill (H. R. 7201) to provide for the settlement of certain claims of American nationals against Germany and of German nationals against the United States, for the ultimate return of all property of German nationals held by the Alien Property Custodian, and for the equitable apportionment among all claimants of certain available funds, had directed him to report the same back to the House with certain amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments thereto to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, on that I ask for a division.

The SPEAKER. A division is demanded.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 223, noes 26.

So the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. GREEN of Iowa, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED

Mr. CAMPBELL, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 5800. An act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1928, and prior fiscal years, to provide supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1928, and for other purposes.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 3 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, December 21, 1927, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE

WEDNESDAY, December 21, 1927

The Chaplain, Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Let not your heart be troubled: ye believe in God, believe also in me. In my Father's house are many mansions; if it were not so, I would have told you; for I go to prepare a place for you. And if I go and prepare a place for you, I come again, and will receive you unto myself; that where I am, there ye may be also.

O Father of mercies and God of all comfort our only help in time of need: Who spakest unto Thy children in the olden time saying, "When thou passest through the waters, I will be with thee; and through the rivers, they shall not overflow thee; when thou walkest through the fire thou shall not be burned; neither shall the flame kindle upon thee."

Look with pity, we humbly beseech Thee, upon the sorrows of all Thy children and especially the family, loved ones, and friends of him whom Thou hast tenderly called to Thy side. Grant that his life, so fruitful here, may unfold itself in Thy sight and find sweet employment in the spacious fields of eternity.

And now Lord support us all the day long of this troublous life until the shadows lengthen, and the evening comes, and the busy world is hushed, and the fever of life is over, and our work is done. Then in Thy mercy grant us a safe lodging, a holy rest and peace at the last. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Monday last, when, on request of Mr. CURTIS and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

DEATH OF SENATOR ANDRIEUS A. JONES

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, it is with a heavy heart that I rise to advise the Members of this body that my colleague the senior Senator from New Mexico departed this life last night.

In the passage of Senator JONES the people of his State, and my State, have lost a citizen who has been respected, trusted, admired, and loved through the years. The Government as a whole has lost a valuable citizen, and this body has been deprived of a distinguished, painstaking, and faithful Member. I give notice that at some future time I shall ask that a day be set aside for appropriate services in his memory.

Mr. President, with this feeling I propose the following resolutions, which I ask may be read and adopted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolutions will be read.

The resolutions (S. Res. 89) were read, considered by unanimous consent, and unanimously agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with deep regret and profound sorrow the announcement of the death of the Hon. ANDRIEUS A. JONES, late a Senator from the State of New Mexico.

Resolved, That a committee of 10 Senators be appointed by the Vice President to take order for superintending the funeral of the deceased Senator.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

The VICE PRESIDENT appointed under the second resolution as the committee Mr. BRATTON, Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas, Mr. CURTIS, Mr. KENDRICK, Mr. KING, Mr. PITTMAN, Mr. ODDIE, Mr. JOHNSON, Mr. SHORTRIDGE, and Mr. JONES of Washington.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, I offer the following resolution and ask for its adoption.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, the Senate do now adjourn.

ADJOURNMENT

The resolution was unanimously agreed to; and the Senate (at 12 o'clock and 6 minutes p. m.) adjourned, the adjournment being, under the concurrent resolution of the two Houses, until Wednesday, January 4, 1928, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, December 21, 1927

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we are now in the foreglow of a skylight overhead. The ancient message is to be glorified, and the old earth is to receive the fulfillment of its dreams. We therefore praise Thee. We shall soon hear the melody bursting forth from the union of heaven and earth saying, "Glory to God in the highest, on earth good will and peace toward men." May the richest blessing of the advent bring cheer and happiness to all our homes. Fill all our firesides with health and gladness like the glow of a sympathetic sunlight. Oh, especially remember the separated loved ones. Lord God of nations, bless our native land. May Thine altars be set up in high places; may Thy banners of righteousness, justice, and truth be unfurled in our skies, and may hate die down like the voice of an angry sea. Oh, let the high standards of charity and brotherly love prevail to the remotest sections of our fair land. In the name of the Prince of Peace. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its principal clerk, announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

Senate Resolution 89

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with deep regret and profound sorrow the announcement of the death of the Hon. ANDRIEUS A. JONES, late a Senator from the State of New Mexico.

Resolved, That a committee of 10 Senators be appointed by the Vice President to take orders for superintending the funeral of the deceased Senator.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the Senate do now adjourn.

The message also announced that pursuant to the foregoing resolution the Vice President appointed Mr. BRATTON, Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas, Mr. CURTIS, Mr. KENDRICK, Mr. KING, Mr. PITTMAN, Mr. ODDIE, Mr. JOHNSON, Mr. SHORTRIDGE, and Mr. JONES of Washington members of the committee to superintend the funeral of the deceased Senator.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for three minutes, and following that I ask unanimous consent that the Resident Commissioner from the Philippines, Mr. GUEVARA, may address the House for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to address the House for three minutes, following which unanimous consent is asked for the Resident Commissioner from the Philippines to address the House for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

PAY OF FEDERAL AND DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA EMPLOYEES

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution (H. J. Res. 117) which I send to the desk.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, may we have the resolution reported?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That all employees of the United States Government in the District of Columbia and employees of the District of Columbia who come within the provisions of the Executive order making Saturday, December 24, 1927, a holiday shall be entitled to pay for said holiday the same as on other days.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, this is no time to extend such holiday provisions under unanimous consent, and I object. It is a matter that ought to come up in the regular way.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Will the gentleman withhold his objection for a moment?

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly; but I am going to object. This ought to go to the committee and be considered there.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. It has already been considered by a committee and reported upon.

Mr. BLANTON. It ought to be considered by the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. We ought to have a chance to look into the matter and see how far-reaching it is.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Let me explain the situation. Under existing law, whenever a holiday is declared by the President, most Government employees receive pay as for any other day; and as to 94 per cent of the employees in the District, embracing about 60,000, they are already covered by existing law. The only ones not covered by law are the employees in the Washington Navy Yard, numbering 3,488, and employees in the Naval Observatory, of whom there are 18. Everybody will be paid for Saturday except those in the navy yard and in the Naval Observatory.

Mr. BLANTON. How about the other 500,000 employees of the United States Government scattered all over the United States?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. They are not covered by the President's proclamation.

Mr. BLANTON. They are not covered?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. They are not covered by the proclamation.

Mr. BLANTON. Why are they not entitled to the same consideration as the ones which the gentleman has in mind?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. They are covered by existing law with respect to holidays that may be declared by the President.

Mr. BLANTON. But the President has forgotten them in his proclamation here in behalf of certain ones who actually live in the District of Columbia. I am thinking of all of them. We must treat them all alike.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. It seems to me that in all fairness the people in the navy yard and the Naval Observatory ought to be put on exactly the same plane as other District and Federal employees.

Mr. BLANTON. Whenever the President can treat the ones scattered all over the United States on the same basis I shall not object; but until then I object, Mr. Speaker.

LEGISLATION AND 1928

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend in the RECORD some remarks made by me on the occasion of a banquet to the Republican National Committee recently held in this city.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted by the House I here extend in the RECORD a brief address delivered at a banquet tendered the Republican National Committee in this city on December 6, 1927.

The Republican National Committee has met in Washington at this time to fix the time and place for holding the next national convention of our party. The six months from now until the convention meets will doubtless be an important period in our history. The course national affairs will take for many years to come will probably depend in a considerable measure upon what occurs during this time. While legislation is only one element in our political life, it is always an important one, and never more so than now. Therefore, the work of Congress during these months will be observed with considerable interest throughout the country.

It is easy to exaggerate the probable political effect of any particular legislation. Those seeking legislation for individual, class, or sectional benefit are always ready to magnify the effect that such legislation will have at the polls, and urge it ostensibly for political reasons. Here lies one of the dangers always present, and especially so immediately preceding a presidential election. The attempt, however, to capture the votes of special groups or classes by legislation unduly favoring them is, in my judgment, unsound from a political as well as governmental viewpoint. There are those who would have Congress in the capacity of a glorified Santa Claus on the eve of an election handing out something specially labeled to a sufficient number of voters to win the election. Leaving aside for the moment the question of the merits of such legislation, I do not believe that elections are to be won in that way. Such a course is more likely to lose an election, if by these legislative acts the great mass of the people, who are not specially benefited, but who must in the end pay the bills, come to the conclusion that the party responsible for such legislation is not to be further trusted. There should be a sounder basis for legislation than simply a trap to catch votes.

There are sufficient real legislative problems of a national character to be wrestled with during the next six months to absorb the entire attention of Congress. The never-ending duty of exercising the closest scrutiny of governmental appropriations and new authorizations of expenditure is always present with us. We can not dodge this responsibility if we would. We would not dodge it if we could. Our party record on this score is excellent, and must be kept so.

Having done our full duty in keeping within proper bounds governmental expenditures, we come logically to the reduction of taxes. It is inevitable that there should be irreconcilable differences as to where the reduction should take place. A fair spirit of compromise, made effective by the final word of a majority, is the only means of adjusting such differences. As to the aggregate amount of tax reduction, there should be little room for difference of opinion and none whatever as to the principle to be observed in arriving at the proper figure. There should be no reduction below the margin of safety for the requirements of the Treasury. A threatened deficit there would do much harm, while a real substantial deficiency in the revenues would be a serious disaster. A somewhat large proportion of our present revenue is derived from the net income of taxpayers. A very slight recession in business would seriously curtail incomes and the revenue derived from that source. The question of determining the amount of the reduction is not a matter capable of exact calculation, and therefore all the greater care should be exercised, realizing that it is not difficult to make further reductions later if warranted, while in case of a deficit it is both difficult and unpopular to impose new taxes to make up the deficit.

There are many other real and serious problems with which Congress must deal at the present session. One of these—and I refer to what has come to be called farm relief—has had much consideration, but by reason of the inherent difficulty and complexity of the problem no accepted solution has yet been found. As to the particular troubles affecting agriculture, which are very real ones, having failed to agree upon a remedy calculated to effect a complete cure when administered as a single dose, I for one hope that at least a measure of relief may be found by applying proper treatment to individual phases of the trouble as they may develop, rather than wait longer for a single complete and permanent remedy.

Another problem which has existed for some time but has not heretofore received the consideration its importance demands has been thrust into the foreground by recent great and overwhelming disasters. I refer, of course, to the subject of flood control. This is a problem of the first magnitude with wide ramifications and with difficulties and complexities all its own, but it must be met, considered, and put on its way toward solution.

Neither of the problems to which I have just referred is a strictly party problem, except in the sense that our party is in power and therefore must accept the responsibility and see to it that our best efforts are put forth in the direction of a wise solution.

There are many other problems, not attracting so much public attention perhaps, but important, and should receive the same kind of attention. One of these, the question of reapportionment, is a truly national matter demanding early action. Too long has this constitutional duty been deferred. It also is not a party question, but I am glad to be able to state that a very large majority of our party in the House of Representatives have tried to secure action that would assure reapportionment when the 1930 census is taken. Our plan is to fix now the number of the membership of the House for the succeeding decade and direct the Secretary of Commerce as a purely ministerial act to ascertain the number of such Representatives to which each State is entitled as shown by the decennial census taken in 1930. No one can deny the fairness of this method, and it has the additional virtue of fixing the size of the House before the census is taken of removing the cause of controversy between States that gain or lose in their membership, no one knowing in advance which State will gain or lose.

More important, in my judgment, than any particular act of legislation is our attitude as a party toward the principles involved in the solution of governmental problems. It has been the proud record of the Republican Party throughout its years of honored history that it stands for sound orderly progress. There are always those so completely satisfied with things as they are that they are unwilling to change at all, regardless of changed or changing conditions. On the other hand, there are those who seem to think change and progress synonymous terms, and therefore insist upon motion, regardless of its direction. These do not seem to realize that of four cardinal directions in which one may travel only one is forward, one is backward, and the other two may be best described in the language of the street as "side stepping."

Throughout its 70 years of existence the Republican Party when in power—and it has been in power about three quarters of the time—has met and grappled successfully with the many great and perplexing problems that have arisen during these momentous years. It has not hesitated in moving forward with alacrity, but has always used the lamp of experience as a guide. Its march forward has been safe because it has been orderly. Disregarding none of the lessons learned from the experiences of the past, it has turned them to account in facing new and untried situations, and it has done this so successfully that it has merited and received the continued and almost continuous approbation of the American people.

The historical as well as the present attitude of our party has been to follow as nearly as possible the motto of the rugged old pioneer who said: "First know that you are right, and then go ahead." Or, if higher authority is wanted, the spirit of it may be found in Holy Writ in that wholesome advice to "prove all things, but hold fast that which is good." It is in this spirit that we may expect to accomplish much in facing new problems as they arise and solving them without sacrificing the sound principles upon which our institutions and our lasting prosperity have been founded. It is not necessary to sacrifice these principles that have been tested by time and experience. Ours is not the party of the opportunist or of the reckless experimenter, but it is the party that can and does do things worth while.

As I see it the election of 1928 is now won as the situation stands to-day. It could be easily thrown away. It only remains, however, for the party to so continue the conduct of affairs as to retain the confidence of the people it now has in order to make certain the result that all of those here present so much desire.

Mr. SWANK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting some remarks of my own made before the Committee on Appropriations yesterday.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

Mr. SWANK. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following:

Mr. SWANK. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the Committee on Appropriations, I am glad to have this opportunity to appear before you in behalf of a most worthy cause, namely, Platt National Park, which is located at Sulphur, Okla. You know the history of the act of Congress that created this park, and at this time I wish to again call the attention of this committee to the usefulness of the park, the great service it renders to the people of the United States, and its need of greater appropriations for further improvements. But few of you gentlemen have had opportunity to visit this park, and I wish you could all visit it some time in the summer when the tourist season is on.

A record of visitors is kept at Bromide Springs, where they are checked by the keeper. The National Park Service previous to 1926 divided this number by four and estimated that as a fair average of visitors, and gave as the reason for this reduction that some people visited these springs more than once. While that is true, it is also true that thousands of visitors to Platt National Park are never checked, as they do not visit Bromide Springs. Many of them go there for the other water, for the hot sulphur baths, and for pleasure, and find all this without visiting Bromide Springs. I believe the number given in the report of the superintendent fairly represents the figures of visitors. In 1926 the National Park Service reduced the figures of the superintendent by one-half as a fair average of visitors.

The reports of the superintendent of Platt National Park shows the number of visitors and campers for the past nine years, as follows:

	Visitors	Campers
1919	107,918	689
1920	173,310	2,981
1921	216,022	10,526
1922	246,998	23,170
1923	470,841	74,589
1924	539,495	95,272
1925	573,522	43,823
1926	248,569	45,796
1927	294,954	51,584

Here I wish to attach a statement from the National Park Service as to the number of visitors in our national parks for the year 1927, as follows:

OCTOBER 28, 1927.

The number of visitors to the national parks and monuments during the travel year ended September 30 reached a total of 2,797,840, according to a statement issued by the Department of the Interior to-day. These figures exceed by 482,935 the high mark of 2,314,905 reached last year.

The division of this travel between the different parks and monuments, with 1926 figures for comparison, is given in the following lists:

Name of park	1926	1927
Hot Springs (Ark.)	[1] 260,000	[1] 181,523
Yellowstone (Wyo.)	187,807	200,825
Sequoia (Calif.)	89,404	100,684
Yosemite (Calif.)	274,209	490,430
General Grant (Calif.)	50,597	47,996
Mount Rainier (Wash.)	161,796	200,051
Crater Lake (Oreg.)	89,019	82,354
Platt (Okla.)	[1] 124,284	[2] 294,954

[1] Estimated.
[2] Actual park visitors; many miners and prospectors passed through park.

Name of park	1926	1927
Wind Cave (S. Dak.)	85,466	81,023
Sullys Hill (N. Dak.)	19,921	22,632
Mesa Verde (Colo.)	11,356	11,915
Glacier (Mont.)	37,325	41,745
Rocky Mountain (Colo.)	[1] 225,027	[1] 229,862
Hawaii (Territory of Hawaii)	[1] 35,000	37,551
Lassen Volcanic (Calif.)	18,739	20,089
Mount McKinley (Alaska)	[2] 533	[2] 651
Grand Canyon (Ariz.)	140,252	162,356
Lafayette (Me.)	101,256	123,699
Zion (Utah)	21,964	24,303
Total	1,930,865	2,354,643

[2] Actual park visitors; many miners and prospectors passed through park.

This report shows that for this year but one park in the United States had more visitors than Platt National Park. These figures show that the visitors have increased in this park from 107,918 in 1919 to 294,954 in 1927. In the year 1925 there was a decrease in the number of visitors, as there was in all our other parks.

The reports show the number of private automobiles entering the park, as follows:

1924	57,400
1925	60,000
1927	75,000

In 1925 more automobiles entered Platt National Park than any of our other parks, and in 1926 the number was excelled only by two other parks.

The report of the Director of National Parks gives the number of visitors that entered Platt National Park in 1926 at 124,284, and the above statement shows the number for 1927 to be 294,954, which is an excellent increase, showing the popular favor of this park with the people of the country.

The National Park Service states that, while the superintendent of the park reports that 875,000 motorists used the park in 1927, so many of these were local repeaters that 294,954 was a fair estimate of the park travel. As stated before, thousands of people visit the park and are never recorded, as they do not visit Bromide Springs, where they are checked, and I believe the director places too large a reduction in his estimate. The superintendent also reports 250,000 private automobiles as entering the park in 1927, but the National Park Service reduces this figure to 75,000, and states that many of these were local cars making numerous entries. The same is true with respect to these cars—many of them are never counted. Yet with this reduction there is only one park with more automobiles entering it than Platt National Park.

I ask permission to insert here a question and answer concerning our national parks, taken from the Washington Star, November 8, 1927:

"Q. Which national park has the most visitors?—A. In 1927 Yosemite Valley topped the list with 490,430 visitors. Platt Park, Okla., was second, with 294,954; Rocky Mountain Park, Colo., third, with 229,862; Yellowstone Park, Wyo., fourth, with 200,825; and Mount Rainier Park, Wash., fifth, with 200,051."

Gentlemen of the committee, I have been familiar with this park for many years, before Oklahoma was admitted to statehood. Long before I can remember, this has been a favorite place for people afflicted with bodily ailments and in bad health. This is one of the greatest and most favored health resorts in the land. In its more than 30 mineral springs there is water of all kinds—sulphur, bromide, medicine, and pure water—all gushing from springs near each other. The reports of noted chemists show that these waters contain medicinal properties of great restorative value to the human body. All forms of nervousness, sleeplessness, and digestive ailments will usually yield to the properties of the bromide water, while the hot sulphur baths are almost a sure cure for rheumatism. I mention this to the committee, in addition to the natural scenery in the park and surrounding country, to call the attention of the committee to the importance of the park.

Adjacent to this park is Oklahoma's great, well-equipped, and efficiently managed sanitarium and hospital for the treatment and care of our soldiers who were in the World War. The State has spent hundreds of thousands of dollars for the erection and upkeep of this institution. It was placed at Sulphur, near this park, after being selected by a committee of competent physicians for the reason of the health-giving properties of the water there and the healthful surroundings. At this place is also located the Oklahoma School for the Deaf with many beautiful buildings. In addition to this, Sulphur is a beautiful little city with a fine, Christian, law-abiding citizenship.

It is not so large as some other parks, but great in accomplishments, which, I think, should always be taken into consideration in making appropriations for our parks. If you will visit this park in the summer at the height of the tourist season you will meet people there from almost every State in the Union. This park is of great importance to people who are seeking better health and can not afford to go to the more costly parks. While, perhaps, most of the visitors are people with modest means, as living conditions are most excellent and reasonable, you will find them there from all classes, and people of wealth enjoy the healthful waters and the hospitality of the people the same as the thousands of other visitors. Excellent camping grounds are provided without charge to visitors and they can bathe in the water and drink as much as they like. There the visitor will find first-class hotel service and excellent restaurants and boarding houses at moderate cost.

Gentlemen of the committee, the National Park Service can not carry out its program properly without adequate appropriations, and these should be provided by Congress. I favor this program and the continued improving of our national parks, where our citizens can go when they wish, and especially am I in favor of the proper upkeep of those parks where people visit in search of health and where they will likely find it.

Many improvements are needed at Platt National Park, such as additional bridges across the creeks that enter the park, road improvement, extension of sewer and water lines, more comfort stations, tree planting, fencing around the park, additional improvements at the leading springs, drilling of additional wells, dams across the principal creek, improved camping grounds, the construction of a new, modern dwelling and office building for the superintendent and employees.

There should also be appropriations for more help and equipment in the park. With an adequate appropriation Platt National Park will increase its usefulness to the people of the United States, needed repairs and improvements will be made, and its popularity increased. I know the appropriations would be made if you gentlemen would only visit this park during this summer.

Gentlemen of the committee, I greatly appreciate your courtesy in giving me this hearing, and I hope that I have presented the needs of this park in a way that increased appropriations will be granted.

THE PROPOSED NEW FEDERAL BUILDING AT PORTLAND, OREG.

Mr. KORELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on House Resolution 278, passed the other day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oregon asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KORELL. Mr. Speaker, I am glad that the House passed H. R. 278, a bill authorizing appropriations for needed public buildings. It is a worthy measure. I am prompted to say this because I have observed that all the available statistics show that the Government is sorely in need of new buildings here in Washington and in practically every section of the country. The sum which H. R. 278 authorizes to be appropriated for constructing new buildings will enable the Government very materially to meet this pressing need. For this reason I supported and urged the passage of H. R. 278. Moreover, I believe that the measure offers some hope for relief to my particular district, which parenthetically, I may say, has for a long time been suffering on account of the lack of efficient housing facilities to accommodate the various governmental activities that are now attempting to function in the city of Portland. In fact, I have been influenced quite as much by this last reason as by the general consideration into supporting and now commending the passage of H. R. 278. However, it is for the purpose of discussing the apportionment to be made for my district under the provisions of this legislation, rather than the merits of the measure itself, that I am taking advantage of the courtesy accorded me by the House to make a few remarks.

At the outset I earnestly invite your attention, and particularly the attention of the members of the Committee on Appropriations, to the item of $1,500,000 recommended by the Treasury Department in the Budget "for the acquisition of a site and construction of a Federal building at Portland, Oreg.," for the reason that the amount included in this recommendation is not only inadequate for the construction of a building of appropriate size, but neither a fair nor a just apportionment of the $250,000,000 appropriation authorized by H. R. 278 to the people of Portland and the city's immediate environs. That this assertion is true will readily appear if the House will but grant its indulgence while I briefly review the history of the acquisition, use, and present condition of the old building which the new one is intended to replace.

The site upon which the present Federal building is located was purchased in the year 1869 for the sum of $15,000. Later a building was erected upon it at a cost of $341,500. The same was occupied about the year 1877. The cost has been more than returned to the Government in the way of savings on rent and various uses to which the building has been put from time to time during the past 49 years. In fact, the annual depreciation charges aggregate an amount much in excess of the sum originally appropriated for the construction of the old building and subsequently expended for its alteration and repair. The estimated market value of the site at this date, by conservative appraisements, is something over the sum of $1,750,000. Incidentally, this is the minimum amount for which the Treasury Department has stipulated in its recommendation in the Budget that the site shall be sold. Accordingly, if the program outlined by the Treasury Department is followed by the committee, without allowing an increase in this particular appropriation, the Government will actually withdraw from the city of Portland and its environs the sum of $235,000, more than it plans to expend in a new site and building. In calling your attention to the amount of this credit I do not wish to be understood as contending that the mere fact that there will be such a large disparity between the estimated cost of the new building as projected, and the market value of the site of the old one, without any additional showing, would be sufficient to establish the fact that the sum recommended by the Treasury Department for the new building to be built in my district is not adequate. On the contrary, I know that such an argument would not appeal to either the Members of this House or the members of the Appropriations Committee, but what I do say and feel justified in claiming in regard to the matter is this: That when a community like the city of Portland has had the spirit, enterprise, and tremendous energy to build itself up so that a Government investment in its real estate has been made to advance from the small sum of $15,000 to something over the sum of $1,750,000 in less than 50 years, that fair treatment demands and a square deal dictates that no part of such increase in value should be withdrawn from the city without a strong showing that there is no longer a reasonable necessity for its remaining invested there; that this contingency has not arisen with respect to the Government's business in the city of Portland I now propose to show by calling your attention to some pertinent and related figures, which I believe demonstrate beyond the possibility of a reasonable doubt that there is an immediate and urgent need for a new Federal building at Portland to-day of a size and style that will cost not less than $2,000,000 to construct.

After half a century the present building is old, run down, and outgrown. It is poorly adapted and hardly suited to the increased demands that are now being made upon it. Built when the population of the city of Portland was only approximately 25,000 it is now attempting to serve the needs of a community of, roughly speaking, 354,680 inhabitants. In this same connection I call your attention to the fact that the city's percentage of growth in population has been greatly accelerated in the past six or seven years. Also, that there are many signs which strongly indicate that it will not be long, if the present rate of increase continues, and there is every reason to suppose that it will, before Portland will have a population of over 600,000 inhabitants and a metropolitan area containing probably a million people if the increase in the area shall continue to be commensurate with that which occurs within the city. I mention growth in area to you for the purpose of emphasizing the fact, apparently overlooked by the Treasury Department, that there is an ever-present likelihood that the city's boundaries may be extended to include a part or possibly all of its metropolitan area. If this were to be done to-day, say to a radius of 15 miles, Portland would have a population of approximately half a million people. Such extensions, if made, will naturally place additional strains on the capacity of either the old or the new building. It is a contingency that must be considered and anticipated in connection with any plans for a new Federal building at Portland.

As additional evidence of the rapidity of Portland's growth during the last few years, I wish to offer for your consideration a comparison of figures, which I have compiled from various official sources.

In 1916 the postal receipts of Portland were $1,201,262. In 1926 they aggregated $3,900,887, an increase of over 150 per cent in 10 years. The figures for 1927 have not been made available as yet by the Post Office Department.

Over 105,997 building permits were issued by the city between 1920 and 1927. Their aggregate value showed an increase of over 231.2 per cent in building during this period and an increase in the value of residence building of over 356.5 per cent. During the seven years immediately preceding 1927 the public-school enrollment increased 24.8 per cent and the school-age census showed an increase of 27.3 per cent.

Any record of the city's growth within the last few years would not be complete without some mention of its industrial development. Before commenting on this in detail, however, let me direct your attention for a moment to one or two important factors which have contributed to Portland's development.

Portland is situated at the confluence of the Willamette and the Columbia Rivers. It is in the very heart of the world's richest agricultural sections. It possesses a geographical position that is steadily attracting manufacturers who are obliged to give consideration to the question of transportation costs in connection with the operation of their business. It is a natural gateway of outlet for the export wealth of that vast tributary area, so named, the Inland Empire, likewise sometimes called the Columbia River Basin. Incidentally, these are items that should be of vital importance to the Federal Government in selecting sites for new buildings.

The territory served by the port of Portland contains roughly 250,000 square miles and has a population that is conservatively estimated as 4,281,816 people. The products from this great hinterland come down to the city over the only water-grade route through the mountains of the Pacific coast. Portland is the great central market and seaport of the Pacific Northwest. Freight moves to it from all points of the Columbia River Basin. As this empire of natural resources is developed, so will all the products of mines and forest and farms grow into a steadily increasing volume of traffic for exports through the city as its gateway. In recognition of the obviously lower costs of operation of rail lines hauling freight by water grade, correspondingly favorable rail rates have been obtained for Portland and their justification maintained by various decisions of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Portland is the greatest originating seaport in the world. In 1926 its record of water-borne commerce showed that 3,148,211 tons of domestic freight were handled, an increase of 134.4 per cent over the figures for 1920. One million eight hundred sixteen thousand five hundred and thirty-seven tons of foreign freight were handled over the same period, an increase of 256.9 per cent. Fifty-three steamship lines are now giving regular service from the port. A few years ago there were less than a half dozen. Rail transportation has shown a corresponding increase and expansion.

You may have wondered why I called the port of Portland the greatest originating seaport in the world. Let me explain my statement. I mean by greatest originating port that Portland originates more of the products that it transports than any other port. To be specific, one-third of the total standing timber of the United States is in the State of Oregon to-day, of which Portland is the outstanding center. Sixteen per cent of all the grain in the United States is produced in the Northwest, of which over 58 per cent is shipped out by boat via the port of Portland. Pulpwood, wool, mohair, flax, fruits, and vegetables are other products produced in large quantities for many basic industries. The agricultural production of the Columbia country, of which Portland is a great central market and seaport, amounted to $544,821,000 in 1926.

Between 1919 and 1926 bank clearings increased from $1,652,950,830.27 to $2,103,840,193.06, a record of growth that has not been surpassed or equaled by any other city in the Northwest. Pay rolls were increased in 1927 by upward of $1,659,700.

Portland is the first city of the United States in manufacture and export of lumber, first in export of wheat, second in export of apples, and fourth in flour. It is the first primary wool-export port and the second largest wool market. It leads the Pacific coast as livestock market, in the manufacture of woolen textiles, flour, automatic stokers, automatic motive hoists, locomotives, pulp, and paper. It is the first in the Pacific Northwest in total foreign-commerce tonnage and its leading jobbing center.

Having sketched a very hasty outline for you of the tremendous territory served by Portland, the great natural resources that it possesses, the satisfactory progress that it is making in the way of development, and its exceedingly live condition during the past few years as compared with earlier periods, for the purpose of bringing to your attention the very large population which the city is destined to have in the next decade or two, I will now confine myself strictly to an analysis of the recommendations of the Treasury Department in regard to the size and style of the new Federal building proposed for Portland. But first let me say that the number of Federal employees in Portland has grown during the past 10 years from 641 to 2,691, or over 400 per cent. Federal disbursements have expanded in the same period from $2,913,185 to $11,035,825. Federal housing facilities, on the other hand, have not kept a pace of the growth of governmental business. It has increased less than 100 per cent and much of the estimated expansion is space leased from private property owners.

It is my understanding that the estimated cost of the new building as recommended by the Treasury Department contemplates a building seven stories high, with a basement, to be faced with stone and of an office-type construction. Five hundred thousand dollars of the total sum recommended for appropriation is expected to be used for purchasing a new site, leaving only the sum of $1,000,000 to be used for actual building purposes. Naturally the design of the building will have to conform to the dimensions and contour of the building site when it shall have been selected. This is a matter that may require considerable reckoning.

The old building, which the new one is intended to replace, contains, roughly, 27,136 square feet of office space. Into this area is crowded at the present time the Federal court, judges' chambers, clerks' offices, including bankruptcy and citizenship divisions, the offices of the Federal attorney, bureau of investigation, Department of Justice, central post-office station, and the United States marshal's office. The projected building, it is estimated, will contain approximately 67,751 square feet, or, roughly, two and one-half times the space that was deemed necessary to supply the housing demands that existed 50 years ago in the city's history, notwithstanding the fact that the city's population and Federal business has, as stated, not merely doubled but multiplied. Furthermore, in addition to the governmental activities that are now being housed in the old building, it is planned that the projected building will contain space for the Navy Department, Agricultural Department, Commerce Department, War Department, War Veterans' Bureau, and Shipping Board, which are collectively paying annual rents to private owners of $22,235.

The information that I have received from the Treasury Department is that in a general way the increased space in the projected building will be allocated to the various governmental agencies functioning in Portland about as follows: Six thousand two hundred and twenty square feet for the main postal substation, this is approximately a 65 per cent increase over the space that is now being used. Fifteen thousand seven hundred and seventy-three square feet for the Federal court rooms, clerk of the court, judges chambers, district attorney's quarters, bureau of investigation of the Department of Justice, and the United States marshal's office. This is an increase of approximately 140 per cent over the space that is now being used. Fifteen thousand six hundred and seventy-five square feet will be used by the activities that are now paying the rental aggregating the sum of $22,235 per annum. According to the department's original figures and the ones that were evidently used by it in computing the proposed apportionment as recommended in the Budget, the space required by these various last-named agencies is greater than that which will be provided in the projected building. There is absolutely no room for additional activities. The natural growth of those expected to be housed in the new building does not appear to have been anticipated.

Before passing from the proposed allocation of space in the projected building I would like to explain the source of the figures that I have cited. Immediately after the Budget appeared, I called at the Treasury Department and made a request for details concerning the proposed building and for such information as might be available showing how its size had been determined and its probable cost estimated. In compliance with my request, I was given a typewritten statement which I ask leave to place in the RECORD and from which I will now quote:

> Bill H. R. 17355 provides for a limit of cost of $1,200,000. The estimate this year is increased to $1,500,000 owing to the demand for 26,732 additional square feet by several of the activities to be housed in the new building. * * * The courthouse building contains approximately 27,136 square feet and the projected building is estimated to contain 67,751 square feet, or nearly two and one-half times that now available.

I quote this excerpt to you because I have observed in a letter that the Treasury Department addressed to the Appropriations Committee, under date of December 30, 1927, a statement that there is but 22,430 square feet of office space in the old building and that the new building when erected will contain 74,346 square feet of office space; also the following statement:

> The above area of 74,346 square feet of office space would require a building having a gross area of approximately 109,300 square feet, and it is contemplated to provide a seven-story-and-basement, stone-faced, office-type building having a ground area of 18,000 square feet. It is estimated that such a building at Portland would cost approximately $1,150,000, and making an allowance of, say, $350,000 for a site, the estimated total cost of $1,500,000 is arrived at.

I do not know which set of figures, if either, that the department has supplied in connection with the proposed building is correct, but aside from their disagreement I believe that certain deductions can be reasonably and safely drawn from the information supplied by the Treasury Department.

The first paper from which I quoted shows very clearly that the department either overlooked existing demands or had a new demand made upon it for 26,732 additional square feet within a year's time. In other words, it either did not figure correctly or anticipated incorrectly.

I do not know how the difference between the 67,751 square feet, evidently used as the basis of computing the proposed apportionment at the time the Budget was prepared, and the 74,366 square feet appearing in the department's letter to the committee can be explained. This statement also applies to the inconsistency in the figures regarding the space in the old building.

The construction estimate of $1,150,000 in this same letter shows that the figure of $1,000,000 for the building recommended in the Budget was too low by at least $150,000. Has the Treasury Department definite information that it can secure a site that will be centrally located in Portland for $350,000? The stipulated sale price of the old site does not suggest that it has. On the contrary, it leads one to the conclusion that the sum of $1,750,000 will be required for another equally desirable site, or $875,000 if only one-half the present ground is required.

Two hundred and fifty million dollars! A huge sum! If divided amongst the States according to number—Oregon's share would be upward of $5,000,000. If returns from custom receipts, income taxes, internal revenue, and miscellaneous receipts were to be considered it would be even more. The recommendation of the Treasury Department excludes Portland from anything but a nominal participation. Reduced to its essence, all that the recommendation proposes is a couple of book entries developing an unfavorable balance against the city. Surely it does not require argument to expose the lack of equity concealed in such an unfair proposal.

According to the conservative estimates of those persons who are best acquainted with the district's needs, the city of Portland and its environs need a new Federal building right now, containing not less than 155,000 square feet of floor space, if the present requirements and reasonable future growth of Government's business in the next 10 years is to be properly anticipated and met.

Again an examination of the allocation of Government business in the Pacific Northwest at the present moment will show that at least 75 per cent of the district Federal headquarters are now located in two cities in the State of Washington and only 25 per cent of the same type of headquarters are established in Portland and Oregon. Why is this? I will give you the answer. When the city has struggled in the past to accommodate various district headquarters, it has been pointed out time and time again that space was available in the two Washington cities free, or for practically nothing, and that the same was not available in Portland, and therefore the headquarters had to go to one or the other of the northern cities. In many cases important offices were removed from the city solely on this kind of a space argument. Manifestly, it is not a fair course to tie such activities as have been removed by this kind of an argument forever into the two Washington cities by using the present allocation as a basis of space requirements in future buildings.

Summarizing the remarks that I have made on this subject, I repeat, Portland having made nearly all the values that are needed for a commodious Federal building; Portland having before it beyond any possible doubt a tremendous development; Portland being situated in the commercial and economic center of the Pacific Northwest and therefore able to serve the majority of the people and the preponderating portion of land area of the Pacific Northwest at a less cost and in less time; and Portland and Oregon having been wrongfully deprived in the past of the proper percentage of district Federal headquarters, that its appeal to Congress and to the members of the Committee on Appropriations at this time and in this connection for a substantial Federal building, a building covering at least 100 by 200 feet of ground space and from 10 to 12 stories high, in order to take care of present requirements, reasonable future growth, and the proper share of the district headquarters that should have been given to Oregon, should not go unheeded or unanswered.

Since the figures appearing in the Budget were made public the Portland Chamber of Commerce, the principal civic organization of my district, through its directors has adopted a resolution which it has requested the Oregon delegation to present to you, the tenor of which is that it is to the best interest of Portland, Oregon, and the Government that the new Federal building to be erected at Portland shall have a ground-floor space of at least 100 by 200 feet and be of not less than 12 stories in height.

This resolution, I might add, is accompanied by a number of charts and a very comprehensive survey, which substantiate the claims of the city and Oregon for fair and adequate recognition in the way of an apportionment of the authorized appropriation for Federal buildings under H. R. 278. This data also includes a recommendation that the Government should sell the north half of the present old post-office block, facing Morrison, Fifth, and Sixth Streets, and retain title to the south half, facing Yamhill, between Fifth and Sixth Streets, and to erect the new Federal building on the half so retained. In support of this recommendation it is argued that if the proposed procedure is followed real-estate men estimate that the north half of the block will bring more than $1,000,000, possibly $1,250,000. This would make a substantial sum available without purchasing a new site. The erection of a new building upon the south half would place it where its location will be most satisfactory for both the post-office substation uses and offices and court room uses. The time involved in getting started upon construction work would be reduced to the minimum and probably the largest amount of net funds made available from the Government property.

While I personally am not prepared to urge the construction of the new building upon any particular site or in any special location, it strikes me that this recommendation is worthy of the earnest consideration of the Appropriations Committee. The proceeds of such a sale, together with something less than the figures specified in the Budget, would create a fund of approximately $2,000,000 for a building alone, and that would put up a very excellent structure if a building of the monumental type is not to be selected. In brief, the Government would be able to get substantially the same results in providing space that is now attained by private interest in erecting a first-class modern office building.

In conclusion I wish to say that I feel sure from the spirit of fairness which has uniformly characterized the actions of the Appropriations Committee in dealing with matters of this kind in the past that its members will be impressed not only with the lack of fairness and injustice that will result from depriving the people of Portland and its environs of the excess between the market value of the present site and the estimated cost of the projected building, but also with the strong equity, increased efficiency, and greater public economy that will accrue to the Government by changing the figures recommended by the Treasury Department so as to provide for the erection of a Federal building at Portland of the size and dimensions recommended by the Portland Chamber of Commerce to cost not less than $2,000,000, and that it will so report, and that the House in its turn will pass a bill directing that a sum of not less than $2,000,000 of the amount authorized to be appropriated by H. R. 278 be apportioned to the city of Portland for the construction of a new Federal building.

THE PUBLIC BUILDINGS BILL

Mr. THATCHER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the triangle public building bill, passed the other day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. THATCHER. Mr. Speaker, I supported both omnibus public buildings bills at the last session, one of which became a law, and the other, though it passed the House, failed of passage in the Senate because of the filibuster there at the session's close. The last-named bill, as H. R. 278, was reintroduced at the present session and on December 19, 1927, passed the House and is now before the Senate. At this session I have again supported this measure and voted for it.

The need for new public buildings, not only in Washington but throughout the entire country, is so urgent that the additional authorization of $100,000,000 carried in H. R. 278 should be made at the earliest possible moment. This sum will be expended in accordance with the provisions of H. R. 6559, which became a law at the last session. It has been so long since we have had a public buildings program and the increased business of the country has been so great that we can not afford to neglect the vital needs involved.

I merely wish to reemphasize my earnest support of these authorization measures. In the Treasury-Post Office Departments appropriation bill for 1929, shortly to be reported, actual appropriations will be included for a number of major public building projects duly recommended and considered, most of which were carried in the special public buildings appropriation bill which passed the House at the last session, but which, like the $100,000,000 authorization bill already mentioned, failed of passage in the Senate because of the filibuster there.

GOVERNOR GENERAL OF THE PHILIPPINES

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I want to call the attention of the House to an article that appeared in a Washington newspaper yesterday morning, and other papers throughout the country, in reference to the appointment of the Governor General of the Philippine Islands, Col. Henry Stimson. The article in part reads as follows:

> The oligarchy, acting on orders from its boss—Senator Manuel Quezon—has called a meeting in Manila of his political followers at which they intend to draw up a plan for a European system of government. This they intend to offer the new Governor General upon his arrival in February. They are telling the people that Quezon has the assurance that such a program will be acceptable to President Coolidge and Stimson.
> If the President and Stimson nail this lie, the oligarchy will then refuse to "cooperate" with the new Governor General. They will give as their excuse the false charge that the home Government has broken faith.

Now, gentlemen, I am in a position to say, because I had spoken with Mr. Quezon before he left Washington, that there is no justification for the statements in this article. It is manifestly unfair to create an atmosphere so unfavorable to any new governor. I do not believe I am violating any confidence when I state that Mr. Quezon told me that the selection and appointment of Colonel Stimson was as favorable as could be expected under existing conditions, and he personally appeared before the Senate committee and indorsed the appointment of Colonel Stimson. Senator Quezon stated that he believes there will be the utmost harmony with the newly appointed governor, and that he and his party would cooperate in every way with the new governor.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. The newspapers have stated that Mr. Quezon commended to the President himself the appointment of Mr. Stimson. I was with Mr. Quezon and heard him talk before he left here, and he did not indicate any such attitude as the article attributes to him. All that he said was quite to the contrary.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. No; and he appeared before the Senate committee and indorsed the selection.

Mr. HERSEY. What newspaper did the gentleman from New York quote from?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The Washington Herald.

Mr. HERSEY. Did it give the name of the reporter or interviewer?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It was the Universal Service in the Herald.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from the Philippine Islands is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. GUEVARA. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, it is very encouraging to learn that conditions in the Philippines are improving. The noble efforts made to attain such a situation are beginning to have the expected results. A new Governor General was appointed and the Filipino people are confident and hopeful that harmony and cooperation will mark the initial step for the economic and political progress of the country. It is to be regretted, however, that while the general conditions of the Philippines are steadily advancing toward cooperation and harmony, stories in the daily papers of this country tending to impair the best of wishes of both Americans and Filipinos are being published. To those who are familiar with the conditions in the Philippines these stories would not do any harm; but for those who follow and learn the course of event through the newspapers, they are certainly poisonous.

The appointment of the new Governor General for the Philippine Islands was heartily indorsed by the Filipino people through their constitutional representatives, and after the appointment was confirmed by the Senate of the United States there was a general rejoicing on the part of all.

I may say, Mr. Speaker, that under present conditions the appointment of Mr. Henry L. Stimson as Governor General of the Philippines will inaugurate a new era of cooperation and harmony. We sincerely hope that a mutual and friendly understanding between the American and Filipino peoples will develop, and in my belief Governor Stimson will be afforded with the most cordial cooperation, so essential for the promotion of the best interests of both countries.

Mr. Stimson is well versed with the affairs of the Philippines, and it is but just to hope that his administration will be above the intrigues so common and frequent in all communities. [Applause.]

Mr. GUEVARA asked for and received unanimous consent to include in his remarks the following telegram to Governor Stimson:

DECEMBER 17, 1927.

Gov. H. L. STIMSON,
32 Liberty Street, New York City:

Once more I heartily congratulate you for the confirmation of your appointment by Senate to-day. Your nomination and confirmation for the governorship of Philippines inaugurates a new era for the islands government and people. I am deeply hopeful that the happiness and prosperity of the Filipino people will be attained during your administration. I have all reasons to expect that Filipinos and Americans in the islands will not deny you their assistance and cooperation for the success of your administration, which will issue to the promotion of the welfare of the inhabitants therein. Permit me also to express the belief that your presence in the islands as its chief executive will restore confidence and faith in the United States, and that mutual and friendly understanding between Americans and Filipinos will be achieved. Please accept my sincere wishes for the success of your administration.

PEDRO GUEVARA,
Philippine Resident Commissioner.

Mr. CHALMERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GUEVARA. Yes.

Mr. CHALMERS. I wish to say that I, too, talked with President Quezon just before he left Washington for his return trip to the Philippine Islands. He said to me that the appointment of Colonel Stimson as Governor General of the Philippine Islands was very acceptable to the Filipino people. Mr. Quezon, as you know, is president of the Philippine Senate.

I spent three weeks in the Philippine Islands this year. I visited some of the Provinces outside of Manila, and I can say from personal observation and investigation that Mr. Quezon represents the best sentiment in the Philippine Islands. He has the confidence of the Filipinos, and when he speaks, as he did to me about the appointment of a Governor General, he speaks with authority and for all the Filipinos. I think it is unfortunate at this time when the President has appointed a man as well qualified as Colonel Stimson to this important work to have an interview of this kind come out in an attempt to make trouble for the new Governor General. [Applause.]

BRIDGE ACROSS RED RIVER NEAR COUSHATTA, LA.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill H. R. 280, a bridge bill, which is of considerable importance at this time.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 280) granting the consent of Congress to the Louisiana Highway Commission to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Red River at or near Coushatta, La.

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the State Highway Commission of Louisiana to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Red River at a point suitable to the interests of navigation at or near Coushatta, La., and in accordance with the provisions of an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion by Mr. DENISON to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

THE WORK OF THE HOUSE

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for one minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objeciton.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, within a few minutes a motion will be made for the House to adjourn, which means that we shall adjourn in accordance with the resolution passed a few days ago, which will bring us back here on January 4, 1928. Before we part I wish to congratulate the membership of the House upon the work already done and to thank the Members on both sides of the Chamber for their cooperation in the doing of that work. We have passed three bills of major importance thus far and a number of minor, though important, matters. I think this a good record and that it is an earnest and an indication of what we may expect when the holidays are over and we come back here to settle down for the real work of the long session, which I hope will not be too long. [Applause.]

I now wish you all a very merry Christmas and a happy, prosperous New Year, and hope that you will all return here on January 4 fit and ready for the work that is before us. [Applause.]

MR. LEHR FESS

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes on a subject of general interest to the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, with the adjournment of to-day's session the House loses one of its most valuable and most valued employees, Mr. Lehr Fess, who has served as parliamentarian of the House under two Speakers, in five Congresses, and over a period of more than eight years—a notable eight years in the parliamentary annals of the House—resigns to-day to resume the practice of law, which he began at the close of the last session of Congress with one of the great legal firms of his State.

I have no doubt that I speak for every Member of the House, and certainly for the Members on this side of the aisle, when I express regret at the decision of Mr. Fess to leave the service of the House. He has discharged the trying duties of that difficult place with unusual tact and capacity. He is unquestionably one of the most efficient men who has occupied that exacting position in the history of the House, and his resignation is a loss both to the House and to the country.

Incidentally, it is interesting to note in this connection that while we hear in practically every session of Congress the suggestion that employees of the House are overpaid, one of the reasons for Mr. Fess's making this change is the financial consideration. We have here an instance in which one of the highest salaried employees at either end of the Capitol is voluntarily giving up his work and going into a new field, with the prospect of increased emolument.

But however successful and however prosperous Mr. Fess may be in his chosen profession—and I am certain he will be both—I am not convinced that his absence from the House is necessarily permanent. Of the six men who immediately preceded Mr. Fess as parliamentarian at the Speaker's table, every one, with a single exception, has eventually returned as a Member of the House. [Applause.] And while, so far as I am aware, Mr. Fess entertains no such ambition, I venture to hope that in the end he will not prove to be an exception to the rule. I am certain that I express the universal sentiment of the Members of this House when I wish him Godspeed and much success and a speedy return. [Applause.]

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, if I may be indulged for just two minutes, I want also to pay tribute to the integrity and modesty and ability of the young man who has been here as parliamentarian clerk of the House for the past eight years. There is no man more modest than he, none with greater integrity, and certainly none who will prove more worthy of the confidence of those with whom he may come in contact, wherever he may go, than Lehr Fess. I have watched him with a great deal of pride. He came here as a young lad and he leaves us as a mature man. He takes into the world the experience which he gathered here, and he will give the world the benefit of that experience in the building up of a better life in the community to which he goes. I wish him Godspeed, good health, good luck, and the greatest success in his future endeavors. [Applause.]

BRIDGE ACROSS MISSOURI RIVER AT ST. JOSEPH, MO.

Mr. FAUST. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 5547) granting the consent of Congress to the city of St. Joseph, in the State of Missouri, or its assigns, to construct a bridge and approaches thereto across the Missouri River between the States of Missouri and Kansas, which I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, the understanding was that no business would be done in the House, and the calling up of bills by unanimous consent is doing business. I have no personal objection to this bill, but I do have objection to the general practice of breaking our agreements. It is the way in which things are "put over" sometimes when it should not be done.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I can not allow the statement of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORTON D. HULL] to go unchallenged. It was never stated, so far as I know, that no business would be done to-day. On the other hand, it has been definitely understood that nothing other than unanimous-consent matters, where one Member could stop it, would be considered. There was no agreement, at least I never entered into any such agreement, that there should be no unanimous-consent requests made to-day.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. I withdraw the objection. I think that is the general impression on the part of many Members of the House, notwithstanding.

Mr. OLDFIELD. If the gentleman will yield; is this a toll bridge?

Mr. FAUST. This is a toll-free bridge across the Missouri River which will be part of the United States highway 36.

Mr. BLANTON. How can it be a toll and free bridge?

Mr. FAUST. I mean free of toll.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I shall not, I wish to say just a word in this connection. One of the greatest abuses that the House of Representatives has ever known was the promiscuous calling up of bills and the asking for unanimous consent for their present consideration. Abuses under that system became so bad that the present rule was adopted setting aside a day for the consideration of matters by unanimous consent, so that everybody, every Member of the House, would know that a bill could or could not be brought up. Why, it used to be the practice to have a Member who was opposed to a bill, called out into the lobby on the plea of some important consultation [laughter], and then, during his absence, to bring the bill up by unanimous consent and pass it, the Member making the request for unanimous consent having previously gone to the Speaker's room and made arrangements to be recognized. Nobody here knew anything about the bill, and the man who knew all about it and was opposed to it was out of the Chamber. In my judgment there ought to be a rigid enforcement of the present rule. It provides the only way to legislate intelligently here when there is a request for unanimous consent. Every Member of the House is entitled to have ample notice when a bill may or may not come up. I shall not now object, but I shall object if any other attempt of this kind is made to-day or hereafter.

The SPEAKER. May I make a remark in this connection? I agree with the gentleman from Wisconsin that this is an undesirable method of bringing up a bill, bridge bills or others; and the Chair has refused since his occupancy to recognize gentlemen to bring up bridge bills by unanimous consent unless he was assured that the question of time was an important factor. The Chair was told by the gentleman from Missouri that it was very important this bill should be passed to-day, because, for one reason, if it was not taken up to-day it could not be taken up until the third Monday in January, and therefore the Chair recognized him.

Mr. FAUST. May I just say to my friend that this is a little different from the ordinary bridge bill in the different parts of the United States, in that the highway commissioners of the States of Missouri and Kansas gave approximately one-fourth of the cost of this bridge. The balance of the cost is borne by the city of St. Joseph, which has issued bonds, and we are very anxious to get the work started upon it. I had no intention of violating any rule or understanding of the House, but I would appreciate having it passed at this time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the city of St. Joseph, in the county of Buchanan and State of Missouri, a municipal corporation duly organized and existing under and by virtue of the laws of the State of Missouri, relative to cities of the first class, to construct, maintain, and operate a free highway bridge and approaches thereto across the Missouri River at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, between a point in Buchanan County, State of Missouri, and a point opposite in Doniphan County, State of Kansas, south of the present railway bridge owned and operated by the St. Joseph & Grand Island Railway Co., in accordance with the provisions of an act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. There is hereby conferred upon the city of St. Joseph, its successors and assigns, all such rights and powers to enter upon lands and to acquire, condemn, occupy, possess, and use real estate and other property needed for the location, construction, operation, and maintenance of such bridge and its approaches, as are possessed by railroad corporations for railroad purposes or by bridge corporations for bridge purposes in the State in which such real estate or other property is located, upon making just compensation therefor, to be ascertained and paid according to the laws of such State, and the proceedings therefor shall be the same as in the condemnation and expropriation of property in such State.

The committee amendment was read, as follows:

"SEC. 3. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FAUST. Mr. Speaker, I offer another amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, line 7, after the word "Kansas," strike out the following: "south of the present railway bridge owned and operated by the St. Joseph & Grand Island Railway Co."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

MR. LEHR FESS

The SPEAKER. Before adjournment the Chair would ask the indulgence of the House for a moment. In supplement of what was said by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN], it is with genuine regret that the Chair contemplates the retirement of our parliamentarian, Mr. Lehr Fess.

The gentleman from Missouri has well expressed our appreciation of the unusual tact and capacity with which Mr. Fess has filled this position and our appreciation of his long and faithful service. To myself he has been a tower of strength, as I believe every gentleman who has occupied this Chair during the consideration of business in the Committee of the Whole feels. I know we all wish for him great success in his chosen field. [Applause.]

The Chair is also happy to say that he thinks his place will be worthily filled by Mr. Louis Deschler, who has entered upon the duties of this position with the greatest interest and enthusiasm. I wish for him a career parallel to that of Mr. Fess.

And now, just a word before we adjourn. I want to congratulate this House on being the most efficient lawmaking body in existence. [Applause.] We have passed three vitally important major pieces of legislation in less than two weeks. You have well deserved your holiday, and I wish you all a merry Christmas and happy New Year. [Applause.]

DEATH OF SENATOR A. A. JONES OF NEW MEXICO

Mr. MORROW. Mr. Speaker, I rise to make an announcement. It is with profound sorrow that I perform my duty by announcing to this body the death last night of Hon. A. A. JONES, senior Senator from the State of New Mexico.

Mr. JONES has for 40 years been an outstanding figure in the development and in the affairs of the State of New Mexico. Coming to that State in 1885 he engaged in the profession of public-school teaching in the town of Las Vegas, which has since been his home; he entered the profession of law in 1888 and rose to first rank in that profession. He served as president of the New Mexico Bar Association in 1893.

His political career began as mayor of Las Vegas in that same year, 1893; he next served as United States district attorney, and has been active in the political affairs of the State from that time to the present. He served as Assistant Secretary of the Interior under Secretary Lane and in 1916 was elected United States Senator, succeeding himself in 1922. He was in the closing year of his second term as United States Senator.

He has been an honor to the State and an efficient legislator in the Senate. In the death of Senator JONES, New Mexico has met with an irreparable loss, and the Congress of the United States has lost a valuable and faithful statesman.

I offer the following resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Mexico offers a resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 68

Resolved, That a committee of 12 Members be appointed on the part of the House, to join the committee appointed on the part of the Senate to attend the funeral.

COLUMBIA RIVER BRIDGE

Mr. JONES. I ask that House bill 6657, which was sent to the Senate just before the holiday recess, be laid before the Senate and read at length.

The bill (H. R. 6657) to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Columbia River near Kettle Falls, Wash., was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the times for commencing and completing the construction of the bridge authorized by the act of Congress approved January 26, 1925, across the Columbia River, at or near Kettle Falls, Wash., are hereby extended one and three years, respectively, from the date of approval hereof.

SEC. 2. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, the Congress has already passed a bill providing for the construction of a bridge at this point across the Columbia River, and the House bill simply provides for the extension of time of an act heretofore granting that right. The Commerce Committee authorized me to call up the bill, and ask that it be put on its passage.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SUBMARINE SAFETY DEVICES

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs:

To the Congress of the United States:

I transmit herewith a letter from the Secretary of the Navy recommending that the Congress be requested to authorize the appointment of a commission of experts for the purpose of considering the development of safety devices for our submarines, such commission to be empowered to call witnesses and to pay their expenses, and also to make such inquiry and investigation into the S–4 disaster as may be desirable.

I recommend to Congress the passage of a joint resolution authorizing the appointment of such a commission of experts, and that the sum of $20,000 be made available for the purposes stated.

CALVIN COOLIDGE.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 4, 1928.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, out of order I ask unanimous consent to introduce a joint resolution, and that it may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 56) providing for a commission to investigate and report upon the facts connected with the sinking of the submarine S–4, and upon methods and appliances for the protection of submarines, was read the first time by its title, and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized and requested to appoint a commission which shall be composed of five members, three of whom shall be selected from civil life and two shall be retired officers of the Navy. Vacancies occurring in the membership of the commission shall be filled in the same manner as provided for original appointments.

SEC. 2. It shall be the duty of the commission to investigate and ascertain the methods and appliances adopted and used by the Navy in the operation of submarines to prevent collisions, to protect the lives of officers and crews, and to salvage the vessel in case of disaster; and to make recommendations wherein these methods and appliances now in use may be changed and improved for the good of the service and the better protection of human life.

SEC. 3. It shall be the further duty of the commission to investigate the full facts of the sinking of the submarine S–4 in collision on December 17, 1927, with the United States Coast Guard destroyer Paulding off the Massachusetts coast, and the rescue and salvage operations carried on by the United States Navy subsequent thereto, to supplement the investigation now being made by a naval court of inquiry.

SEC. 4. To carry out and give effect to the provisions of this resolution the commission hereby created shall have power to issue subpœnas, administer oaths, summon witnesses, require the production of books and papers, and receive testimony taken before any proper officer in any State or Territory of the United States.

SEC. 5. The members of the commission shall select a chairman from among their number; they shall serve without compensation as such, but shall be paid out of the amount appropriated their actual and necessary traveling, hotel, and other expenses incurred in the discharge of their duties by such officer of the Supply Corps of the Navy as the Secretary of the Navy may designate, upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the commission, which approval shall be conclusive upon the General Accounting Office. Nothing herein shall affect the pay or allowances of the commissioners selected from the Navy. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $20,000, to be expended by the commission in accordance with the provisions of this resolution. The President is authorized, upon request of the commission, to designate such personnel of any department or Government establishment, including the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, and Coast Guard, as may be necessary to assist in carrying out the purpose of this resolution.

SEC. 6. The commission shall, as soon as practicable, submit a full report to Congress, by way of the President, giving the results of its investigation and its recommendations. All records of the commission, upon the completion of its duties, shall be deposited with the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the joint resolution, which carries out the recommendations embodied in the message of the President of the United States, speaks for itself.

The whole country has been inexpressibly shocked over the recent sinking of the submarine S–4 and the terrible, lingering death of the six men shut up for long hours in the forward torpedo room of the submarine before a merciful death at length overtook them.

That every possible measure was taken by the Navy Department to rescue these men the Navy believes to be the case. I, myself, believe it to be the case, and so doubtless do many Senators here present; but it is not enough that such is our belief. It is not enough that a naval court of inquiry, the usual court to make investigation in cases of this kind, shall sit and report its findings pro or con.

The people of the country are stirred up over this tragedy of the sea as I have never known them to be over any other disaster in naval history with the exception of the blowing up of the battleship Maine in the harbor of Habana in 1898. If their pride and belief in their Navy is to be kept up, and without such pride and belief an adequate Navy never can be maintained, they must be convinced beyond peradventure of doubt that the United States Navy does care for its men, that it does provide every feasible means of safety for its men, and that it does employ its utmost resources to rescue the victims of disaster.

The fair name of the Navy demands that the verdict for or against the Navy shall be delivered by a commission that all men must know to be impartial.

For such a commission the President, in his wisdom, has asked us to appropriate. The civilian appointees, I understand, will be experts who have attained high rank in the engineering world.

The Secretary of the Navy is in hearty accord with the purposes of the joint resolution, and I believe that the Senate will unanimously approve its passage.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, does the Senator ask for the passage of the joint resolution this morning?

Mr. HALE. I ask that the joint resolution be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so referred.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, in connection with what has just been said by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], I should like to have printed in the RECORD a letter addressed by me to the Senator from Maine a few days ago with reference to this proposed investigation; also a letter which is typical of many letters received from constituents requesting an investigation into the S–4 disaster.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

DECEMBER 31, 1927.

Hon. FREDERICK HALE,
Chairman Senate Committee on Naval Affairs,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR HALE: During my several days in Massachusetts I have found that the accident to the S–4 has aroused public sentiment and provoked discussion in a greater degree than any occurrence in recent years. There has been widespread criticism upon the part of newspaper writers and others who were at Provincetown, apart from the general feeling that there is a lack of adequate protection for the men engaged in submarine service. Even though it should ultimately appear that all of this proceeds from lack of knowledge of the possibilities in dealing with such matters, public confidence can alone be restored by such an investigation as will make clear the facts.

In order that it may not be said in the future than an investigation was made only by officers or officials of the department directly concerned I feel that this matter should be gone into by the Naval Affairs Committee through the appointment of a subcommittee which would be given ample powers to make the most thorough inquiry. Let the general public, as well as naval officers, who have constructive criticism or helpful suggestions to offer, be heard.

It seems to me that no more important question can engage our attention than the protection of the lives of the men serving in the national defense, and that we would be remiss in our duty to them and to our whole people did we not at least clear for all time from their minds the doubts and misgivings which have gone out from Provincetown. I am requesting that upon the reconvening of the Senate you lay this matter before the committee for consideration.

Faithfully yours,

DAVID I. WALSH.

EASTERN STATES ASSOCIATION,
NATIONAL RAILWAY LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL
NEW YORK AND NEW ENGLAND,
West Springfield, Mass., January 1, 1928.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR WALSH: The tragic and heartbreaking sinking of our naval submarine S–4, with the subsequent incompetent and futile rescue and salvage operations, has made most of us heartily ashamed of our present naval administration. As boys and as men we have glorified in the records of our Navy, always proud of its achievements, proud of its heroes, ready always to defend it from unjust criticism, and satisfied that it was the greatest in the world. To-day that feeling is gone. On street car or in shops, offices, lodge rooms, and even in our churches, that tower of strength that we have glorified in has tumbled into ashes at our feet. The knowledge that many of the boys on that boat—perhaps most of them—were alive for days after it sank, to lie there and die, perhaps the hardest of all deaths, in shallow water, on their own home shores, because of an incompetent naval administration, has shaken us to our very soul and has made us, one and all, ashamed of the men at the head of our Navy.

Senator, I want you, and I ask you on behalf of the boys of this boat, on behalf of their families and loved ones, on behalf of the men of the Navy, and, last of all, on behalf of the people all over the country, to force through a full and complete investigation of this catastrophe. It will not be enough for us to have a naval board of inquiry hold an investigation and come out with a report that will be a virtual whitewash of the very men that were responsible and try and place the blame on some of the men that sank with their ship. Neither do we want a half-hearted investigation by your Naval Affairs Committee. Some of the men of your committee may be partly responsible for existing conditions; but in any event they have worked hand in hand in the past with the Navy Department. The Navy to-day has the blackest blot that was ever on its history, and the only thing that will count is to have an impartial and competent board of red-blooded men get at the real facts, make a full public report, and force the Navy Department to consider the safety of their men and to take proper safeguards against a repetition of such an accident.

I am in earnest about this, Senator; more so than anything I have ever taken up before. I know that the people of Massachusetts and, for that matter, all over the land feel as I do, and the time to do it is now.

One thing more. Sunday's press reports indicate that the divers have found several of the main compartments of the boat intact and not flooded with water, so that it is not a water-logged hull that the Navy has tried to make us believe it is; but the Navy will flood it, and this makes it all the more imperative for a full investigation to be started at once, even before the boat is salvaged, so that the committee may obtain first-hand information and the real facts, as it will mean everything to the success of this investigation to have these facts, so that they will not have to accept a naval-censored report.

There is a great deal more that I would like to write about, but I feel that I have said enough; and in closing, Senator, let me again ask you to go through with this. * * *

Very truly yours,

FRANK A. CHASE.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, when the Senator from Maine introduced his joint resolution I rose primarily for the purpose of asking that it be broadened in its scope, so that not only the disaster to which the resolution referred might be investigated, but other disasters, some 18 or 20, which have happened in the Navy during the past few years, and particularly one where a submarine was sunk, and another where a number of ships were lost on the California coast.

I sincerely hope that when the Committee on Naval Affairs considers the resolution which was referred to it it will likewise consider the propriety of including within the scope of the resolution a broad and general investigation of the character that I have indicated.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I think it would be well to confine this investigation as far as possible to submarine disasters. I expect within a very short time to call a meeting of the Committee on Naval Affairs to consider the resolution which I have introduced, and I can assure the Senator that we shall be very glad to hear him if he will come before the committee and state his views.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. KEYES. From the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds I report back favorably, with an amendment, the bill (H. R. 483) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to acquire certain lands within the District of Columbia to be used as sites for public buildings.

Mr. President, this bill was passed by the Senate at the last session. It has already been passed by the House at the present session. It seems to me very desirable that action be taken on this matter as promptly as possible; and, as I anticipate that it will be disposed of in a very few minutes, I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, before unanimous consent is granted, may I ask my colleague just what is the scope of the bill?

Mr. SMOOT. It relates to the so-called "Triangle."

Mr. McKELLAR. May I ask the Senator what property is proposed to be bought under the bill?

Mr. KEYES. This is the so-called "Triangle" bill. It includes all of the property not now owned by the Government between Pennsylvania Avenue and the Mall and extending from Fifteenth Street down to the Botanical Gardens.

Mr. McKELLAR. It would take in all of the south side of the Avenue?

Mr. KEYES. It takes in all of the south side of the Avenue.

Mr. BORAH. What is to be the cost of it?

Mr. WILLIS. What is the expenditure involved?

Mr. KEYES. The authorization is $25,000,000, the same as last year.

Mr. WILLIS. I desire to submit an interrogatory to the Senator.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I suggest that the bill go over until after the morning business is completed.

Mr. SMOOT. I hope the Senator will not object to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. ASHURST. Let us have one session of Congress proceed in order. Why not let the bill go over until after the morning business shall have been disposed of?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I will say to the Senator from Utah that the suggestion of the Senator from Arizona is perfectly proper.

Mr. SMOOT. It is a proper suggestion, of course.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Senators have been waiting for an opportunity to present morning business and have it disposed of.

Mr. SMOOT. I did not think the matter would take long.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made, and the bill will go over temporarily.

FLOOD CONTROL FOR THE LOWER MISSISSIPPI

Mr. CARAWAY. I present a resolution and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I shall not object to the presentation of the resolution of the Senator from Arkansas, but after that shall have been done I hope we may proceed with the regular order and complete the morning business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Petitions and memorials are in order.

Mr. CURTIS. I repeat I do not object to the Senator from Arkansas presenting his resolution, but after that I shall insist upon the regular order.

Mr. CARAWAY. The resolution merely asks for information.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 90), as follows:

Whereas it has been suggested that the tentative report of the Chief of Engineers dealing with flood protection for the valley of the lower Mississippi contained an estimate for a very much larger sum than the amount named in the report filed; and

Whereas it is reported that it contained no recommendation for local contributions; and

Whereas it is reported that the original estimate and recommendations of the Mississippi River Commission for said purpose likewise contained estimate for a very much larger cost; and

Whereas it is reported to have contained no recommendation for local contributions: Now therefore be it

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, requested to furnish to the Senate said preliminary estimates, or suggestions and recommendations, if any, of both the Chief of Engineers of the Army and the Mississippi River Commission touching flood control for the valley of the lower Mississippi.

Mr. CARAWAY. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I inquire if the resolution is directed to the President?

Mr. CARAWAY. Oh, no; it merely calls on the Secretary of War for certain information.

Mr. BRUCE. What is the motion, Mr. President?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arkansas requests unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution which has just been read.

Mr. BRUCE. Very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and agreed to.

MEMORIAL OF A BOTTLE OF MADEIRA

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I present a memorial and ask that it may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

THE MEMORIAL OF A BOTTLE OF FINE OLD MADEIRA TO CONGRESS

Your memorialist respectfully represents—

1. That it is wine of high repute, derived from an ancient vintage, and always kept carefully bottled and corked in a dark cellar, admirably adapted to the conservation of its flavor and aroma; and that, mellowed by time, it has now reached the stage of maturity at which a connoisseur would unhesitatingly set it down as a perfect thing of its kind, and even a sincere and consistent prohibitionist could not be safely trusted to resist its allurements.

2. That your memorialist is conscious of no wrongdoing whatever with which it can be justly reproached; that wine has been drunk from time immemorial; that the Holy Scriptures declare that a man hath no better thing under the sun than to eat, and to drink, and to be merry; and that nothing in the whole range of physical enjoyment has a larger share of innocent human happiness to its credit than wine.

3. That, if wine is sometimes consumed to excess in the United States, surely that is not its fault, but the fault only of the vulgarian or beast who is so ungrateful as to forget the benefits that it bestows upon human beings, when not abused, and to abuse it; that, drunk in moderation, it is but a good, familiar creature, fitted as few other things are to stimulate mental vivacity, to foster social sympathy, and to brighten moments that would otherwise be given over to vacuity or tedium; that, just as Christ thought that the joy of the marriage feast, at Cana, would be incomplete without wine, and supplied the lack of it by a miracle, so, in all the truly civilized countries of the world, it is thought that a wedding, a dinner party, a family reunion, or any occasion, where the warm currents of the human heart have been set in motion by some unusually cordial impulse, is but a dull or sorry affair unless enlivened by a bottle or so of wine; that, from the time of Anacreon until the present day, its sparkling spirit has been the very soul of a great body of lyrical poetry, of every feast, and of every occasion graced by woman and inspirited by song; that the number of persons who can not drink wine except immoderately is but a small percentage of the whole, and are the victims not so much of its strength as of their own weakness; that it is the business of Government by wholesome laws to regulate and control such weakness; and that it is the grossest absurdity and injustice for it to allow such weakness, in defiance of the normal instincts of human nature, the dictates of human reason, and the reasonable demands of human liberty to be made the occasion for depriving millions of human beings who can use wine moderately, of a legitimate privilege which they highly prize; that temperance in the use of wine is a virtue, but that total abstinence from its use indicates either the kind of sobriety which La Rochefoucauld affirmed was a mere physical incapacity for strong drink, a totally false philosophy of life, or a Puritanical spirit which mistakes its own sour narrow-mindedness for the precepts of God and morality; that the legislative prohibition of wine does not evidence an advanced community but, on the contrary, one so backward and so lacking in self-restraint and refinement of manners that it feels impelled to resort to extreme police measures which are deemed wholly tyrannical and unnecessary by more polished societies; that in Paris, for instance, the use of wine is, for all practical purposes, universal among all orders of men, and that yet so rarely is a Parisian under its influence that when a man is seen in that condition in Paris he may almost with perfect confidence be set down as an American; and that, even if the degree of drunkenness in the United States for which those ardent sisters of your memorialist—whisky, brandy, and gin—are responsible, were sufficient to warrant their absolute interdiction (which your memorialist denies), that would be no good reason why such mild beverages as wine and its humbler sisters—beer, ale, porter, and the like—should also be prohibited.

4. That, nevertheless, an amendment to the Federal Constitution has gone into effect which should never have been initiated by your honorable body; that it was ratified in an hour of hysteria, brought about by the overstrained feelings of the World War and of political fears and hopes produced by the enormous sums of money expended by the Anti-Saloon League in browbeating or bribing legislative and other candidates; and that such are its crass folly and monstrous injustice that it actually undertakes to denounce as a criminal every beverage, except watery fruit juices, that contains an alcoholic content of as much as one-half of 1 per cent.

Wherefore your memorialist prays that this honorable body unite with the House of Representatives in taking such steps as will speedily bring to an end the vile tyranny that seeks to work its utter ruin, and will restore it to the honored place that it had in the social life of the United States before national prohibition established its odious régime of hypocrisy, perfidy, general disrespect for law, political corruption, and bloodshed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The memorial will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I should like to inquire who signed the memorial which has just been read?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maryland can answer that question.

Mr. BRUCE. The memorial is not signed. I will say to the Senator from Idaho, but it is headed "The memorial of a bottle of fine old Madeira to Congress."

Mr. BORAH. Oh, yes.

Mr. KING. It is signed by "Mr. Wine."

Mr. HEFLIN. If it be permissible at this time, I should like to ask who wrote it.

Mr. BRUCE. As the Senator from Alabama seems to think it not badly written, I will admit that I wrote it at the request of the memorialist.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE

Mr. President, Senate bill 1792, to divest goods, wares, and merchandise manufactured, produced, or mined by convicts or prisoners of their interstate character in certain cases, introduced by me on December 15, at my request was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor. AFFAIRS IN NICARAGUA

Mr. HEFLIN. I send to the clerk's desk a joint resolution, which I ask to have read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be read.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 57) requesting the President to immediately withdraw the armed forces of the United States from Nicaragua was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Whereas the Government of the United States is founded upon the principle of self-government; and

Whereas it is incumbent upon the constituted authorities of the United States to recognize and respect at all times the right of self-government in other nations; and

Whereas the sending of armed forces by the United States into a neighboring Republic for the purpose of overthrowing a government resulting from the expressed will of the people is wrong, inexcusable, and indefensible; and

Whereas President Coolidge, in sending armed forces into Nicaragua to protect and defend Diaz, the imposter and usurper, and hold him in the office of President, to which he was never elected, and against the will of the people, is an act of imperialistic tyranny and a crime against the natives of Nicaragua who love the principles of self-government well enough to fight and die for them; and

Whereas the Constitution of the United States provides that Congress and Congress alone shall declare war; and

Whereas soldiers of the United States are now and have been for months engaged in war in defense of the Diaz régime in Nicaragua, and losing their lives, in violation of the Constitution of the United States; and

Whereas the forcing of United States soldiers to carry on war and sacrifice their lives in such a cause in Nicaragua—in the absence of a declaration of war by Congress and in violation of the Constitution of the United States—deserves the condemnation of all loyal Americans and calls for immediate action by Congress: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the President be, and he is hereby, requested to immediately withdraw from Nicaragua the armed forces of the United States.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, I am compelled to object.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I wonder if the Senator would be willing to have the resolution referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. HEFLIN. I will withdraw my request for immediate consideration and ask that the joint resolution may be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

CLAIMS OF GRAIN ELEVATORS, ETC.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD introduced a joint resolution (S. J. Res. 59) authorizing the President to ascertain, adjust, and pay certain claims of grain elevators and grain firms to cover insurance and interest on wheat during the years 1919 and 1920, as per a certain contract authorized by the President, which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and, on request of Mr. SHIPSTEAD, ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[S. J. Res. 59]

Joint resolution authorizing the President to ascertain, adjust, and pay certain claims of grain elevators and grain firms to cover insurance and interest on wheat during the years 1919 and 1920, as per a certain contract authorized by the President

Whereas it is provided in the act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel (c. 53, 40 Stat. L., approved August 10, 1917, and c. 125, 40 Stat. L., approved March 4, 1919), wherein the President was authorized to determine and fix a guaranteed price to be paid producers of wheat, and wherein the President was further authorized as follows:

"Whenever the President shall find it essential, in order to carry out the guarantees aforesaid, or to protect the United States against undue enhancement of its liabilities thereunder, he is authorized to make reasonable compensation for handling, transportation, insurance, and other charges with respect to wheat and wheat flour of said crops and for storage thereof in elevators, on farms, and elsewhere;" and

Whereas the President by an Executive order (No. 3087), dated May 14, 1919, in pursuance of the power conferred on him by said act, did order as follows:

"I further find it essential, and hereby direct, that in order to carry out the guarantees made producers of wheat of the crops of 1919, and to protect the United States against undue enhancement of its liabilities thereunder, the United States wheat director utilize the services of the Food Administration Grain Corporation (now the United States Grain Corporation by reason of a change of name authorized by Executive order), as an agency of the United States, and I authorize the Food Administration Grain Corporation * * * to enter into such voluntary agreements to make such arrangements and to do and perform all such acts and things as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of said act;" and

Whereas the United States Grain Corporation in pursuance of said Executive order, and for the purpose of carrying out and making effective the guaranteed price, made, and entered into, a certain contract, known as "the grain dealers' agreement," with various independent and farmer grain firms and grain elevator companies in Montana, North Dakota, South Dakota, Minnesota, Nebraska, Kansas, Iowa, Missouri, Wyoming, and Oklahoma, and wherein it was agreed as follows:

"Fourth. In case the dealer (the elevator firms) shall be unable, after using every effort and all diligence, to ship in any week such total of grain as makes the equivalent of at least 20 per cent of the amount of wheat in his elevator and owned by him at the beginning of such week, the grain corporation shall pay to the dealer to cover insurance and interest for such week seven-twentieths of a cent per bushel on the wheat in the elevator owned by him at the beginning of such week;" and

Whereas the President, in an Executive order dated August 21, 1920, did approve, ratify, and confirm all acts done or authorized by the said United States Grain Corporation in carrying out and making the guaranteed price effective; and

Whereas a number of claims of the said grain dealers, for money earned under said contract, still remains unpaid, and are now justly due said claimants: Therefore it is

Resolved, etc., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to ascertain the amounts due on said claims, and he is further authorized to adjust and pay said claims, as ascertained to be due said claimants, out of any funds now in the hands of the United States Grain Corporation, and belonging to the United States, or out of the funds in the United States Treasury, not otherwise appropriated, and the President is authorized to make payment thereof therefrom to the several persons entitled thereto, as their respective interests may appear.

Mr. ODDIE submitted three amendments intended to be proposed by him to the Interior Department appropriation bill for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed, as follows:

At the proper place in the bill add the following:

"For paying the Truckee-Carson irrigation district, Fallon, Nev., the proportionate share of the benefits assessed by said district against 5,480 acres of Paiute Indian lands within the Newlands irrigation project for the years 1919 to 1927, both inclusive, $4,438.80: Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior shall hereafter annually ascertain for submission to Congress the amount of such assessments as they may accrue."

At the proper place in the bill add the following:

"For reimbursing the Truckee-Carson irrigation district, Fallon, Nev., the proportionate share of the drainage construction costs for 4,877.3 irrigable acres of Paiute Indian lands with the Newlands irrigation project, $16,972."

At the proper place in the bill add the following:

"For paying the Truckee-Carson irrigation district, Fallon, Nev., the proportionate share of the benefits assessed by said district against 4,877.3 irrigable acres of Paiute Indian lands within the Newlands irrigation project for necessary repairs to the Truckee Canal to restore said canal to its original capacity, $10,096.01."

RADIO EQUIPMENT FOR THE SENATE

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I have a Senate resolution to offer that I should like to have read and then referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. I would like to say just a word about the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 92), as follows:

Resolved, That the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate is hereby directed, at as early a date as practicable, to equip the desk of each individual Senator with the proper electrical connections to which a microphone for radio broadcasting may be attached, and also to install a microphone control switchboard to enable connection of each microphone with the broadcasting station as may be desired during the Senate proceedings, and the necessary expense for such installation of electrical connections and equipment is hereby authorized to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

The Committee on Rules of the Senate is hereby authorized to make arrangements for the broadcasting of such proceedings of the Senate as the committee may determine through such radio broadcasting stations as it may be possible to arrange for broadcasting without expense to the Senate or the Government.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I shall not discuss the resolution at length now, but I do want to call attention to the fact that this proposal will not entail any great expense. The cost of the wiring of the desks and providing for electrical connections by which the proceedings could be broadcast would not be large. I am reliably informed that there are broadcasting organizations in the country that will be glad to broadcast the debates of the Senate which might be determined upon as provided by the Committee on Rules.

I recognize that no parliamentary body has ever provided for radio broadcasting of its proceedings, but that is no reason why the Senate should not consider doing so. In fact, this body should set the example by passing this resolution.

Radio stations have broadcast the inaugural address of a President. Only recently the House of Representatives had a movietone taken of its opening, and anyone who saw the audiences watch and listen to the results of that were profoundly impressed. The interest of the American people in the proceedings of the National Congress will be tremendously increased and public opinion will be clarified and strengthened in regard to this body.

At some later time I shall discuss at length the full import of this resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Roche, late a messenger employed as assistant doorkeeper under the direction of the Sergeant at Arms, a sum equal to six months' compensation at the rate he was receiving by law at the time of his death, said sum to be considered inclusive of funeral expenses and all other allowances.

LILLIAN NEAL

Mr. CURTIS submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 97), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Mr. BRATTON submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 99), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

ANDRIEUS A. JONES, late a Senator from the State of New Mexico, upon vouchers properly approved.

INVESTMENTS IN FOREIGN COUNTRIES

Mr. NYE submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 100), which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

Whereas war is contrary to the progress of civilization and injurious to trade and commerce; and

Whereas the peoples of all countries are petitioning for the blessings of continued peace and prosperity; and

Whereas with this thought in mind, the Monroe doctrine promulgated by President Monroe in 1823 asserted the principle (to which we have steadfastly adhered) "that the American continents, by the free and independent condition which they have assumed and maintained, are henceforth not to be considered as subject for further colonization by any European powers"; and that we should consider any contrary action "dangerous to our peace and safety"; and

Whereas the progress of events and the economic development of the vast natural resources of Central and South America, including the West Indies, through the expansion and enterprise of our financial powers, have now rendered necessary a further pronouncement upon our part to the effect that, as stated by former Secretary of State Charles E. Hughes, we do not intend "to superintend the affairs of our sister Republics, to assert an overlordship, to consider the spread of our authority beyond our own domain as the aim of our policy, and to make our power the test of right in this hemisphere"; and

Whereas the United States has declared that it has never given nor intends to give any such guaranty and protection: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Senate of the United States hereby affirms that it shall never be the policy of the United States to guarantee nor protect by force the investments and properties of its citizens in foreign countries, and that we will hereafter, both in theory and practice, pursue the same policy in respect to any controversial questions arising therefrom or related thereto when dealing with small and weak nations that we recognize and follow in dealings with nations of the first class; namely;

That whenever any of our citizens invest their funds in foreign countries they become, in so far as such investments are concerned, to all intents and purposes citizens of such countries, and are thereby entitled to and subject to the protection and provisions of the laws of such countries, with, however, the additional right of appeal to their own Government (should any controversial questions arise in respect to such investments or properties) to the extent that whenever such claims appear to be justified our Government will assist them through its good offices, and cooperate with them in presenting their claims, with a view to bringing about an amicable adjustment of any such difficulties; but that the United States will in no case forcibly interfere in the orderly settlement of such controversies, nor utilize its Army, Navy, or Marine Corps, or otherwise employ force with a view to demanding or achieving the settlement of such claims; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to the President of the United States with the request that he publicly proclaim this doctrine of self-determination as being an integral part of the policy of the United States from now on, and memorialize the other nations of the world with the expressed hope that they, by taking similar action, will assist in conferring the blessings of peace and prosperity upon all their peoples.

INVESTIGATION OF NAVAL OIL RESERVE LEASES

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I submit a Senate resolution, which I ask the clerk to read for the information of the Senate. It had been my intention to ask unanimous consent for its present consideration, but upon talking with some Senators I have been requested to let it go over under the rule, so that at the conclusion of the reading of the resolution I myself will ask that it go over until to-morrow under the rule.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will read.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 101), as follows:

Whereas in the Sixty-seventh Congress the Senate passed Senate Resolutions 282 and 294, which resolutions directed the Committee on Public Lands to investigate the entire subject of the leases upon naval oil reserves with particular reference to the protection of the rights and equities of the Government of the United States and the preservation of its natural resources; and

Whereas said committee never completed said investigation, the same having been suspended because of the refusal of one Harry F. Sinclair to answer the questions of the committee, and said committee has never made any final report to the Senate; and

Whereas in the case of the United States against Harry F. Sinclair and Albert B. Fall it was disclosed upon the trial that a fraudulent corporation, known as the Continental Trading Co. of Canada, had been organized for the purpose of using the profits of its business in the bribing of public officials of the United States and for other dishonest, dishonorable, and illegal purposes; and

Whereas it was disclosed upon said trial that profits of said corporation were invested in Liberty bonds of the United States and that only a portion of said Liberty bonds so invested had been definitely traced and accounted for and that a large amount of Liberty bonds coming into the hands of said fraudulent corporation had been unaccounted for and unexplained: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the said Committee on Public Lands be, and it is hereby, authorized and directed to renew and to continue the investigation provided for in said resolutions 282 and 294, and said resolutions are hereby renewed as fully and as completely as though they were herein fully set forth; and be it further

Resolved, That said committee is specifically directed to make an investigation as to the transactions and activities of the said fraudulent corporation, the Continental Trading Co. of Canada, and it is specifically directed to trace all the Government bonds held and dealt in by said corporation with the purpose of ascertaining the beneficiary or beneficiaries of all the illegal transactions connected with the fraudulent and dishonest sale or leasing of the said naval oil reserves.

Mr. NORRIS. I now ask, at the request of several Senators, that the resolution may go over under the rule.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will go over under the rule.

CONTROL OF ARMY AND NAVY AND AIR SERVICE

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, I present a concurrent resolution, which I ask may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The concurrent resolution will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 5), as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Military Affairs Committee and the Naval Affairs Committee of the Senate and the House of Representatives be requested to hold joint meetings and take such steps as they may deem necessary to thoroughly investigate the advisability of creating a nonpartisan, nonpolitical board, consisting of five or seven members, who shall have entire control and management (subject to such laws as may be made by the Congress of the United States) of the Army and Navy and Air Service of the United States Government in order that said Army and Navy and air forces may be entirely eliminated from politics and the control of any official of the United States, except the members of the board herein provided for, in order that those in control may not be subject to change in case of the success or defeat of any national political party, and that said committees be requested to report within a reasonable time.

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, I should like to make a short statement in reference to the concurrent resolution, and shall then ask that it be referred to the appropriate committee.

Mr. President, the resolution which I send to the desk does not propose to make any new law, neither does it abolish any positions or create new ones. It is simply a suggestion by which may be put in motion the machinery to help make more efficient the defense of this country.

Recent events, such as the sinking of the submarine S–4, and the inefficiency and incompetency and, I might say, willful negligence in not saving the lives of the men who were entrapped in it, are hardly excusable upon any grounds whatsoever.

The deaths in airplanes, the many wrecks that have occurred, and the recent Bolling Field hangar fire, causing the loss of a half million dollars or more, show that there is something radically wrong with the air service; and certainly there are men being promoted in all branches of the different services who are not entitled to promotion, but who have a political pull, and who are pushed up into higher positions over men who have had longer terms of service and much more distinguished service, which shows a lack of military discipline, and gives the appearance of politics governing the Army.

When we take into consideration the criticism of men who have for many years been connected with the Army and Navy and Air Service since its beginning, we all must admit that there is something wrong in all these departments; for when a man who is familiar with the situation has the nerve and the backbone to try to be of service to the humble privates—who are working, offering their all to the Government, even their lives, in its defense—and endeavors to correct the evils which exist, he is criticized, held up to ridicule and contempt, and often humiliated by being displaced.

I think it is high time that promotions should be made regularly and where deserved, and stop this political bootlicking in order to get a promotion; especially when a man has served or stands ready to serve on the field of battle, not for personal reward to be paid to him or for the plaudits of an excited public for something he has done, but for the defense of the honor of his Nation and the lives of its citizens.

I shall ask to have printed in connection with my remarks the sections of the Constitution in reference to this matter. I certainly hope that the resolution will be adopted and that the committees charged with this investigation will spare no pains to right the wrongs that are being done and to place our country on the very highest pinnacle of perfection for defense; and that this Congress will appropriate sufficient amounts of money to give us the greatest Army, the strongest Navy, and the most competent Air Service that the world has ever known.

We should have a well-clothed, well-housed, well-paid, and, at all times, a strong and thoroughly equipped Army, Navy, and Air Service, commanded by men of experience and of the highest type of character, well trained mentally and physically; and under no conditions should any man be put in command who is cruel to or mistreats his subordinates, for none is a more dastardly coward than the man who uses his authority to abuse those who are serving under him and who are not in a position to protect themselves from his inhumanity.

I am absolutely, and have been all my life and always will be, opposed to military rule, or even calling the militia into service, except in cases of war or the most urgent needs for the protection of homes, lives, and property.

We all fully realize that the best way to wipe out war is to let other people know that we are thoroughly protected, and, if they should attempt to impose upon us, that we can and will destroy them.

I ask to have inserted in my remarks some references to the Constitution of the United States.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES

Article I, section 1, clause 12: The Congress shall have power * * * to raise and support armies, but no appropriation of money to that use shall be for a longer term than two years.

Article I, section 1, clause 13: The Congress shall have power * * * to provide and maintain a Navy.

Article I, section 1, clause 14: The Congress shall have power * * * to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces.

* * * * * * *

The power to establish rules implies necessarily the power to modify or repeal to create anew.

Article II, section 2, clause 1: The President shall be Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and of the Militia of the several States, when called into the actual service of the United States. * * *

* * * * * * *

The President is made Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States at all times, and Commander in Chief of the Militia only when called into the actual service of the United States. (Johnson v. Sayre, 158 U. S. 115.)

As Commander in Chief the President is authorized to direct the movements of the naval and military forces placed under his command (italics added), and to employ them in a manner which he may deem most effectual. By virtue of his position he has undoubted power to establish rules and regulations for the government of the Army and Navy, or may modify or repeal or create them anew, and such rules and regulations can not be questioned on the ground that they are unwise. Army and Navy regulations made pursuant to the authority conferred upon the President [italics added] have the force of law. (Johnson v. Sayre, 158 U. S. 115.)

The power of the President as Commander in Chief must be exercised in accordance with the laws and usages of nations and in the manner prescribed by Congress. (Italics added.)

FORECASTS OF FARM PRICES

On motion of Mr. HARRIS, the resolution (S. Res. 78) opposing the issuance by the Department of Agriculture of unauthorized reports relative to prices of agricultural commodities, submitted by him on December 17, 1927, was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

OKANOGAN PROJECT, WASHINGTON

Mr. JONES. Out of order, I desire to ask permission to report from the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation the bill (S. 1661) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to transfer the Okanogan project, in the State of Washington, to the Okanogan irrigation district upon payment of charges stated, and I submit a report (Rept. No. 7) thereon.

I want to say that this is recommended by the Secretary of the Interior, and after quite a full hearing the committee reports it unanimously. It feels that this is a local matter of rather urgent necessity, and I ask for the immediate consideration of the measure.

Mr. KING. Let the bill be read, if it is brief.

The Chief Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to contract with the Okanogan irrigation district for the transfer of the control of the Okanogan project, in the State of Washington, constructed pursuant to the act of June 17, 1902 (32 Stat. L. 388), and acts amendatory thereof or supplementary thereto, known as the reclamation law, upon the district agreeing to pay to the United States in discharge of all obligations the sum of $10,000 per annum for the period of 31 consecutive years, beginning with the year 1928. Upon such payments being completed, the said Secretary is authorized to convey to the district all the right, title, and interest of the United States in and to said Okanogan project.

SEC. 2. The Secretary is authorized to assign to the district all claims that the United States now holds under contracts with water users and others owning land outside the boundaries of the said district, or owning land within the boundaries of said district but not consenting expressly or impliedly to the modifications in their water-right contracts necessary to conform to the terms of said proposed contract between the United States and the Okanogan irrigation district. During the irrigation season of 1928, prior to the execution of such contract with the Okanogan irrigation district, the district may, at its own expense, operate the canals and other works of the Okanogan project for the delivery of water to the water users thereunder, and during such irrigation season may deliver water regardless of the restrictions now imposed by the reclamation law relating to delinquency in payment of charges.

SEC. 3. The contract between the United States and the said district shall reserve to the United States the power at the option of the Secretary of the Interior to resume control of said project at any time when necessary to shut off water to enforce payment of the annual installments provided for in the first section hereof.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator if the only protection the Government has is the reservation just read, that the Government may resume control in the event of any delinquency?

Mr. JONES. I think so. I do not know of any other protection that is really required. The Senator knows that if we shut off the water it might force payment if it is possible to get it.

Mr. KING. When does title pass from the United States to the district?

Mr. JONES. Not until the end of the 31 years.

Mr. KING. Is interest to be paid upon the deferred charges?

Mr. JONES. No; except as is required under existing law. I do not remember the exact terms of the general law, but my recollection is that after the water users have been delinquent one year, then further suspension is done away with upon payment of interest. That is not modified by the pending measure at all.

Mr. KING. How much has the Government expended on the project?

Mr. JONES. The Government has expended on the project a little over a million dollars.

Mr. KING. And the district is to pay only $10,000 a year?

Mr. JONES. Yes; under the terms of the bill. The situation is that there was included in the original project about 9,000 or 10,000 acres of land and it has been found that there is not water for more than 3,800 acres. The situation does not grow out of any default upon the part of the people. The people there who can get the water will pay all of the charges, because it is one of the most productive sections in the country with water. But for several years there has been a shortage of water and there is no prospect of getting it. Many orchards there are 10 or 12 years old, with trees dead and others dying.

The department, after very careful investigation, has found that so far as anything they can see from an engineering standpoint at the present time they can not furnish water for more than 3,800 acres of land. Even on this basis they can only furnish about 2½ acre-feet. They find it is necessary to have at least 3 acre-feet. The people there must make provisions for the additional half foot.

The bill is for the purpose of curing a local situation which grows out of the absolute failure to have water to meet the demands in accordance with the original construction of the project. It is quite a complicated matter and has been in a very critical situation for two or three years. This is apparently the only solution that will take care of the situation to any extent at all.

Mr. KING. This means, of course, a loss to the Government of considerably more than a million dollars?

Mr. JONES. No; it means a loss to the Government of about $500,000, growing out of no fault of the people there.

Mr. KING. But in that statement the Senator does not take into account any past interest upon the investment or any future interest upon the investment.

Mr. JONES. Oh, no; because we do not take interest into consideration at all in connection with reclamation in the regular way. They have paid four or five hundred thousand dollars already to the Government for operation, maintenance, and construction charges; but, as I said, hundreds of acres of the land which has been reclaimed has no water, and trees 8 and 10 years old are dead. I was out there and visited it personally this summer and found several other hundreds of acres where the trees are dying for lack of water this year. This is a problem we have tried to work out, and the bill will insure the Government payment to the extent of the reclamation of 3,800 acres, and unless we do something of this kind the Government will get nothing.

Mr. KING. This is one of the melancholy evidences, then, of the incompetency of the Reclamation Service in the determination of projects.

Mr. JONES. I would not put it just that way. This is one of the first projects taken up under the reclamation act. It was taken up in 1903. The Reclamation Service probably did not then have the information they should have had with reference to the water system. Nevertheless, that is the situation, and the bill is a means to try to bring about the best possible result for the Government.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NICARAGUAN AFFAIRS

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article by General Moncada, the leader of the army of Nicaragua, which was printed in the Outlook.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is here printed, as follows:

NICARAGUA AND AMERICAN INTERVENTION

Since coming to the United States I have been many times asked to explain what is our point of view in Nicaragua toward the presence of your American marines. In most cases the question has been accompanied by others concerning the general situation in Nicaragua both before and since my meeting with Colonel Stimson.

Generally, I am asked, are we Liberals in Nicaragua in favor of having the United States supervise the election of 1928? Specifically, I am asked if at the time of my conference with Colonel Stimson, when the civil war was at its height, if I had won, could I have brought peace and prosperity to Nicaragua without the help of the United States? Could any Nicaraguan?

To answer such questions fully requires a brief review of the entire Nicaraguan situation.

Let me say this, as a preliminary:

We Liberals want the United States marines in Nicaragua. We believe that the marine officers such as now command our constabulary can best supervise the free elections necessary to put a representative government in office. Further, we believe that the United States owes it to Nicaragua to keep her marines there until such elections have taken place. It is her duty and obligation.

Napoleon III used to say that Nicaragua occupies a position similar to that of Constantinople. Though poor in the number of its inhabitants—800,000—Nicaragua is rich in natural resources, in the variety of its soils and climates, and its splendid position. Both the Atlantic and the Pacific wash its shores. The facilities it offers for a canal route through its territory have been well known since the time of the conquest.

For these reasons Nicaragua has always been coveted by certain powerful nations, and the United States has stood guard against the colonizing aspirations of the Old World, making clear its specific guardianship, first, in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty—signed in 1850 by England and the United States—wherein are defined the obligations of each contracting party with respect to the Nicaragua canal or any other canal which might be opened through the isthmus of Central America; and, second, in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, which broadened the rights of the North American Republic, clearing her way toward the construction of the canal and the guardianship of the Caribbean. By building the Panama Canal the United States averted the danger of having one of Europe's feet planted on the New World.

For Nicaraguans two questions present themselves: Is it to the best interests of Central America that the United States or one of the powerful nations of Europe shall contribute to its development and progress? Is it to the best interests of Central Americans to receive a monarchical education, as they did when Spain ruled them as colonies, or a republican education, such as the United States can give them?

The answer is obvious. Liberty flowers in republican soil. The Monroe doctrine guarantees the existence of American nations, whether English speaking or Spanish speaking.

Some would maintain that Cuba, for example, is not a truly independent Republic, because of the influence exercised by the United States. But did Cuba elect its chief executive under Spain? Did she elect her Congress or have her own supreme court? And as to Nicaragua, we should never have recovered from England the Mosquito Coast, so precious to our sovereignty, without the aid of the United States.

Geographical causes, reenforced by duties and rights that can not be repudiated, have made the United States and its sister Republics in the south a single body. In the near future these nations of the New World will be governed by an international law distinct from that which operates between Europe and America—or, better still, a different law from the old one, which modern science, in disregard of frontiers, is rendering obsolete.

Nicaragua can progress only through labor, industry, and commerce, through education, roads, and railroads. She must link her two coasts and draw nearer to the Atlantic, to the civilizations of Europe and the United States. She must live in peace and learn to govern herself under republican institutions. Continuous strife impoverishes her, dishonors her.

It would be indeed worthy of the world's praise if Nicaragua could do all that unaided; but she is more than a hundred years old as an independent nation, and a true republic is yet to flower on her soil. Whether Conservatives or Liberals have been in power, there have been no fair or free elections for 100 years, except during the period of Carazo and Dionisio de Herrera, which are memorable to all Nicaraguans. The party in power always has perpetuated itself. A terrible state of anarchy reigned from 1821, the year of independence, to 1857. From 1857 to 1893 there was a measure of peace. But in 1893, when the Government fell into the hands of José Santos Zelaya, there was again continuous guerilla warfare. In fact, during his tyrannical régime of 17 years the Chamorro family warred on him continuously. And when Zelaya was forced out of Managua by the celebrated Knox note, the victors fought among themselves for the spoils, and a still bloodier civil war ensued.

Then American marines landed in Nicaragua to guarantee foreign interests. The marines maintained peace without interfering with the internal politics of the country. But meanwhile, as the Government in office habitually controls the result of elections unless a revolution intervenes, the existing Conservative government was continued in power. There was no genuine progress possible toward a really republican government. For this reason commissions of the Liberal Party went to Washington to enlist the moral support of the United States in favor of electoral liberty for Nicaragua. As a result, the Dodds law came into being and served us during the elections of Solorzano and Sacasa. In general, this law was and is good; but the best law in the world is futile when those intrusted with its enforcement are the first to violate it.

To President Martinez, President Diego Manuel Chamorro's immediate successor, the Department of State proposed the supervision of the election by American marines. This was excellent. Upon the inauguration of the President, however, elected in 1924, the marines were withdrawn. Solorzano, the new President, was a weak man devoid of ability and at bottom a Conservative. He distrusted liberalism, and therefore kept war materials away from the Liberals. Such war materials, however, being in the hands of the followers of Emiliano Chamorro, who in 1925 was plotting to overthrow the administration of President Solorzano, Chamorro was able to use violence and enter the Fortress of Tiscapa. There followed the persecution of Vice President Sacasa, violence at Leon, export of cattle to Guatemala, Salvador, and Costa Rica—the cattle having been taken as a tax from the haciendas of Liberals. All these things were done under the responsibility of Chamorro and of Lieut. Humberto Pasos Diaz, nephew of the present President. Finally, President Solorzano was forced to resign. Chamorro assumed power, and the duly elected judges were driven from the supreme court and thus the judicial power, as well as legislative and executive power, was destroyed and the bloody road was opened once more to civil war.

Civil war did result. During that painful period all forces, even natural forces, seemed arrayed against Nicaraguan liberalism.

We fell and we rose on the march through the wild hills, clutching at trees and bushes to keep our footing, thrown down precipices into infected marshes, into rivers, with our horses and equipment. We arrived at Teustepe and then at Tipitapa. Here we found the personal representative of President Coolidge, Colonel Stimson, bearing peace proposals, asking for a cessation of the war.

His words were simple, but solemn and decisive:

"In the name of the United States I exhort you that this war may cease and not another drop of blood be spilt in Nicaragua; on its part, the Washington Government accepts President Diaz's proposal for the supervision of the election of the chief authorities in 1928, which shall be free and fair, so that all Nicaraguan citizens may express their will at the polls. My Government considers that the very honor of the United States is involved in this. In recognizing Diaz, my Government has acted in good faith under a sincere interpretaion of the laws of Nicaragua, and wishes the present Chief Executive to continue in the discharge of his functions while the electoral law is reformed and a true nonpartisan national guard is created. With that guard and the marines a free and just election will be carried out."

The meaning of these words stirred me profoundly. I answered:

"I am here as a simple soldier, and it is my duty to consult with the other chiefs of the army and with the delegates of Doctor Sacasa, who are also in Tipitapa. I ask of you a period of eight days to give an answer. During that time I will return to the army to do what I can to convince it, or to return to war if its opinion should be contrary to mine."

In these conversations the delegates of Doctor Sacasa and MM. Arguello Espinosa and Cordero Reyes intervened. They protested, saying immediately that they had left to myself and the army the whole responsibility of the problem. I accept it.

I held in the highest esteem this valiant and self-sacrificing army, always generous and well disciplined although lacking wages and food. I meditated profoundly; and when I spoke at Boaco to the assembled generals and to the army itself, which formed in the plaza, I did what was possible to convince them that it was necessary to yield, to have confidence in the word of the personal representative of President Coolidge, which was equivalent to the word of the American Government itself and would be backed by the American people as something pertaining to the national honor. I also told them that, in spite of this sincere opinion, I was ready to accompany them if the majority should resolve to resist. They all approved of my position. With the signatures of all the generals, the resolution was transmitted to Colonel Stimson, who saluted the army when it disarmed at Tipitapa and wrote the promise that every one knows in the United States.

I have been asked since if at the time of my conference with Colonel Stimson could I, if I had won, have brought peace and prosperity to Nicaragua without the help of the United States?

Could any Nicaraguan?

Actually, it is not possible for me to answer that question. Having been victorious in the field of battle—and I think I had already defeated the forces of President Diaz—it would have been my duty as a loyal soldier to place the army at the disposal of the citizen recognized by us Liberals as the legitimate President. It would be his duty to take over the task of restoring constitutional order, the other laws of the land, and of establishing the peace.

I am perfectly convinced, however, that Sacasa or any other statesman will always need the help of the United States to establish a good government. When Colonel Stimson told me at Tipitapa that the President of the United States was willing to assist in the supervision of our election in 1928, I felt, and still feel, that this would open to Nicaragua the only way by which such good government and a lasting peace could be established. I told Colonel Stimson frankly that peace had so far only been attained through tyranny in Nicaragua. Tyranny brings with it no good and depraves the public conscience. To gain power over the dead bodies of our fellow citizens is only worthy of men who are superfluous in modern civilization.

Certainly, Nicaraguan Liberals everywhere have approved unanimously the arrangements of Tipitapa and are grateful for the efforts of Colonel Stimson toward peace. At first there was surprise and hesitation; but sober thought brought faith in the promises of the personal representative of President Coolidge, considering that they involve the honor of the whole Nation founded by George Washington.

We prefer officers of the American Navy to supervise the Nicaraguan elections, because they are educated in the tenets of honor and probity. They are more representative of their country than civilians would be. Through more than a year's contact with them I have found them to yield to none in discipline and respect for public liberties and in the discharge of their duty.

By the present law, called the Dodds law, there are 530 electoral polling places, of which more than half are in the rural districts, where their supervision is difficult.

The worth of the election in Nicaragua depends now on the manner in which the arrangements of Tipitapa are carried out. If they are carried out honestly, as I believe they will be, due to President Coolidge's word, the elections will be made with entire equity.

In general, Nicaragua stands in need of republican education. This end can be achieved in a period of twelve or more years under the supervision of the American Government. The passing of every four-year period will see this need diminished, for the National Guard will be organized under the direction of American officers and trained to respect the law and the national institutions; the National Congress will be composed of better men, because they will have been freely elected by the people; the judicial power will be composed of honorable magistrates, austere and patriotic in their actions. We want the independence and sovereignty of our country; and the more we want it, the better government we will build, granted we may live under the ægis of peace and labor. The watchful eye of the United States can be no better employed than in this noble cause. The very Monroe Doctrine compels the United States in that direction, for that doctrine postulates for the New World the fullest realization of republicanism and democracy. Because we have had no peace, because our national income diminishes or is used up by war and the fields lie uncultivated, our great duty is to do away with war. Any sacrifice is small to achieve this objective.

The voice of peace that sounded in our ears was so tremendous that it was impossible not to yield. It is to the good and the just that I believe the Washington Government this time, in the case of Nicaragua, is laboring. It was unjust, no doubt, to stop us on the road to victory; but peace is as great as victory, and liberty is as great as peace.

Our country needs a profound peace. If bad government continues to prevail in Nicaragua, if Liberals and Conservatives persist in warring for power, obeying personal ambitions, no nation will be found to extend a friendly hand to us or to treat with us.

Capital is a great necessity in Nicaragua for the development of the country's progress. We have neither railroads nor highways. We are out of communication with the civilized world. The construction of the railway to the Atlantic coast is very urgent to bring us nearer to the United States and to Europe. We need more American capital, and it is our first duty to seek it here, for we are obliged to do it by the close relationship that binds together the countries of America for their mutual defense.

The interest of the United States in the affairs of the Caribbean Sea is a vital interest. If it renounce the vigilance of that sea and its bordering countries, it places its very life in jeopardy, or, at least, exposes itself to terrible responsibilities and wars. This interest of the United States is equally beneficial to our countries, for they are thus defended from all aggression of powers foreign to the continent. In this all the countries of America share a common interest and a common destiny.

Opinion, I am told, is divided in the United States as to the policy that has been followed by the Department of State. We Nicaraguans think that we have acquired an explicit right and that the United States has bound itself to an explicit duty. We Liberals fought to place our country once more under the full authority of the constitution. In exchange for peace and free elections we constitutionalists agreed to disarm, and we who signed the agreement have lived up to our duty. If a few armed bands remain active in the north of Nicaragua, that is a natural consequence of our civil wars. After these promises it must be established in full justice that if the Monroe doctrine is to be abrogated that must not be done before the United States has discharged its duty as to the 1928 elections in Nicaragua, which should be rendered impartial by its influence. Let every Nicaraguan citizen, without distinction of color or political creed, vote freely, and let power pass into the hands of the representatives of a true national majority. When it comes that day will witness the birth of true democracy in Nicaragua, the first day of genuine republican life—an occasion of rejoicing for all sincere patriots.

Those that accuse the State Department of supporting President Diaz in obedience to the pressure of bankers and for mean reasons of internal and foreign policies fail in logic when they attack the agreements of Tipitapa and the supervision of the next election by the marines. They know that, upon the premature withdrawal of the marines, power would remain with Diaz or Chamorro, and constitutionalists would lose all hope of liberty and democracy. This would be a tremendous injustice.

There is talk to the effect that a move will be made at the next Pan American Congress against interference by the United States in the affairs of Nicaragua and other Caribbean countries. If it is accepted by the Washington Government, we Nicaraguans will demand that it be put into effect after January, 1929—that is, after North American mediation has effected an entirely fair election in Nicaragua. I may add that my opinion on the Monroe doctrine and the need for the influence of the politically advanced nations on the politically backward ones is firmly rooted in deep conviction.

If I have criticized sometimes the American policy in Nicaragua, I have done so on the ground that it has not protected the Nicaraguan people from abuses of power with the same energy that it has defended the stability of bad governments, such as those of Chamorro and Diaz. The Department of State offers the defense that it neither can nor should act against the sovereignty of the Republic; but the misfortunes of the Nicaraguan people are worthy of some consideration; and if we were not allowed to crown with laurels of victory the costly triumph achieved by the constitutionalist army, watch should be kept so that our adversaries might no longer invade the rights of a weakened and disarmed people.

Although it is said that nations can develop in isolation, history does not support the statement. Vestiges of lost civilizations—in India, Persia, and Egypt—enlightened Greece and Rome. Sparks of the light stamped upon by the barbarians remained in the religious orders of the Middle Ages and relighted the torch of civilization for Europe and America. So the more developed republics transmit their laws and their democratic habits to those that are still in their infancy. Nicaragua gained independence, but republican habits were foreign to us. Monarchical and absolutist roots had penetrated deeply into Nicaraguan society. We must learn from others the ways of republicanism and liberty.

Such were the ideas that brought about the surrender of the constitutionalist arms. We rest upon the promise of Henry L. Stimson, made in the name of the United States. The honor of the United States we consider a sufficient guaranty.

When the United States carries out its pledge and safeguards the establishment of a fairly elected representative administration, the gain will be twofold: It will strengthen constitutional government throughout Central America, and it will revive in all Latin America confidence in the disinterested purpose and good faith of the United States.

FLOOD CONTROL

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President, my colleague [Mr. RANSDELL] delivered before the National Rivers and Harbors Congress on December 8, 1927, a very able argument touching flood-control, which I ask to have inserted in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is here printed, as follows:

Mr. RANSDELL. The record-breaking flood of 1927 in the Mississippi Valley makes it appropriate to discuss it alone before this conference on "Floods and waterways." Control of floods in the Mississippi Valley is so closely connected with the navigation of the river that the two are inseparable. Some of the eminent river engineers have said that if there were no improved lands in the valley and no people living there to be protected from floods they would build levees to aid in the navigation of the stream. This statement applies with greater force to the vast revetment works, which prevent the banks of the river from caving, thereby filling the channel with earth, and which compel the river to remain in its bed, constantly scouring it out and keeping it in good condition for navigation.

Moreover, navigable rivers were intended by their Creator, at least to a great extent, to serve the communities adjacent to them, and if flood waters are allowed to run riot in the overflow basin of the Mississippi, with its millions of people and highly developed areas, one of the principal uses of the river would be destroyed. Congress derives authority to protect the Mississippi Valley from floods from section 8 of the Constitution, reading as follows:

"The Congress shall have power * * * to provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States; to regulate commerce * * * among the several States; and to establish post offices and post roads."

Surely the general welfare requires the prevention of such terrible floods as those of this year in the Mississippi Valley, which destroyed directly and indirectly about 200 human lives, many thousands of domestic animals, and over four hundred millions of property of various kinds. The overflow section of the valley embraces portions of the States of Illinois, Missouri, Kentucky, Tennessee, Arkansas, Mississippi, and Louisiana. When great floods of water sweep through it, flooding towns, cities, farms, highways, railways, and everything, commerce between the States is no longer regulated, but stopped as effectively as if done by a victorious army. The established post offices and post roads cease to function, and chaos reigns instead of an orderly commerce among the several States on road, rail, river, and in the air, aided and assisted by Federal post offices and post roads.

Suppose a foreign foe should invade the Mississippi Valley, would anyone question the right and duty of Congress under this section 8 to repel the invader with all the power of the Army and Navy and all our national wealth? There can be only an affirmative answer to this question, and if so, then why should not the Nation in like manner exert whatever means are necessary to prevent the angry forces of nature from destroying the people and the property of the valley?

During the late floods thousands of miles of interstate and State highways and nearly as many miles of interstate railways were submerged; and no commerce, either local or interstate, could pass over them. The only east-and-west railway through the State of Louisiana which remained in commission was the Southern Pacific at New Orleans, and that did business in a halting, dangerous, and uncertain way. There was practically complete stoppage of railroad and highway traffic in the valley. A limited commerce was carried on by boats under great difficulties, because there were few landing places. Even the airplane was to a great extent put out of commission as the landing fields were flooded, though the hydroplane found innumerable places to land.

Flood prevention in the Mississippi Valley is essential in order to insure national defense. The effect on our World War activities would have been disastrous had the valley been as badly overflowed in 1918 as it was in the spring of 1927, when every railroad crossing the river from Cairo south, except the Southern Pacific, was out of commission for several weeks and most of them for months. National preparedness, as well as commerce, demands that railway trains move continuously and without interruption, north and south, east and west, throughout and across this great valley. The floods of last spring entirely prevented these movements and will continue to do likewise in all the great floods of the future unless the strong hand of the Federal Government prevents.

A striking illustration of the importance of protecting the valley from invasion by water or by an armed foe is furnished by the fact that when the Federal forces acquired control of the Mississippi River during the Civil War by the capture of Vicksburg and other places the backbone of the Southern Confederacy was broken, and the bread basket of the southern soldiers could not reach them.

In the portions of this valley subject to flood there are about 30,000 square miles, aggregating 19,000,000 acres of rich land, which, if protected from floods and highly developed, are susceptible of supporting very large populations and adding enormously to the Nation's wealth. At the present time less than half of this area is under cultivation. The annual value of the agricultural products of the valley are about $250,000,000; and the manufacturing, mercantile, and commercial interests generally are about as much more, making an aggregate annual contribution of nearly $500,000,000.

It costs from $60 to $90 per acre to reclaim the valley lowlands, remove the timber, excavate the stumps, build houses and other farm improvements, dig drainage canals and surface ditches, construct fences, roads, etc., which is so expensive that any further development of this section will be slow, even if its people are assured of absolute protection from floods in the future.

The assumption that these lands would rise enormously in value if fully protected is erroneous, though doubtless there would be some increase in their value. This region is agricultural, and agriculture throughout the Nation has been at a low ebb for several years. The extremely fertile highly developed lands of Illinois, Iowa, and Missouri, which are never overflowed, and portions of Arkansas, Mississippi, and Louisiana, not subject to overflow and just as fertile as the lands in the flooded regions, are little sought after and low in price.

Flood control on the Mississippi is not reclamation but protection of vast areas of improved lands on which are located many towns and cities, including New Orleans, the metropolis of the South, inhabited by fully 1,500,000 people. These valley dwellers are good citizens, who contribute more than their pro rata share to the Nation's wealth, and are progressive, energetic, law-abiding people, real nation builders, entitled to every consideration at the hands of their national father. They are not mendicants who come to Congress with outstretched hands but peers of our best citizenry asking simple justice and preservation from the ruthless enemy, which has so often destroyed their lives, their homes, and all they possess.

These brave people have carried on their fight against the Mississippi floods for more than two centuries—since the first levee was constructed to protect the village of New Orleans in 1717. For more than 150 years these contests were carried on without national aid, during which period, according to General Jadwin, about $125,000,000 were expended for levees. Since 1879 the amount spent locally for levees was $167,000,000, which, added to the $125,000,000 previously spent, makes $292,000,000 paid by the local communities for levee protection. If to this is added the direct loss of the 1927 flood, estimated by General Jadwin at $236,000,000, we have a total local contribution for levees to date, plus the direct flood losses of this one year, aggregating $528,000,000. As an offset to this huge sum the National Government has spent on levees $71,000,000, which leaves an excess contribution of the localities to this date of $457,000,000.

This shows that since levee construction on the Mississippi began the local people have expended for actual levee construction more than $4 for every $1 of the Federal Government, and this does not take into account the enormous losses from time to time caused by floods—especially the terrible direct loss this year of $236,000,000 shown in General Jadwin's report, to which may be fairly added an additional $200,000,000 of indirect loss, in the opinion of Secretary Hoover.

The various funds contributed by local levee districts, States and Federal Government have been expended more or less in a piecemeal way, each community doing its utmost to safeguard its own interests.

The situation was expressed very forcibly by General Jadwin, Chief of Engineers, in a recent speech at St. Louis in which he said:

"The effort has always been to reclaim the maximum amount of the richest land in the world in the shortest time and at the cheapest price. This reclamation has gone on piecemeal to get the greatest benefit from each local viewpoint. Responsibility has been divided, local interest has conflicted with general interest, and as a result the scheme has not always been scientific as a whole. Reasonable factors of safety have not always been used. Money has been saved with consequent risks. Financial inability or failure for other reasons to comply with the requirements of law in regard to local participation in costs have delayed works necessary for the safety of other sections lower down. Now a comprehensive plan must be substituted and control must be national."

This is a remarkably clear, concise statement which covers the case fully. If a comprehensive plan is substituted for the present piecemeal methods and the control really becomes national, that settles the question; for the only way this can be accomplished in a practical, workable manner is for the Government to pay all cost—not a percentage thereof, no matter how large. If a locality is required to contribute any part of the cost, it would be entitled to a voice in the expenditure thereof, proportionate to the amount contributed by it. Otherwise it would become the victim of the same kind of tyranny practiced toward our Revolutionary ancestors who were taxed without representation. Such a course is unthinkable; and just so certain as localities are required to pay part of the expense of flood control, just that certain will they receive and exercise their right to be heard as copartners in a joint enterprise.

This would mean a continuance of the old piecemeal methods of the past. Responsibility would be divided and the "local interest might conflict with the general interest." Absolute "financial inability" to contribute would be sure in a majority of the localities on the river which have suffered so terribly from the recent flood. Such a plan would not work any better in the future than in the past, and surely it has not been a complete success heretofore.

If a comprehensive plan be substituted for the present methods and the Government assumes national control, then all localities would be directed, regulated, dominated, overpowered by the superior authority of the Federal Government, for that is the meaning of the little word "control."

To elaborate somewhat, there has been too much division of authority in the past. The Mississippi River Commission has not had full power to plan flood-control works nor sufficient money to construct them. It has lacked both authority and money. Hereafter the jurisdiction of the Federal agency charged with flood control must have jurisdiction of the main river, any spillways or outlets which may be provided, and all such parts of its tributaries as are necessary to make the control works effective. In order that all these improvements may coordinate and form a composite whole there must be no conflict of authority or responsibility. Federal jurisdiction must extend to all phases of the improvements. There can be no success if the Government agency is compelled to make plans for the location of works, their construction and maintenance, in accordance with the views of different localities, and their capacity to contribute to the cost thereof. There can not be the freedom of action required in planning and executing colossal flood-control works on the Mississippi unless the executive authority is empowered to do whatever is necessary independent of local interference.

Heretofore there has not been one common interest to which all parties contributed, directed by one controlling mind. In a high-water fight, if the levee breaks on the east bank of the river, that relieves the pressure on the west bank, and vice versa. Hence the interests of each bank are not only different but actually opposed to each other. It is impracticable for local authorities to combine and unite their forces under one leadership, and the only solution is for the Federal Government to assume full charge.

Combating floods of the Mississippi is war, and you can not win war if restricted in the territory over which you are allowed to operate or dependent upon fixed annual appropriations which are made conditional upon local contributions. There are about 1,800 miles of levees on the Mississippi and the lower stretches of its tributaries, which may be compared in time of great floods to a real battle line of that length, the attacking army being the accumulated waters of 42 per cent of the Nation's area rushing wildly to the ocean. During flood fights vast bodies of men, directed by many leaders, without systematic cooperation, each locality doing its utmost to protect itself, fight the rising water day and night. It is a desperate contest between the mighty forces of nature in angry mood on the one side and the puny efforts of her disorganized children on the other. In the language of war, we have been clinging for years to the same arms and strategy in fighting flood waters, levees, and we continue to suffer defeat. Not until the allied forces in the World War placed their respective armies under one commander in chief did they succeed. Our fight against floods should likewise be conducted by one leader—the Mississippi River Commission—vested with ample authority and funds. In no other way can success be attained.

The task of controlling the Mississippi floods is such a giant one, and the people of the valley have suffered so terribly from the overflows of this year, that it is impossible for them to make any material contribution. No one can tell exactly what the costs of the vast control works will be, but surely not less than half a million dollars, if the work is done properly and the valley fully insured against any repetition of the disaster of this year. How can the distressed people of that region be expected to contribute even a modicum of this large sum, which would be a big undertaking even for the Federal Government and absolutely impossible for the affected localities? In many of the levee districts along the river the people are so impoverished and so heavily burdened with the debts of former years, incurred in their efforts to fight the river's floods, that they can do nothing, and if forced by law to contribute will be utterly helpless.

Under these circumstances it would be unjust for our great Government to insist upon even a dole from the valley. It should treat this problem in a broad, truly national way, and no more think of demanding local contributions than it would require border States to contribute toward the expense of repelling a foreign invasion.

In conclusion, permit me to say that for business reasons alone, entirely aside from sentiment and that spirit of brotherly love which prompts us to help our brethren in distress and prevent immense loss of life and property, the people of the United States can not afford to have the lowland section of the Mississippi destroyed. When a calamity like the 1927 floods, which swept away directly and indirectly more than $400,000,000 of property, occurs in any portion of the Republic every part thereof is affected.

It has cost colossal sums to develop the farms, drainage systems, roads, railroads, and other improvements of this delta empire. A very heavy indebtedness rests on this property. The bonds and mortgage notes representing these debts are held largely by people in the East and North. If the valley receives protection from floods and is permitted to go ahead, prospects are good for the ultimate payment of these debts, but not otherwise. It must be remembered that agriculture is the principal industry of the valley and if in addition to his other troubles the valley farmer is forced to contend with destructive floods there is no hope for him.

As previously stated, the agricultural products of this valley aggregate in value every year $250,000,000, and that is only a portion of its wealth, for its manufactures and commerce are also very important. The loss of these vast sums in any one year would greatly lessen the purchasing power of the valley, and would be felt seriously by banking and commercial interests in the North, East, West, and other Southern States, for its connections in business and otherwise extend throughout the Republic.

President Coolidge correctly said in his message to Congress this week:

"This is all one country. The public needs of each part must be provided for by the public at large. No required relief shall be refused. An adequate plan should be adopted to prevent a recurrence of the disaster, in order that the people may restore to productivity and comfort their fields and their towns."

I thank the President for the encouraging words, though he also indicated that localities must contribute part of the cost of flood control. This is impracticable, as I have shown. There is only one way to achieve success, and that is for the Federal Government to adopt "an adequate" plan, as the President so wisely suggests—"a comprehensive plan," in the words of General Jadwin—assume entire control, and pay all costs.

I earnestly appeal, therefore, not only on sentimental but business grounds for complete protection of the Mississippi Valley from the flood waters of its great river, and respectfully urge the members of the National Rivers and Harbors Congress to give all their powerful aid in support of this worthy cause.

PLAN OF THE ARMY ENGINEERS FOR FLOOD CONTROL OF THE MISSISSIPPI IN ITS ALLUVIAL VALLEY

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Commerce the address of Maj. Gen. Edgar Jadwin, the Chief of Engineers of the Army, at the National Rivers and Harbors Congress, dealing with the flood-control problem of the lower Mississippi River.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is here printed, as follows:

ADDRESS OF GEN. EDGAR JADWIN

Flood control looms very large at this time and is the particular subject assigned to me for discussion. Permit me first to touch on a few of the high lights of our waterway plan and indicate briefly the progress that has been made.

The improvement of a harbor or a waterway can not be considered a success unless use is made of it commensurate with its cost and importance. Our seacoast harbors and our lake harbors and connecting channels are returning in savings to the public annually a greater sum than the entire amount spent on them both for new work and maintenance. Our waterway systems, as a whole, are paying much better than a bond rate of interest.

The increase in commerce in our harbors and on our waterways indicates that there is a marked "back to waterways" movement. Eliminating all known duplications in our traffic statistics, the total water-borne commerce of our harbors has increased from 300,000,000 tons in 1925 to 342,000,000 tons in 1926; on our Great Lakes, the increase has been from 130,000,000 tons to 137,000,000 tons; on the Panama Canal, from 23,000,000 tons to 25,000,000 tons; on the Mississippi system from 50,000,000 tons to 57,000,000 tons—a total of over 500,000,000 tons. The year 1926 was the first in which the water-borne commerce has passed the half-billion-ton mark. In the light of these statistics it is evident that waterways are carrying an increased traffic, that they are good investments, that they are paying handsome dividends, and that they are justified.

The river and harbor act of January 21, 1927, was passed since your last meeting. Work on the new items authorized in this bill has not been begun, as funds so far appropriated were considered as practically pledged for projects previously authorized by Congress. The estimates that have recently been submitted to Congress include funds for these projects, and it is hoped that a start on them can be made during the coming working season.

I have stated on numerous occasions that the establishment of a department of public works would be an unwise departure from our existing governmental organization. We understand that there is considerable propaganda being carried on to bring about a public works bureau in the Interior Department, to which many of the engineers of the Government service would be transferred. We do not believe the movement is a good one.

It would be equally practicable to try to combine all the doctors in various Government services in one department; if we did, we would be liable to develop a situation of affairs something like that which is said to have occurred on one of our Army posts some years ago. The doctor called up the quartermaster and told him—you know the quartermaster fixes the quarters, and so on—to send a man to fix a broken shutter on his house. He said, "I will be very glad to do it, Doctor. I think I will wait a little until you get several other things there. It won't be long before you will need other repairs, and I will send a man up there and we will do them all at once."

The doctor was querulous at the time. The quartermaster was not under his orders. He had to go to some higher authority in order to get him to do the small task.

A few weeks later the quartermaster called the doctor up and said, "Doctor, one of the children has the chicken pox. Won't you please come down to the house and look at the child and see if you can't prescribe for him?"

The doctor said, "Yes; I will be delighted to do that. I always like to help the children of the post; but it won't be long before the rest of the children will have the chicken pox, and if you don't mind I will just wait until they are all sick and come down and straighten them all out at once."

Possibly we should congratulate ourselves, however, that with these suggestions about the engineers and the doctors nobody has yet been so foolish as to suggest that all the stenographers in the Government service be combined into one department, and that a secretary of stenographers be appointed so that whenever we wish stenographic work done we have to send to him to have it done.

I regret that the time limit placed will not permit me to indicate the progress that has been made on the various major navigation projects in which the Members of this Congress are interested or the status of some of the most important examinations and surveys that are now being made. The river and harbor section of my office and the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors will be glad to discuss these matters with those of you who are interested.

Much has been said in recent months about the Mississippi flood that occurred this year. The urgent necessity for action by the Federal Government is generally understood and accepted. The question now squarely up to the people and the Congress is, "What shall be done about it?" That Congress will deal wisely and generously with the stricken people seems certain.

It has been my duty and that of the Engineer Department, as consulting engineers to the Secretary of War, the President, and to Congress in this matter, to give our views on the engineering features of flood control in the Mississippi Valley, and, as contemplated by law in such cases, to summarize the economic features involved. I am proud of the organization that has been able to solve so huge a problem in so short a time. The foundation of a simple but comprehensive plan was made possible by the coordinate and concurrent effort of numerous agencies of the department, assisted most efficiently by the various levee boards, State and other local authorities, railroad officials and flood control associations in the valley. My thanks to them are sincere.

The plan of the Army engineers for flood control of the Mississippi in its alluvial valley was submitted by me to the Secretary of War, and was sent by the President to Congress to-day.

Time will not permit me to discuss all the schemes that have been suggested for the control of the Mississippi River. Many of these are obviously too visionary to warrant serious study. We can not afford to dig enormous channels halfway across the continent through mountain ranges, nor pump through pipe lines over 2,000,000 feet of water per second from Cairo, Ill., to the Gulf of Mexico. Many plans that are frequently mentioned have been discarded either because the cost is out of proportion to the benefits, too much good land would be sacrificed, or because of the length of time necessary for their accomplishment or uncertainty as to their results and effects. Included in this group are: Dredging the bed of the river; dredging side channels; wholesale moving back of the levees; straightening the channel; clearing the batture, or flood way, and reforestation. These methods are all described fully and amply in the report which went to Congress this morning.

The reservoir theory is an ideal one when it can be applied. It expects to hold the water where it falls, on comparatively cheap land, and where it can be held without harm to anyone. It aims to attack the problem at the seat of the trouble. Some excellent plans for small areas have been consummated successfully on this theory. Undoubtedly the principle of reservoirs is sound, within limits.

The Mississippi is so large that it involves a problem different from any other that has been considered. The larger part of the rain water causing the highest water in the lower Mississippi falls below reservoir sites on the headwaters of tributaries. In addition, much of the water which could be retained in headwater reservoirs would be stopped so far from the flood areas that it would be difficult to so regulate the stoppage as to effect materially a reduction in stage below Cairo.

For the last six months the engineer districts in the Mississippi watershed have been making a study of the possibility of lowering flood heights by means of reservoirs. The results have been consolidated in my office by a special reservoir board.

Our problem, at this time, has been to study reservoir possibilities in so far as their effect on Mississippi floods may be. These studies have required us to discard many sites as being too expensive for the reduction in flood height caused by them. These studies show that in most cases the benefits for power, or local flood protection, are of greater value than their efforts for flood control on the Mississippi.

In the case of Pittsburgh and vicinity, Congress, in the flood control act of 1924, authorized an examination and survey for flood control at a cost of $50,000—$25,000 of which was to be provided by the Federal Government and $25,000 by the State. Work on this survey is progressing satisfactorily, and it is expected that the report will be made to Congress during the coming year.

At its last session Congress authorized the expenditure of $7,000,000 for the survey of a large number of rivers, including many tributaries of the Mississippi, to determine the best use of their water resources. Flood control, power, irrigation, drainage, navigation, and water supply must all be considered. Work on these surveys will be expedited when funds are made available in the next appropriation bill. Work done in connection with Mississippi River flood control will be of material assistance when the work gets under way. While the plans recommended to Congress at this time for the control of floods in the alluvial valley can not include plans for the tributaries, studies of these tributaries will be made and plans and estimates for the best development of their entire water resources will be submitted to Congress as soon as practicable. It is evident that many reservoirs which would be of little help in the Mississippi will be of great help in solving the flood problems of the tributaries.

Now for the plan for the lower valley. There were distributed a few minutes ago a number of copies of the map accompanying my report, which shows in brief the plan which is recommended. We thought we did not have enough copies at this time for everybody and the thought was that, after having looked it over, each man would pass it on to his neighbor in the same row, so before I get through all of you who wish to can see what the plan looks like on the map.

The "flood" used in the design of the recommended plan is that predicted by the Weather Bureau as the "maximum possible" and by the Mississippi River Commission as the "maximum probable." The stages predicted by these two groups of experts on such matters were practically the same. When there was a difference the higher stage was used by me. This resulted in a "project flood" with stages, if confined, of 66 feet at Cairo and 74 feet at Arkansas City. The Weather Bureau obtained its "maximum possible" flood at Cairo by using the maximum Ohio flood with "the Mississippi, Cumberland, and Tennessee Rivers contributing their tides at just the proper time to insure the greatest effect at Cairo—an impossible occurrence, it is admitted, but nevertheless a remotely possible one." The predicted stage at Arkansas City—74 feet—is the result of the above stage at Cairo and the Arkansas and White at their maximum predicted stage. Below the Red the same flood, reduced by river-channel reservoir capacity and with flow from the Yazoo and Red added, gives the "project flood," which is taken at 3,000,000 second-feet—about 25 per cent greater than the 1927 flood at this locality, which was itself the greatest flood ever experienced.

The plan and project heretofore pursued has been the construction of levees high enough and strong enough to confine all of the flood waters within the river channels. The levees that have been constructed fit into the plan now recommended, but are not sufficiently high for such floods as are now predicted. The cost of raising and strengthening them sufficiently to carry extreme floods would greatly exceed the cost of the plan proposed. Furthermore, the extent of the disaster which follows a crevasse increases greatly as the flood is forced to higher stages by confinement wholly within the levee system. The loss of life and property in the recent great flood in the alluvial valley followed the breaking of the levees which reclaimed the land for the use of man.

This reclamation had been pushed so far that insufficient room was left in the river for the passage of the unprecedented volume of flood water. The levees must be strengthened, but a halt must be called on further material increase in their heights and the consequent threat to the inhabitants of the areas they are built to protect. It is fortunate that none of the breaks have, so far, occurred immediately opposite any of our valley cities. Aside from all engineering considerations, it would be extremely unwise if the levees were raised immediately in front of such centers of population as Cairo, Greenville, or New Orleans. Any plan which contemplates material raising in these localities subjects the people to a threat, the consummation of which would be loss of life such as this country has never seen except in war.

Man must not try to restrict the Mississippi River too much in extreme floods. The river will break any plan which does this. It must have the room it needs and, to accord with its nature, must have the extra room laterally. In its original state the river had only one low-water channel until it reached the flat land near the Gulf, but in flood it overflowed an area 50 miles wide, which is really its natural flood bed. The water which can not be carried in the main channel with the levee at reasonable height must be diverted and carried laterally. Some additional capacity can be obtained in the main river by local setbacks of the levees. As a general setback is not practicable the remainder must be supplied by flood ways paralleling the general course of the river.

The plan recommended provides the requisite space for the passage of floods and levees of adequate strength to withstand them, so that should a flood recur of the magnitude of the flood just experienced—the maximum of record—it would be passed out to the Gulf without danger to life in the alluvial valley and without damage to property except in the flood ways allotted for its passage. Controlling side levees limit the area of the flood ways and protect land not in the flood ways where such protection justifies its cost.

Should Divine Providence ever send a flood of the maximum predicted by meteorological and flood experts as a remote probability, but not beyond the bounds of ultimate possibility, the floodways provided in the plan are still normally adequate for its passage without having its predicted heights exceed those of the strengthened levees.

The details of the recommended plan by which the surplus water will be carried with safety vary in different parts of the river. The alluvial valley of the river may be considered in three principal sections—the northern, comprising the St. Francis Basin on the west side of the river; the middle, including the Yazoo Basin on the east and the Tensas Basin on the west, running on the east from near Memphis to Vicksburg and on the west from the Arkansas River to the Red River; and the southern, or Louisiana section, from the Red River to the Gulf of Mexico.

The portion of the alluvial valley from Cape Girardeau, the northern limit of the alluvial valley, to Cairo, can be protected by a slight increase in the size of the levees. The serious problem begins at Cairo at the confluence of the Ohio and the Mississippi. From here to New Madrid the main levee on the west bank chokes the river unduly and should be set back sufficiently to lower the head of water at Cairo by 6 feet in an extreme flood. The existing river-bank levee will be retained, but lowered 5 feet and strengthened. The flood way between the new and the old levees will be capable of cultivation at all times excepting in floods greater than that of 1922.

From New Madrid south to the mouth of the Arkansas, the levees will be raised moderately. Local setbacks will be made below Helena and at other bottle necks where necessary to restore greater cross sections in the main river. These modified works are designed to carry the highest predicted flood, except that it may be found expedient not to raise the levees opposite the backwater areas of the St. Francis and White Rivers. In this event, if a possible superflood should come, it may cause a crevasse in the levees at these points, increasing somewhat the height and acreage of backwater area, but doing comparatively little harm.

From the mouth of the Arkansas to the Old River, at the mouth of the Red, extreme floods can not be carried between levees of the Mississippi without dangerous increase in their heights. A flood way for excess floods is provided down the Boeuf River, on the west side of the river. Excess water can not be carried through the section on the east side, since it would be forced back into the main river by the high lands on the east bank below Vicksburg and have to be carried thence for 160 miles between the main river levees to the mouth of the Red River. The entrance to the flood way is closed by a "safety-plug section" of the levees at present grade, which is located in the vicinity of Cypress Creek, near the mouth of the Arkansas.

To insure their safety until this section opens, the levees of the Mississippi from the Arkansas to the Red will be raised about 3 feet. To prevent flood waters from entering the Tensas Basin, except into the flood way during high floods, the levees on the south side of the Arkansas will be strengthened and raised about 3 feet as far upstream as necessary.

The section at the head of the flood way will protect the land within the flood-way levees against any flood up to one of the magnitude of the 1922 flood. A flood of a magnitude somewhere between that of 1922 and of 1927 will break it, turning the excess water down the flood way, which will carry it safely to the backwater area at the mouth of the Red River.

Below the Red River setbacks of the levees will be made at critical places in the main river to insure the better discharge of flood waters, but the carrying capacity of the main river can not be increased materially without unwarranted hazard to life and property in the State of Louisiana. At the city of New Orleans an increase in levee height is considered unsafe, aside from the great cost of raising the levees and the wharves built upon them. To afford proper protection to New Orleans, with its population of nearly half a million and property value of over a billion dollars, a special flood way upstream from the city is essential. The most practicable location is on the east side of the river, discharging into Lake Pontchartrain. A controlled spillway at Bonnet Carre will limit the discharge through this floodway to that necessary for the protection of the city.

In high floods it is also necessary to divert down the Atchafalaya Basin the flood waters in excess of the discharge capacity between the levees of the Mississippi. This is accomplished by strengthening and raising the levees on the main river 3 feet for the necessary distance to assure their safety until levees at the head of the Atchafalaya Basin open. The levees on the south bank of the Red River will be strengthened and raised sufficiently to keep flood waters from entering the Atchafalaya Basin except in the flood way through the relief, or "fuse plug," levees at the head of the flood way. Back levees are to be constructed on both sides of the Atchafalaya Basin for the major part of its length to inclose the Atchafalaya flood way. Funds are included in the estimate for the extension of these levees to the south to limit the overflow in the lower part of the basin.

Existing levees on the Atchafalaya River will be strengthened and their grade adjusted so that the productive capacity of such parts of the flood way as are not already swamp land will be retained during any flood of record of a less magnitude than that of 1927.

The plan includes an extension of revetment of the banks of the river to reduce the danger of attacks on the foundations of levees and their destruction by caving banks, thereby to further reduce the possibility of crevasses and to stabilize the position of the river, in order that contraction or regulation works may be provided to assist in securing and holding the low water channels needed for carrying the commerce of the valley in low water as well as in high.

It is our intention, having held those back, to proceed with contraction works very similar to those which we are putting in so successfully between St. Louis and Cairo, but of a design suited to the location, with the hope that we can secure and maintain better depth from Cairo south on the river, as is now being done between St. Louis and Cairo.

The area in the alluvial valley that would be flooded by Mississippi River water if there were no protecting works is approximately 30,000 square miles. Under the plan recommended, barring accident, approximately 20,550 square miles will be completely protected from Mississippi River water. The remaining 9,450 square miles, of which approximately 3,340 square miles is cleared land, will be protected on an average of from 2 years in 3, to 14 years in 15, depending upon its location. The remaining 6,110 square miles are swamp and timber land which is not injured by flood.

The estimated cost of $296,400,000 for the construction of flood control and navigation work, does not include the costs of rights of way nor possible damage to structures which have invaded the natural flood bed of the river. It is expected that these costs, if any of them are legal and proper, will be borne by the States or other local interests which will, in general, be greatly benefited by the execution of the plan.

As required by law for reports on projects for flood control and for navigation, the report contained an economic study showing the general and local benefits of the plan and the local cooperation that should be required on account of local benefits. The question must be viewed from the standpoint not only of those in the valley needing flood protection, but also of the taxpayers in other parts of the country, including the regions from which the flood waters come, who suffer indirectly from flood disasters, and on whom the bulk of the burden of Federal expenditure must fall.

Several estimates of different well-protected parts of the delta valley result in an average price per acre of $224, when towns and all property, such as houses, roads, railroads, land, etc., are included. The total area of the valley originally subject to overflow is 29,780 square miles, or 19,065,600 acres, 12,000,000 acres of which is usable. This 12,000,000 acres, at $224 per acre, is worth about $2,688,000,000. Adding the probable value of New Orleans would bring this sum up to about $3,500,000,000. Movable property added would make it something like $5,000,000,000.

The value and population behind the levees are increasing all the time. It has been estimated that damages from the 1927 flood were over $200,000,000.

The plan for river control contemplates spending about $300,000,000, or about one-sixteenth of the value estimated above. On the basis of 12,000,000 acres of usable land, this is an average expenditure of about $25 per acre, but it must be remembered that this includes protection to cities, towns, etc.

The cost of the project is unquestionably justified. It will prevent a repetition of the widespread disaster, human suffering, dislocation of the economic life of the valley, interruption of interstate commerce, and the effect on the general welfare of the Nation that attended the recent flood. The expenditure would be justified even though such a flood occurs but once in 150 years. It will prevent the less extensive flood disasters that are likely to occur at much more frequent intervals. The protection afforded to the cities back of the levees in the valley against a flood even greatly exceeding that just past is especially justifiable from a humanitarian standpoint, since an unexpected break in the levees at these places would probably result in serious loss of life and might be an unparalleled catastrophe.

The estimated cost of $296,400,000 for the construction of flood-control and navigation works does not include the costs of rights of way for flood-control works, the cost of any drainage works required therewith, the cost of any flowage rights that may be required, nor damages, if any, resulting from the execution of the plan. No questions of rights of way or damages arise in connection with the navigation works. Local interests should, in the future as in the past, provide all rights of way for flood-control structures. They best can obtain the land at a fair value, and vexing questions as to Federal ownership, administration, or policing of the narrow strips of land will be eliminated. Their land is enhanced in value by the works. Tax collections show that the land in the upper Yazoo Basin has ten times the value that it had before it was leveed. The United States ought not to buy a part of the land to enhance the value of the rest.

Such drainage works as will be required in connection with new interior levee construction are of direct benefit to the lands affected, and their cost should be borne locally.

It is a fundamental principle that no damages lie against either Federal or State Government, or local agencies, on account of an accidental crevasse in the levees. The plan has been drawn to reduce to a minimum the damage to lands and structures resulting from the flow at high floods through the flood ways. All property affected lies in the natural high-water bed of the river. Much of this land was transferred to the States by the swamp act, approved September 28, 1850. The purpose of this act was to enable the States to construct the necessary levees and drains to reclaim the swamp and overflowed lands therein. The principle involved was not new, as the early French grants in the lower valley contained a proviso requiring the grantee to construct and maintain a levee line along the river front of his property. Whether or not the servitude of flooding was transferred to private owners when the land was sold, the servitude should not now be paid for by the Federal Government.

Moreover, the lands, with some exceptions, will have the same protection as is afforded by the present levee system. The exceptions are the lands in the Bonnet Carre flood way and in the setback flood way from Birds Point to New Madrid. The acquisition of flowage rights by the State or local interests may be necessary in these cases. In any case, the lands should remain in private ownership in order that their productive capacity may be fully availed of. The United States does not, in general, own the bed of navigable streams; much less need it own land flooded only at long intervals. Damages, if any, which may be found legal and proper as a consequence of the plan should be met by the States, since these will be directly benefited by the works.

The present flood control act, under which the department has been operating, provides that local interests shall pay one-third of the cost of levee construction. Seventy-one million dollars of Federal funds have been expended on levees; $15,000,000 of contributed funds have been spent by the Federal Government; State and local organizations have themselves spent about $152,000,000. In addition to meeting these great costs, the inhabitants of the valley have been subject to recurring flood damages. The direct damages suffered from the 1927 flood are estimated by the Mississippi Flood Control Association to have been $236,000,000.

In view of the national aspect of the flood-control problem, from the standpoint both of the cause and of the effects of the floods, and in view of the large sums spent in the past by the people of the valley for flood protection, the sacrifices they have made in meeting their allotments, the great losses suffered in the past flood, and the larger expenditures now required, it is believed that the United States should bear a larger proportion of the cost of construction than in the past, and that of the States or local interests should be as small as is consistent with the results desired. While the proportion must be determined in the wisdom of the President and Congress, a division by which the United States shall bear 80 per cent and local interests 20 per cent of the cost of levee construction and control works in general would be in general accord with the existing policy of the President and the precedents established by Congress.

It is very necessary in understanding a problem of this kind to try to present it simply. I can't read the entire report and give you all the technical details, because that would take about two hours. I am, however, endeavoring to give you the main points so that you will carry away with you the main features of the plan and you will understand them. There is no reason why everybody in this audience should not by looking at the map gather the principal features of the plan.

I am reminded in this respect (I thought of it after I got the first draft of my report done) of a conversation I once had with an artist. We were at dinner at the house of a mutual friend, and after dinner the conversation turned to art, a subject about which I don't know very much. I was interested in hearing what the artist had to say. His pictures were popular at that time in the Sunday comics. So I took the liberty, after we had gotten fairly well acquainted, of asking him how long it took him to make one of those sets of six pictures. He smiled and said, "That varies very much. I have struck off six pictures like that in less than an hour, and I have worked on six pictures like that for an entire week. When I finally got them done, it took me another three days to make them look as though I had done them in the hour."

It is somewhat that way in connection with this proposition. We are dealing with enormous figures. Enormous figures are just as easy to handle as small ones, if you will think in the proper units. You frequently hear it said that 2,000,000 and 2,000,000 make 4,000,000 just as surely and just as simply as 2 and 2 make 4. The big man has to have a bigger suit of clothes on him than a little man, but when he gets it on, all he has is a coat and a vest and a pair of trousers—it is just simply a difference in the sizes, as he has the same number of pieces.

The river we are dealing with is one of the greatest rivers, if not the greatest river of the world. It is hard to get in a few words a picture of its size. So many writers, in speaking about it in connection with the last flood, have spoken of it as being something alive. It has in flood ten times the capacity of the St. Lawrence in flood. It consumes 60,000,000 horsepower in getting from Cairo to the Gulf of Mexico in making the banks of the river, transporting its silt, and transporting its own water. This is power that it is not feasible to harness. Think of the enormous amount of it compared with the output of some of our plants with which you are familiar.

The river as a whole is one of the greatest assets of our country. It is supporting this magnificent navigation with which you are so familiar. It is also furnishing the water supply for a vast number of our communities between the Rockies and the Appalachians, carrying the entire drainage of a great number of States and assisting in many other ways. It has one vice and that is the flood vice; that is the one we are trying to regulate, but we must bear in mind that we can not take a force of that kind and force it into a place or into a suit that will not hold it.

I have in my department now something over 60,000 men, and when I make up my mind what is to be done, I have no hesitation in telling them what to do, and they generally do it. In France, on the construction, or the bulk of the construction for the Army, I had over 160,000 men, and the same thing held. Having made up my mind what to do, I told them to do it, and they did it.

I never do that way at all when I am talking or handling Mrs. Jadwin. I wouldn't think of trying anything of the kind. I will occasionally endeavor to try, but I counsel with her and try to guide her somewhat. It is the only way. The rest of you don't need to laugh, because I imagine you all have the same experience. [Laughter.]

The Mississippi is one river that you can't drive, but it is possible for you to control it and to guide it, and that is the fundamental basis of the plan that we are presenting to you to-day, the plan of the Army engineers.

The plan of the Army engineers differs fundamentally from the present project in that it limits the amount of flood waters carried in the main river to a safe capacity and sends the surplus water through lateral flood ways.

If you turn to this map, I am going to try to break away from the notes and run over a few of the points with you.

This is the Mississippi River from Cairo to the Gulf of Mexico. You will see a line with a number of X's in it, running around the outside on the west side, and coming back on the east side. That represents the area subject to flood, naturally. About two-thirds of that area was flooded in 1927. I will show you that on another map.

The green is the entire area subject to flood in the natural condition by floods from the Mississippi River. The darker brown is the part that was flooded in 1927. It was difficult to get all these facts on the same map, so we outlined the color by these lines here.

Starting up at Cairo, the levee is now 60 feet on an average. A good part of the floor of the town is 40 feet, so a good part of the town is 20 feet below the top of the levee. The last flood reached within about 3 feet of the top of the levee. Had it been confined, it would have gone within a foot and a half. The weather experts predict it is ultimately possible to have a flood that will be 6 feet above there.

The city has a levee running around it, what they call "ringing a town." I am unalterably opposed to ever raising that levee any farther, unless the grade in the city itself should be raised. If we should raise the levee farther and there should be a break in the middle of the night, the bulk of these people would be caught like rats in a trap and be drowned. We have never had a catastrophe like that in this country. The nearest we had like it was the Galveston flood, in which about 7,000 people were drowned.

Galveston went to work with the aid of the State—the State remitted their State tax for a period of about 17 years—and built a sea wall, raised the grade, and adjusted themselves to a plan which so protected them, so fortified them, that when the next hurricane came along in 1913 and again in 1915, of substantially the same force, they lost only 36 lives. The number was even smaller than those lost in the small city of Poplar Bluff, Mo., in the recent hurricane.

That shows you what can be done. The only thing to be done there is to set back these red lines you see and build a levee about 70 miles back of the main line and make a flood way there which will carry the water when the river gets high enough so it can not be carried in the main banks. This outer levee is lowered 5 feet. That will protect that area in there so that it can be used for any floods not greater than the flood of 1927.

At the mouth of the St. Johns, near New Madrid, you will see a line running around there with circles. That represents what we call back-water area. As the river rises, it backs and floods up the tributaries and utilizes a considerable area as backwater storage. That land is generally swamp land, growing large trees. That is one of the essential elements of the plan; the use of that land in flood belongs to the river and we must retain it, and we must not allow it to be encroached upon.

Going from New Madrid down to about the mouth of the St. Francis and the mouth of the White, the levees are now of such height and the foundations are such that it is safe to raise them sufficiently to protect the land in the St. Francis Basin back of that. It would be possible to dig a flood way, reaching around and going down either the White or the St. Francis Valley, but this would cost several hundred million dollars and does not seem to be necessary for that third of the river.

You will notice the back-water area outlined here at the mouth of the St. Francis River. It serves the same purpose, only in a larger way, as the one at the mouth of the St. Johns.

Going down a little further, you will find another back-water area at the mouth of the White River and the Arkansas. When we come down to this point, we receive the water of the Arkansas. We strengthen and raise the levee on the Arkansas so that there can be no break, permitting the Mississippi River water to go down to flood southern Arkansas and northern Louisiana as it did in 1927.

I told you that the Mississippi carried in flood about ten times as much water as the St. Lawrence. We construct a floodway 10 miles wide, going down the Bouef River. There were three locations considered for that. We could not put it on the opposite side of the river, because if we had it would come back to the river here and would have to be carried down the main river to the Red. We had to put it on the west side.

We had three locations and accepted the one that seemed to be the most natural and most direct one, and the shortest one. This is bounded on one side by hills or ridges for a good part of the way. Where these are too low we have put in small pieces of connecting levees, and on the other side a connecting levee, so as to confine the water to this 10 miles. That floodway would itself be protected on an average, according to past experience, 11 years out of 12. The land in there is about 80 per cent swamp and timberland.

We raise the main Mississippi levees there 3 feet, so that as the water rises it will not break them, but will break over this lower "fuse-plug section" at the head of the floodway and will then go down there. It takes off the crest of the flood and at the time it is carrying the maximum amount of water it is carrying 900,000 cubic feet a second, which is equivalent to three St. Lawrence Rivers in flood. It gives an idea of the size of the engineering we are working under.

We strengthen the main Mississippi levees and raise them about 3 feet until we get down to the Red River. You will see another backwater area outlined here at the mouth of the Red River. That is a large area, very largely growing timber at present. When we reach the mouth of the Red River we have in that ultimate possible flood 3,000,000 cubic feet a second. We send one-half of that—1,500,000—down the main river by New Orleans. I don't feel that it is safe to put any larger amount down that river.

On the Atchafalaya River we build secondary levees back here on that side and on this side, and a complete levee around in here, so that this part which has been largely flooded in the past will never be flooded again. When the water gets above the 1922 flood, then it will break the "fuse-plug section" at the head of the western one of these two flood ways and will go down there, leaving the eastern one protected completely even against that flood. In case we ever get the ultimate possible flood, it will break the eastern one also.

That flood way will be protected on an average 14 years out of 15. The levees will be kept at substantially their present height and be strengthened and adjusted slightly in height so the people will be able to develop and work that land with a somewhat better protection than they have had in the past.

Coming down, we have the Mississippi levees for a distance raised 3 feet, so there as the water rises it will surely not go over them, but go over the "fuse-plug sections" in the Atchafalaya. As we come down to New Orleans we construct the spillway you see going out into Lake Pontchartrain. This will take 250,000 cubic feet a second. That is closed all the time except when the water on the Carrollton gauge reaches 20 feet. Then that is opened and water is permitted to go out into Lake Pontchartrain until the gauge of its own accord falls below 20 feet at Carrollton.

Some question has been raised as to the effect of that silt on Lake Pontchartrain. The best estimate we can get on it is that it would cause a silting on an average of one thirty-second of an inch a year. Our engineers figure that out as being a raise in the bed of that lake of 1 foot in 360 years. It has been figured by various other engineers. I do not know of anybody else who figures the time so short as that. Some men who have given it a great deal of thought set the point at 1,000 years as the time to raise 1 foot. It is not expected any of that dirt, appreciably, will go out into Mississippi Sound. There will be a discoloring of the water, but it is not expected there will be an appreciable sediment there. The material when it settles will be there and will be a source of material if it is ever desired to pump it out for raising the lowlands in the neighborhood of the lake.

In case the ultimate possible should ever come, it is not expected to exceed the top of the levees. It is further expected the opening of the bottle necks down the river will give a slightly increased factor of safety. The figures show that the levees will be 1 foot above the top of this. By opening these bottle necks and by the addition of a small amount of dirt we could probably, if desired, add another foot. The levees themselves will be made 12 feet wide on top, instead of 8 feet as at present, so as to give a good foundation for a flood fight if it is ever found necessary. There would probably be a good warning in case of this, and it is quite possible to gain 1 or 2 more feet in that way.

The reservoirs that will probably be ultimately constructed on the tributaries of the Mississippi and other waters will probably of their own accord, even if they are used simply for upstream purposes, give an additional foot factor of safety against this ultimate possible flood.

While the project recognizes the interests and protects the rights of those who will be chiefly benefited and of those who furnish the funds, it gives a maximum of results for the minimum of cost. I have heard that there is propaganda on the part of some to establish a commission to prepare a plan for the flood control of the lower Mississippi, and I understand that they count on putting on that commission some very good men, some very good engineers, but these men are not experienced in the Mississippi Valley. We have counseled, we have had the advantage of the advice of all men who had experience in the last 30 or 40 years on the protection of the Mississippi Valley, Army engineers, civilians; we have had the advice of the levee board engineers; and we have had public hearings and have gotten the views of everybody practically who knows anything really at present about this subject. These men who are going on this commission, if it is appointed, may be good men, but it is going to take them a long time to get to know anything nearly as much about this subject as is known by the men who have worked up this project.

I venture the prediction that if these new men work 10 years on this project they can not get as good a plan as the one that I have presented to you here to-day, unless they recommend the same plan. [Applause.]

If this congress and the National Congress will get behind this plan and put it through, we will have the plan done, the work finished in 10 years.

I thank you. [Applause.]

NICARAGUAN AFFAIRS

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I ask that there be printed in the RECORD an editorial from the Washington Daily News of Tuesday, January 3, 1928, entitled "Nicaraguan 'Bandits.'"

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is here printed, as follows:

NICARAGUAN "BANDITS"

At Quilali Friday 5 United States marines were killed outright and 23 wounded in a sharp engagement with a force of 500 Nicaraguans fighting under the command of General Sandino, according to official dispatches from Managua.

From Washington, at the same time, comes the complementary bit of information that marine reinforcements are being rushed to the scene of action by transport from New York, all of which has the ring of war about it. And war it is, too, however much it may be camouflaged, a war of revolution in a Central American Republic against the might of the United States.

Gradually, if slowly, the American public is beginning to realize that it has been shamelessly deceived as to the real state of affairs in Nicaragua.

To sum it up in a few lines, a Liberal revolution was in full blast last year and was on the point of overthrowing our man, President Diaz, a Conservative, when President Coolidge sent Col. Henry L. Stimson down there to see what, if anything, could be done to stop the bloodshed and at the same time keep Diaz in power.

Colonel Stimson found a way. In an interview with General Moncada, the revolutionary commander in chief, he made it plain to the general that it was either a case of surrender or fight the United States. Moncada yielded and our forces then in Nicaragua began disarming his men.

But one of Moncada's lieutenants, General Sandino, refused to surrender. He and his command kept to the field. Sandino, Colonel Stimson reported, had only "about 150 followers"—men whom Washington officials ever since have referred to as "bandits."

Against these "150 followers" of Sandino, then, some 1,400 American marines, along with a couple of thousand or so native troops, have been fighting ever since. But lest you should get the idea that our marines have lost some of their effectiveness, let it be recorded here and now that the story of General Sandino and his "150 followers" was sheerest nonsense. Sandino had behind him a fair-sized army for a country as small as Nicaragua, and proof of this is to be found in the story of the last few months' fighting. Tabulation of casualties show that approximately 670 "bandits" have been killed since Colonel Stimson reported. And since at least twice that number have been wounded in those same engagements—two wounded men for each fatality in battle is a conservative estimate—Sandino's total casualties during the period under discussion must have been around 2,000. Yet at Quilali last Friday this extraordinary general seems to have had with him 500 followers alive and well and able to shoot to kill.

It is perfectly patent, therefore, that the American public has been disgracefully deceived. Not only has General Sandino's strength been grossly underestimated—obviously he is stronger to-day than ever, despite the casualties inflicted upon him—but the inspiration to make it appear that he and his followers are mere bandits was equally ridiculous. And any further attempt to keep up this fiction becomes an insult to the American public.

We should at least be honest with ourselves, as this newspaper observed recently upon a similar bloody occasion. We should not stoop to silly deception. We fool nobody but ourselves and not even ourselves for long. For the time being, at any rate, Nicaragua has become an American protectorate and what we are doing down there is not fighting bandits but Nicaraguans in revolt against our rule.

Admittedly we have certain well-defined rights in Nicaragua—our canal rights, for example. But unless we wish to spoil our chances for winning the friendship of the rest of Latin America we must find a better way of protecting them than killing off vast numbers of natives on the pretext that they are bandits.

RETIREMENT OF EMERGENCY OFFICERS

Mr. TYSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD resolutions passed by the American Legion at its Paris, France, convention; also by the Los Angeles Post, No. 1, of Disabled Veterans of the World War; also by the Sons of the Revolution in the State of California.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is here printed, as follows:

The committee on legislation of the American Legion, at the national convention held in Paris, France, October 19–23, 1927, submitted as a part of its report the following resolution, which was unanimously adopted:

"Whereas the American Legion at each of its national conventions has overwhelmingly voted to have enacted into law legislation for the retirement of emergency Army officers permanently disabled in line of duty during the World War, so as to place them on the same footing as to retirement as the other eight classes of officers who are now on the retired lists; and

"Whereas the American Legion has previously indorsed the principle of this long-pending legislation; and

NATIONAL INSTITUTE OF HEALTH

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, there is pending before the Commerce Committee a very important bill (S. 871), which I had the honor of introducing, to create a national institute of health.

I ask to have printed in connection with that bill a remarkable address entitled "The Ultimate Mission of Chemistry, Good Health," delivered recently by Dr. Charles H. Herty, of New York.

I ask also to have printed with the address, which is quite brief, the indorsement of this bill by the American Chemical Society, the American Medical Society, and the American Public Health Association, and a copy of the bill itself, all of which are included.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

THE ULTIMATE MISSION OF CHEMISTRY, GOOD HEALTH

An address before the joint meeting of the Virginia Section, American Chemical Society, and the Woman's Club of Richmond, at Richmond, Va., on October 21, 1927, by Charles H. Herty, advisor, the Chemical Foundation (Inc.)

Wrapped in mystery and secrecy, and spurred on by hope of high reward, alchemists of the Middle Ages sought in vain to discover the philosophers' stone, with which they hoped to transmute all baser metals into regal gold. In the sixteenth century another group of alchemists, led by Paracelsus, caught a nobler vision. Again it was the philosophers' stone they sought, but one whose powers would prove a universal cure for the ills of the human flesh. Though they failed, up out of this welter of mysticism, secrecy, and empiricism there gradually evolved the science of chemistry and the modern method of scientific attack, namely, research.

Industry was quick to recognize the value of this new tool, and through its applications in improvement of manufacturing processes, the betterment of quality, and the discovery of new compounds, wealth is being created which amply repays the outlay. For industrial purposes a true philosophers' stone has been found, for gold is only a basis of currency, the manufacturer seeks bankable profits.

Only haltingly and all too inadequately has humanity followed the lead of the industrialists and recognized that the modern philosophers' stone for health is likewise research. Too often we accept sickness as a necessary evil, and a part of the heritage of mankind which must be endured. Moreover, the results of research on health are not a direct, profit-making undertaking, as is the case in industry.

Yet entirely apart from the grief and suffering which result from ill health and premature death, the economic losses resulting from sickness are enormous, and have been calculated with reasonable accuracy. As a result of careful surveys by different investigators it has been found that this Nation spends annually for drugs, doctor's services, interest on hospital endowments, and for hospital maintenance, a sum of not less than $1,000,000,000. But this expenditure is only a minor item. For light on the still greater costs we are indebted to Dr. Louis I. Dublin, chief statistician of the Metropolitan Life Insurance Co. After a thorough study of the mass of data available through this great organization, and with full explanation of how the figures are reached, Doctor Dublin has published his conviction "that sickness costs directly in lost wages, in reduced production, as well as in the necessary care, a total of two and a quarter billion dollars a year." Yet the greater losses are ahead of us, for Doctor Dublin further states: "Having due regard for the value of life at each age period, I estimate that the total capital value of the lives which can be saved annually through the application of modern preventive medicine and public-health measures is over $6,000,000,000."

$15,000,000,000 LOSSES INVOLVED

Still more do the figures mount, for in the total we must include economic losses from those forms of sickness and disease which, despite the advances of science, must be considered as at present unpreventable. At the recent annual meeting of the American Public Health Association in Cincinnati the president, Dr. Charles V. Chapin, stated: "What is unknown about maintaining and perfecting the health of mankind is far greater than what is known. The opportunities in the scientific field are as great to-day as before the days of Harvey, Lister, and Pasteur." It is a conservative estimate which adds another $6,000,000,000 from this source.

What staggering figures! A total of approximately $15,000,000,000! Frankly, I can not grasp their full significance except by comparison. There they stand, almost the equal of our national debt, and constituting an annual loss greater than all the debts owed us by foreign countries about which we talk so much and over which the world travails to-day. Fifteen billion dollars! More than two-thirds of the $22,000,000,000 required annually for feeding the Nation.

Only recently the Manufacturers Record set forth with justifiable pride, as illustrative of the growth of the new South, an enumeration of the costs of the many beautiful medical arts centers which have arisen in various southern cities. Do we realize that such buildings really represent the tax which our people pay because of the limitations of scientific knowledge as to the ills of the flesh?

These are not questions which concern those apart from us. They come home directly to each citizen. Look over the bottles of drugs in your medical cabinet. Consult your check books as to expenses for doctors' services. Think over the hospital charges you have incurred and then determine whether or not this is a question which comes home directly to each of you.

CHEMISTRY'S BIG PROBLEMS

Perhaps we shall think clearer if we get a new conception of what our physical bodies really are—nothing more nor less than organic chemical factories wherein the most delicate and complex reactions are occurring every moment. When these reactions are normal we feel ourselves to be in good health, efficient, and energetic, but the moment they become abnormal efficiency decreases, ambition lags, and sickness pursues its usual course of misery. Our physicians apply with skill the discoveries which science makes available to them, but after all they can only administer. Further advances must be made by the trained researchers in science.

Of all the sciences involved chemistry is predominant, especially organic and physical chemistry. In the unit cell the protoplasmic content brings us at once into the field of organic chemistry, and the flow of materials into and out from these cells presents intricate problems of colloid chemistry. The glands of the body are constantly producing minute quantities of hormones, organic compounds about which we know so little, yet enough to understand how deeply these secretions affect health, temperament, and emotions. The inhalation of oxygen causes changes in the blood stream which for years we have thought were well understood, yet in the light of the work done in the laboratory of the United States Public Health Service by Dr. Mansfield Clark it is probable that an entirely new interpretation will have to be given to reactions which have so long formed the basis of physiological diagnoses. The disruption of chemical equilibria within our bodies results in many important changes; perhaps the final explanation for the common cold lies just here. In health organic reactions are taking place under normal velocities, but when by some catalytic agency these reactions are accelerated or retarded, trouble begins. Hydrogenion concentration is a term in daily use in all biochemical laboratories. I need but mention the beneficent services of chemo-therapy in furnishing far-reaching specific cures. Bear in mind how little we know as yet about the vitamines. The varying recommendations as to diet, from year to year, reveal the many unsolved questions in metabolism. Problems of all sorts confront us. One's body is a chemical factory which through its very nature makes intensely difficult the research necessary to solve these problems, but is there anyone who in his heart doubts the eventual ability of science to find the solutions?

The very difficulties make all the more urgent a determined and comprehensive attack. I would not utter one word to detract from the high praise due those already at work in this field. In our universities men and women are giving unselfishly of their time, energy, and enthusiasm; yet, after all, such work is in most cases secondary to their teaching duties, and all too frequently funds for experimental equipment are pitifully small. Moreover, in many cases such work is all too isolated, too individualistic. In endowed institutions, made possible by the generosity of men of wealth, scientists are giving their entire time, but the number of such institutions is very limited, while the problems are legion.

THE HOSPITAL'S FUNCTION

In a few, but only a few, of our hospitals there is a linking up of the clinical evidence with the fundamental point of view of the scientists. Some day that situation will be changed. Are our hospital authorities content with supplying beds and medical advice for an unending stream of the sick? Will they not catch the larger vision that from these sick beds science can gain inestimable help in preventing those now well from undertaking so sad a journey?

No one will testify more willingly than physicians themselves to the fundamental importance of chemistry in the cure of sickness. They were once students in medical colleges. A glance at the curricula of those times readily explains the lack of knowledge of chemistry on the part of the physician in his daily practice, but he knows that it is chemistry that is needed, and he is seeking that aid. But, like the industrialist of a decade ago, he all too frequently uses the chemist merely as a routine analyst. The industrialist still uses the analytical chemist, but his loud clamor to-day is for the research chemist. So must it be in medicine.

The research chemist will tell you immediately that his work alone does not suffice. Cooperation of all branches of science is required. The chemist, the bacteriologist, the pharmacologist, the physicist, the clinician, must work side by side if truth is to be reached quickly. Happily that spirit of cooperation is increasing. It should be fostered.

Whence will come the supply of chemists adequately trained for this all-important service? Naturally, from our universities. In a recent survey of the lines of chemical research in progress by graduate students the National Research Council finds that of the 1,882 graduate students in chemistry, 475 are in the field of organic chemistry and 207 in physiological chemistry. If we add those who are specializing in colloid chemistry, in catalysis, in pharmacological, pharmaceutical, sanitary, and food chemistry, we see at once how large a proportion of trained men and women will leave our universities in the next few years equipped for this line of research. One of the greatest benefits of the establishment of a complete organic chemical industry in this country since the war is the directive tendency toward research which can be applied equally for wealth or for health.

POPULAR ACTION NECESSARY

Researchers, however, can not live by enthusiasm alone; they must be paid at least a decent living wage. From what sources may we expect that financial aid which will enable this increasing army waging the battle against disease to function efficiently? We can look forward confidently to the founding of more and greater endowed institutions. The continued growth of the graduate schools of our universities means the multiplication of the hands and the time of able professors. But after all is it the true American spirit which would lead us to be content to await the largess of the rich or the devoted enthusiasm of professorial staffs in order to remove through scientific research this financial drain upon each of us as individual citizens? No! In other lines of financial betterment we do not sit idly by twitting our thumbs and waiting for a legacy from some rich citizen unknown to us or trusting that some generous friend will share with us the product of his brain.

We are proud of the fact that we hustle for ourselves, and we count as our most precious heritage that independent spirit which leads us to look after our own business. Invoking the same spirit of independence, I say to you that since we are all subject to sickness, since ill-health is characteristic of no particular section and is no respecter of age, sex, or position in life, the financing of research for better health is a matter for united action by all our people.

Fortunately it is not necessary to make a house-to-house campaign to solicit funds for such an undertaking. The machinery is already provided—appropriations by Congress from the Federal taxes. This method is already being utilized for the ailments of business through the splendid work of the Department of Commerce; for the sickness of crops and livestock in the energetic laboratories of the Department of Agriculture. When the corn borer threatened this great staple crop the last Congress in a jiffy appropriated $10,000,000 for its extermination. Hogs and cows receive their full meed of attention from the national community chest—but, oh, how pitiful in comparison are the appropriations for scientific research on the ills of the human flesh. Remembering that these problems are fundamentally chemical, it will doubtless amaze you to learn that of the many millions of public funds appropriated last year, only thirty to forty thousand dollars were available for the chemical research work of the hygienic laboratory of the United States Public Health Service, in contrast with the $10,000,000 for the corn borer, and in the face of an annual economic loss through sickness of $15,000,000,000. And this in a day when every tongue is loud in praise of the wonderful accomplishments of science.

THE RANSDELL BILL

Hon. JOSEPH E. RANSDELL, United States Senator from Louisiana, has seen the light. In the closing days of the last session he introduced a measure which aims to correct this situation. He proposes to reintroduce this bill immediately after the opening of Congress in December; hearings will be held, and the measure will be vigorously pushed.

The Ransdell bill (S. 5835) provides for the creation of a national institute of health within the the United States Public Health Service. No new administrative body is contemplated, the institute constituting an integral part of the Public Health Service, a branch of the Government service which has always been held in high esteem for its efficiency. An appropriation is included adequate for the construction of suitable buildings and for equipment and maintenance. A system of fellowships will enable trained researchers to pursue investigations either in Washington or at distant points in this country or foreign lands, wherever the problem can be worked upon best. Acceptance by the Public Health Service of gifts from individuals who wish to endow specific lines of research is authorized. The bill includes all of the provisions of the Parker bill (H. R. 10125), a measure which seeks greater efficiency in Government health work by combining all of these activities within the Public Health Service.

UNANIMOUS INDORSEMENTS

Senator RANSDELL'S bill received the unanimous indorsement of the organized physicians of the country, the American Medical Association, at the annual meeting in Washington in May of this year. Just a few days ago in Cincinnati it received similar approval from the American Public Health Association, while the American Chemical Society started the wave of popular approval by a unanimous vote of the council at Richmond, Va., last spring.

What possible obstacles will confront the bill when it comes up for action by the next Congress?

First. A lack of understanding on the part of Members of Congress. As citizens it is our duty to see that our lawmakers are informed regarding the situation and its remedy.

Second. The economy program of the administration. But surely it would be false economy to refuse to spend a few million dollars in order to save the billions now being sacrificed.

Third. Flood control will be in the forefront of the thoughts of every Member of Congress. Rightly so, for the recent Mississippi flood, with its attendant loss of life and of property, estimated at from $250,000,000 to $500,000,000, was a national disaster, and the avoidance of its recurrence is a national responsibility. The rush of those mighty waters awoke us to our duty. The ravages of sickness and disease, however, are confined to the quiet bedroom, and so ubiquitous are these afflictions that they do not constitute news. Devastating floods come only at intervals, but the far greater economic losses from ill health are continuous. These billions are entirely apart from the suffering and sorrow which no power of mathematics can estimate. From out these shadows science can lead the way to light. With conviction in your hearts, speed the day when America shall make this great contribution to humanity.

INDORSEMENTS OF THE BILL

AMERICAN CHEMICAL SOCIETY

[Extract from the proceedings of the council, Richmond, Va., April 11, 1927]

The chairman offered the following resolution, which was unanimously passed:

"Whereas the prevalence of sickness among our people, with attendant suffering and economic losses, points clearly to the need of a greater amount of fundamental research for the alleviation of this condition; and

"Whereas all are subject to sickness, all should participate in providing for this necessary fundamental research: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That the Council of the American Chemical Society approves the principles embodied in the bill S. 5835, introduced in the Sixty-ninth Congress by Senator RANSDELL, providing for a national institute of health and for needed administrative reforms in the United States Public Health Service, and urges its early and favorable consideration by the Seventieth Congress."

AMERICAN MEDICAL SOCIETY

[Extract from the proceedings of the Washington session, house of delegates, May 18, 1927]

Dr. E. J. Goodwin, Missouri, read a supplementary report of the reference committee on legislation and public relations:

"1. The reference committee recommends that the house of delegates reaffirm its approval in principle of the Parker bill approved at the Dallas session, coordinating all public-health activities of the Federal Government under the direction of the United States Public Health Service. We also recommend the approval of the Ransdell bill, which is identical with the Parker bill excepting that the Ransdell bill appropriates $10,000,000 to establish and operate a national institute of health under the control of the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service.

* * * * * * *

"The report as a whole was adopted on motion of Doctor Goodwin, seconded by Dr. A. T. McCormack, Kentucky."

AMERICAN PUBLIC HEALTH ASSOCIATION

Resolution passed by the governing council at Cincinnati, Ohio, October 19, 1927:

"Recognizing the need for thoroughly coordinated efforts on the part of all Government agencies concerned with questions of public health; and

"Convinced that fundamental research is the necessary foundation for all progress in health problems: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That the American Public Health Association hereby approves the principles of the Ransdell bill (S. 5835), introduced in the Senate of the Sixty-ninth Congress of the United States on March 2, 1927."

THE RANSDELL BILL

In the Senate of the United States, December 9, 1927. Mr. RANSDELL introduced the following bill, which was read twice and referred to the Committee on Commerce:

[S. 871, 70th Cong., 1st sess.]

A bill to establish a national institute of health, to authorize increased appropriations for the Hygienic Laboratory, and to authorize the Government to accept donations for use in ascertaining the cause, prevention, and cure of disease affecting human beings, and for other purposes

Be it enacted, etc., That whenever the President finds that it will promote greater efficiency in the conduct of the public-health activities of the Government he is authorized, by Executive order, to transfer to the Public Health Service all or any part of any executive agency (other than an agency of the military or naval forces, the War Department, the Navy Department, or the United States Veterans' Bureau) engaged in carrying on a public-health activity. Any such Executive order shall also designate the records, property (including office equipment), personnel, and unexpended balance of appropriations to be transferred.

SEC. 2. (a) The President is authorized, by Executive order, to direct that officers or employees of the Public Health Service shall be detailed to any other executive agency which is carrying on a public-health activity in order to supervise or cooperate in such work.

(b) Upon the request of the head of an executive department or an independent establishment which is carrying on a public-health activity, the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service is authorized to detail officers or employees of the Public Health Service to such department or independent establishment in order to supervise or cooperate in such work.

SEC. 3. (a) The Surgeon General of the Public Health Service is authorized to detail medical or scientific personnel of the Public Health Service to educational and research institutions for special studies of scientific problems relating to public health and for the dissemination of information relating to public health, and to extend the facilities of the Hygienic Laboratory to health officials and scientists engaged in special study.

(b) The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to establish such additional divisions in the Hygienic Laboratory as he deems necessary to provide agencies for the solution of public-health problems and facilities for the coordination of research of public-health officials and scientists and for demonstrations of sanitary methods and appliances.

(c) The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to establish and operate a national institute of health under the jurisdiction of his department and the administrative control of the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service which shall be devoted to scientific research in the fundamental problems of the diseases of man and matters pertaining thereto. The Secretary is authorized to select a site on land owned by the Government and available for this purpose, or to acquire a site by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, in or near the District of Columbia, and to erect thereon suitable and necessary buildings, including furniture and equipment for the use of such institute. In the administration and operation of this institute the Surgeon General shall select persons who show unusual aptitude in science. The Surgeon General, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may make such rules and regulations for the government and administration of such institute as he deems advisable. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $10,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this paragraph.

SEC. 4. (a) The President is authorized to transmit to Congress through the Bureau of the Budget estimates of the amounts necessary for the construction on the site now occupied by the Hygienic Laboratory of buildings adequate for the Public Health Service, also estimates for amounts necessary in connection with the establishment and operation of the national institute of health described in the foregoing section, together with such other amounts as he may deem necessary to carry out the objects and purposes of this act.

(b) The administrative office and bureau divisions of the Public Health Service in the District of Columbia shall be administered as a part of the departmental organization, and the scientific offices and research laboratories of the Public Health Service (whether or not in the District of Columbia) shall be administered as a part of the field service.

(c) The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to accept, on behalf of the United States, gifts by will or otherwise for study, investigation, and research in the fundamental problems of the diseases of man and matters pertaining thereto. Any such gifts shall be held in trust, and shall be invested by the Secretary of the Treasury in securities of the United States, and the income thereof shall be administered by the Surgeon General for the purposes indicated in this act. The Surgeon General is authorized to establish fellowships in the Hygienic Laboratory and the national institute of health, and utilize the proceeds thereof in aid of individual scientists who have demonstrated or give promise of marked proficiency in research and investigations relating to the diseases of man. Gifts in the amount of $500,000 or more shall bear the name of the donor.

(d) Individual scientists designated by the Surgeon General to receive fellowships may be appointed for duty in the Hygienic Laboratory and the national institute of health established by this act. During the period of such fellowship, these appointees shall hold appointments under regulations promulgated by the Secretary of the Treasury, and shall be subject to administrative regulations for the conduct of the Public Health Service. Scientists so selected may likewise be designated for the prosecution of investigations in other localities and institutions in this and other countries during the term of their fellowships.

SEC. 5. (a) Hereafter sanitary engineers, dental officers, and scientists of the Public Health Service, selected for general service and subject to changes of station, shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, subject to the same conditions and limitations as medical officers of the Public Health Service, except that—

(1) Examinations shall be in the several branches of the profession of the person to be appointed;

(2) Any sanitary engineer, medical, dental, or other scientific officer in the Public Health Service upon the date of passage of this act, or transferred to the Public Health Service under the authority of this act, after examination by a board of officers convened by the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service, and upon the recommendation of such board and the Surgeon General, may be appointed to any grade designated by such board and approved by the Surgeon General; and in computing longevity pay and pay period the service of any such officer shall be counted in the same manner as though he were in the service on June 30, 1922; and

(3) Whenever in the opinion of the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service commissioned officers are not available for the performance of permanent duties requiring highly specialized training and experience in scientific research, including the duties of chiefs of divisions of the Hygienic Laboratory, any person, after examination by a board of officers convened by the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service and upon the recommendation of such board and the Surgeon General, may be appointed to any grade designated by such board and approved by the Surgeon General.

(b) The Surgeon General of the Public Health Service shall designate the grades of commissioned officers of the Public Health Service other than medical officers, corresponding to the grades of medical officers.

(c) Hereafter commissioned officers of the Public Health Service shall be entitled to promotion according to the same length of service as officers of corresponding grades of the Medical Corps of the Army and the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service shall have the equivalent rank of, and shall be entitled to the same pay and allowance as, the Surgeon General of the Army.

(d) The limitation now imposed upon the number of Assistant Surgeons General and senior surgeons of the Public Health Service, on active duty, is hereby repealed.

(e) Hereafter officers of the Public Health Service in the grade of Assistant Surgeon General on field service shall be designated and known as medical directors.

SEC. 6. Hereafter the Secretary of the Treasury shall appoint, in accordance with the civil service laws, all officers and employees, other than commissioned officers, of the Public Health Service, and may make any such appointment effective as of the date on which the officer or employee enters upon duty.

SEC. 7. There is hereby established in the Public Health Service a nurse corps, which shall consist of a superintendent and such other nurses as the Secretary of the Treasury may deem necessary. The members of the nurse corps shall be entitled to receive the same pay and allowances as nurses of the Army.

SEC. 8. Hereafter the advisory board for the Hygienic Laboratory shall be known as the national advisory health council, and the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, is authorized to appoint, from representatives of the public-health profession, five additional members of such council. The terms of service, compensation, and allowances of such additional members shall be the same as the other members of such council not in the regular employment of the Government, except that the terms of service of the members first appointed shall be so arranged that the terms of not more than two members shall expire each year. Such council, in addition to its other functions, shall advise the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service in respect of public-health activities.

SEC. 9. As used in this act, the term "executive agency" means any board, bureau, division, service, or office in the executive branch of the Government.

BRIDGES OVER NAVIGABLE RIVERS

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Commerce an address by Hon. J. Hampton Moore before the Rivers and Harbors Congress on bridges over navigable rivers, and an address delivered at the same time on channels and bridges by Mr. Chriss A. Bell, of Portland, Oreg.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is here printed, as follows:

ADDRESS OF HON. J. HAMPTON MOORE

President WILSON. Ladies and gentlemen, in the development of highway construction and train transportation the question of bridges over our navigable rivers has become a question of great national interest. We are fortunate to have to discuss that problem before us this afternoon Hon. J. Hampton Moore, of Philadelphia, Pa., president of the Atlantic Deeper Waterways Association. [Applause.]

Mr. J. HAMPTON MOORE. Mr. President, ladies, and gentlemen, it seems to me at this time it might be well to have one or two extemporaneous speeches, but the texts assigned to the various speeches have been such that I find most of them deem it wise to confine themselves to notes. Your secretary, Mr. Thompson, assigned to me a text that required me to place myself upon paper. If there are any mistakes in the matter of statistics or even in the matter of judgment with respect to this paper, they are my own.

Rather than "Bridges over navigable rivers," this paper might be entitled "Artificial limitations upon the commerce of a Nation"; for whatever tends to abridge navigation is a menace to the national progress and prosperity. It is apparent that bridge building has become a great American industry. Along with road building which has been largely inspired by the demands of automotive traffic, it has grown immensely throughout the United States. But it has been, and is now being accelerated by promoters who, taking advantage of the good roads movement and the demand for speed and convenience on land, find they can market stocks and bonds on the probable returns from privately operated bridges. The result in certain instances has been a reckless disregard of the rights of navigation and a challenge to the future commerce of the country.

One engineering authority recently has gone so far as to suggest that if ships using the navigable rivers can not pass under the bridges, they should cut down their masts, hinge their funnels, and dismantle their wireless apparatus in order to accommodate themselves to bridge limitations. A conciliatory, fair weather suggestion, but not lacking nerve!

Unfortunately, it has not been difficult for individuals or corporations to secure national bridge privileges. My friend Riley and I were in Congress for a long time, and he recalls, as I do, there is not very great difficulty in getting a permit, or at least an act through, and there is no very great inquiry as to those who desire to obtain the privilege. All that is thrown back, under the general bridge law, upon the United States Army engineers.

Congress has been extremely liberal in granting them and has recently authorized the conference upon promoters of the right of eminent domain, which sooner or later involves a charge upon the taxpayers, and the right to sell out to States or subdivisions thereof, even to the extent of unloading upon the people who had no voice in the organization of the enterprise. The statistics on bridges over navigable streams are imposing. With the assured success of many public bridges charging tolls, and private bridges also, they are becoming more so. When in 1925 the War Department attempted to list the bridges over navigable waters in the United States, it was found that there were about 6,000 in all. A more recent calculation shows that at the present time there are approximately 6,800 bridges, about 3,900 of which are highway bridges paid for by the people, about 2,330 belonging to railroads, and about 570 miscellaneous or privately promoted. All these bridges extending over navigable waters come within the jurisdiction of the United States and are subject to the oversight of the War Department. I suspect there can be no valid objection to any of them which meet public requirements, are not obstructive to navigation, and do not trespass upon public or private rights; but in recent years larger bridge plans, involving heavier costs, have been presented, and some of them have been highly objectionable with respect to the rights of navigation they threaten. There has, indeed, grown up a need for closer scrutiny of bridge plans. The various Army engineers to whom have been assigned the duty of reporting upon these plans have encountered the opposition of shipowners and operators, who have been obliged to defend themselves against promoters of bridges looking only for the profits to be derived from construction.

It is now being generally recognized that low, fixed bridges, such as were freely erected in the earlier days by the railroads of New England in particular, were a great mistake and at variance with the public interest. Communities that have grown up along the streams behind such bridges realize that their approach to the sea has been cut off. The ships are barred and transportation both in the matter of rates and convenience is made more difficult.

On certain navigable streams that lead into the ocean, inquiries are made by those who make charges as to how many charges are to be made, and extra charges are imposed because of the menace of the bridge. That also includes bridges and things of that kind. The people living upstream are the people we have been trying to reach, particularly upon the Atlantic seaboard.

People living upstream are thus commercially handicapped, as in the case of the New York Barge Canal, where, while a splendid service is being rendered upon the channels provided, the size of the ships is limited by the height of the fixed bridges over the canal.

In certain parts of the country where navigable streams have assumed both a national and international importance, and where the big ships come and go, the problem is serious. Here it concerns a vastly greater volume of business, which in turn affects production and transportation, as well as National, State, or municipal revenues. In the end it is a taxpayer's burden. Fortunately, for navigation as well as for commerce generally, recent hearings before the United States Army engineers have developed sturdy opposition to bridges that obstruct navigable waters or interfere with future commerce. The contest over the Columbia River Bridge between Long View, Wash., and Rainier, Oreg., is in point. Two citizens obtained an act of Congress for this bridge.

They obtained it without any very great difficulty and apparently without any very loud protest at the time they applied for it.

Their act did not follow the new form, nor did it leave everything the judgment of the Army engineers. It delegated the power of inquiry to the Secretaries of War, Commerce, and Agriculture. The city of Portland objected to the bridge plans, not only because of the height of span and pier obstructions in the river but because of the primary rights of navigation and the constitutional right of one port to be on an equality with another.

That has been variously interpreted throughout the years, but Portland evidently had the nerve to raise that question as to the equality of ports, saying that a bridge was to be erected between the city and the sea, which bridge unquestionably would affect the commerce of the hinterland depending upon the port of Portland for its outlet to the sea and for its distribution to the countries of the world.

It was reasoned that if other ports along the Pacific coast or elsewhere were free from bridge obstructions, so that the vessels of the world might come in, then Portland would not be on an equality with other ports.

So far as the ordinary lay construction of the matter of uniformity was concerned, it would seem that was a reasonable interpretation of the Constitution.

This same argument may readily apply to eastern rivers, such as the Delaware, or the Hudson, the Patapsco, the James, the Savannah, or the St. Johns, or to the Mississippi and its many tributaries. The Columbia River case is still pending, but during the hearings sufficient testimony was adduced to show that Pacific coast interests are not satisfied with a 135-foot clearance above mean low water, which has been accepted elsewhere a standard, and demand and will probably receive a greater height to protect navigation and provide for future commerce. Bridge-span requirements at San Francisco and at Vancouver, running as high as 220 feet, were cited in support of Portland's case. If, therefore, a vertical clearance of 175 or 200 or even 220 feet is to be required to protect ports on the west coast, it is clear that an equality of ports will not exist on the Atlantic coast, where more moderate clearances for bridges over great navigable waterways have already been established.

I find that the report of the three secretaries, which seems now not to be strongly objected to, requires a height of span so that the flood waters may be considered, especially in times of flood. The tidal conditions may be considered, so there will be a clearance above mean low water of 186 feet. I have been told it was even higher than that, but that is a very great height, and Portland to that extent has won its fight for its right to have the big ships come and go into the city of Portland or the port of Portland, which extends considerably far in from the Pacific coast.

Take the Detroit River bridge, under which, had it been built in 1925, it would, according to the secretary of the National Rivers and Harbors Congress, have passed 90,000,000 tons.

They are boastful—and I think justly so—about the tremendous tonnage that flows from Detroit. Whether it stops there or not, they have got it on the river.

The plans for this bridge contemplated a vertical clearance of 120 feet at the harbor lines and of 135 feet in the center of the span. A contest waged before the Army engineers resulted in a change of plans from 120 to 135 feet at the harbor lines and from 135 to 152 in the center of the span.

Therefore Detroit protested against a 135-foot clearance and won its contest. Therefore Portland gets 186 and Detroit gets 152. Then some of us who have been getting only 135 are put out of the class of uniformity. I suppose the question will arise with respect to some of us later on when the big ships come and find they can not pass through.

Here was a substantial vindication of the effort to protect future commerce in one of the greatest tonnage centers.

I emphasize future, because that is what the whole fight in opposition to certain bridges is about—not that they shall meet the commerce of to-day, not that they shall meet the tonnage conditions of to-day, when they are only beginning to talk about the development of the Mississippi, when we really are only beginning to get improvements along the Atlantic coast; not to confine us to the business of today, but to take care of that great future commerce which every one of us expects and which we have a right to expect by virtue of the governmental attention now being given to waterways, not only as great arteries of commerce, but as these important agencies that have been described here by our western brethren to-day, so essential to the welfare, progress, and the prosperity of the whole country. [Applause.]

Similar successful protests against inadequate span plans were made with respect to a bridge over the Cape Fear River at Wilmington, N. C., and others over the Delaware River at Palmyra and the Chesapeake Bay outside of Baltimore. In the case of the Chesapeake Bay bridge, which is to be about 8 miles long, vessel owners and captains were earnest in their protest because of the great expanse of water thus blockaded and the dangers incumbent upon finding the open span in bad weather or when ice is in the bay.

Just imagine, if you please, a bridge 8 miles across the great Chesapeake Bay, one of the most fruitful and one of the best bodies of water for commercial purposes and for the propagation of sea-food life that we have in the United States.

Plans for the bridge across the Delaware at Tacony-Palmyra were objected to because of their inadequacy, and were finally revised so that instead of 11 piers in the river there will now be 8.

Think of that in the Delaware River just above the city of Philadelphia—1 span still within the city, one approach—not 11 spans (we have had that cut down), but 8 spans in the Delaware River! Yet the engineers have no recourse. Congress said, "Let the bridge be built, and let it be built there; and you, War Department, see that the rights of navigation are protected." Then, of course, it becomes a matter of local interest. The national interest, unless somebody, some such association as ours along the Atlantic Coast, rises up to protest, the engineer is obliged to find very largely in accordance with the local interest, because he has orders to build, and the national interest, apparently, is forgotten, except for the contingency that I have mentioned.

The channel span has been increased in width to 250 feet, and a bascule lift has been provided.

Therefore we have taken care that a span was not 200 feet wide, but that it is 250 feet wide, although it costs the constructor of the bridge a little more to build and a little more to set back his approaches. Here is a great national problem, the blockading of a great national waterway which is being built up by the Federal Government itself to traverse the Atlantic seaboard from New England to Florida, and then to connect up with these other great waterways in the West that you have heard described here so eloquently this morning.

The Tacony-Palmyra bridge is a private project which will be of benefit to local interests, but it crosses the intracoastal waterway from New England to Florida, and would endanger coastal commerce if inadequate or deficient in construction. It is also in the line of ship travel from New York to Philadelphia and other points to be served by the ship canal across New Jersey.

I think you will see that there is justification for a little closer attention to the construction of bridges by private operators.

The privately promoted Palmyra project, which is to cost about $5,000,000, follows closely upon the completion of the great Philadelphia-Camden bridge, a public enterprise which has thus far cost the people of the two States $37,000,000. It is located only 7 miles above the latter. I had great honor while being mayor of Philadelphia in being the chairman of the executive committee to build this bridge and to make contracts for the expenditure of this vast amount of money, and to come to Congress, as well as to the War Department, to ascertain the height of span that would be required. We were told that 135 feet would be adequate. We were given to believe that that would not be objectionable anywhere along the Delaware River. So that was accepted, because it was in the nature of an order, and we regarded it as a new standard established not only by Congress but by the War Department.

Bear in mind what I have said about Portland going still further toward the sky; bear in mind what I have said about Detroit demanding a higher clearance. Here we are with a marvelous, magnificent, beautiful $37,000,000 bridge limited to 135 feet, and within 7 miles, just above us on the same river, over a channel that the Government is now appropriating money to dig to 20 feet in depth, a $5,000,000 bridge that was to have had a span only 200 feet in width, that was to have had 11 piers in the river, that now by reason of our own objections has been modified to the extent that the span will be widened to 250 feet and the bascule obtained and the number of piers lessened from 11 to 8. The public bridge has but one span, which is about 1,750 feet long. Yet within sight of it up the river is another bridge, privately owned for private profit, that puts 8 spans in the river, even with the modified plans.

The private bridge, as indicated, will have eight spans. And yet it has been found since the clearance of 135 feet above mean low water was agreed upon for the big bridge—and that was presumed to establish a standard—that numerous vessels that could have gone north of the bridge to points like the Reading coal piers, have been unable on account of the height of masts, to do so. With these facts before us, it is easy to understand why Portland is contending for a greater height of span for a bridge which stands between it and the Pacific Ocean, and why Philadelphia, New York, Baltimore, Norfolk, and other major ports of the Atlantic coast should be on guard. The Delaware River presents three other bridge projects which are giving navigation interests concern. One of these is on the upper Delaware between Bristol and Burlington. The franchise from Congress was obtained by two citizens, one a resident of Pennsylvania and the other a resident of New Jersey. Evidently they saw a good thing if they could get the franchise, and having gotten it, with no difficulty in obtaining support for the dispensation of stock or bonds to capitalize the enterprise, then ask the local communities on either side for improvements like approaches, which, of course, send the taxation back to the people themselves.

Their plans are strongly objected to by barge and tugboat men and by shippers who regard them as inadequate to present as well as to future navigation requirements. Oddly enough, Congress which authorized this bridge, has made appropriations for a 20-foot channel on this section of the river, to encourage sea-going vessels to run upstream as far as Trenton. We build the channel, we spend your money, we do what we think is a great public service, then private interests step in and say, "This looks good to us. Here is where we make our crossing. Here is where we send the automobiles. Here is where we sell our stock. Here is where we make our profit." These vessels would have to accommodate themselves to this bridge. The Bristol-Burlington bridge, likewise, would cross the intracoastal waterway, which includes the projected ship canal to New York Bay.

I will not take time to discuss bridges being built to the approach of Newark and New York. Several are being built there. The question has been conned over. Piers are being erected and have been erected, but in most instances the clearances have been such as to ultimately satisfy most of the people. Of great national interest, however, are two projected bridges to cross the 35-foot channel of the Delaware below Philadelphia—one extending from Red Bank to League Island and the other crossing the river at Wilmington, Del. League Island is the navy yard at Philadelphia, generally acknowledged to be the finest fresh-water navy yard of the country, where we have stored up innumerable vessels of the Navy, priceless in cost at the present time, and a bridge is to be erected there at the navy yard, the approach runs into it.

I suspect the Army and Navy will have something to say as to this. I suspect Philadelphia will wake up to this situation, much as we may believe that it will be a convenience to land travel. No Congress grant has yet been obtained for either of these projects. Each of them will doubtless receive the attention of the War and Navy Departments since they threaten the national interest as well as the commercial interests at Philadelphia; but that they can be financed and will be pressed with great vigor no one familiar with the conditions doubts.

Running across to Wilmington to a point called Penns Grove. There may be some interest other than automotive travel behind this bridge; we do not know. Neither of these two lower Delaware River bridges have received the grant from Congress, but there is tremendous pressure behind them, and will be, an urge that will probably have to be fought out on the floor of the House. When these grants come, then the only recourse, the only protection of the great harbor of Philadelphia will be that accorded by the Army engineers who in their discretion will protect the rights of navigation so far as these bridges are concerned. In a discussion of the encroachments of land upon water traffic and the growing popularity of automobiles, motor buses, and trucks, it may be pertinent to cite some Pennsylvania statistics bearing upon the two methods of transportation. It is true that the Federal Government makes appropriations for waterways and harbors, but it will not be denied that Congress, even reluctantly, allots about $55,000,000 a year only, for that purpose. For good roads Congress now appropriates $75,000,000 a year, but the total cost of highways to both the Federal Government and the States in 1925 was, according to an estimate of the Bureau of Public Roads, no less than $648,000,000.

Now, they give us grudgingly about $55,000,000 a year out of the Federal Treasury for waterways, and there is very scant contribution to them, but to good roads out of the taxpayers' money, both of the Federal Government and the State, came in 1925—a peak year—$648,000,000. Do you see the tremendous advantage that the road has over the waterway? I do not have the tonnage figures for good roads during 1925 when so large a public expense was incurred for the accommodation of automotive traffic, but National Rivers and Harbors Congress figures show an approximate water-borne commerce tonnage in the United States for that year of 482,600,000. The approximate value of water-borne commerce in the United States in 1926 was in excess of $26,500,000,000. I say I don't know; I can't tell you just what the road tonnage statistics were, but I can tell you that we did in business, on the waterways of the United States in 1926, $26,000,000,000 of business. That is something to stick in your vest pocket with respect to the utility and the serviceability of waterways in the United States, which are so often decried by those who raise the cry of "pork barrel" for some sinister and unfair purpose.

These are staggering figures in favor of the protection of navigation, especially on our major rivers and at our important ports. They apply with equal force to smaller rivers and smaller ports which create a large proportion of the total tonnage. You can't wipe out the little river. It is a feeder of the bigger river. You can't wipe out the canal. It is a feeder of the larger stream. They have to be considered, and our whole scheme would fail, in our judgment, unless we take care of that back land where the fellow hasn't been able to get out because you haven't given him the transportation facilities on which to come. Another illustration pertains. It gives us the concrete facts: In the State of Pennsylvania in the year ending May 31, 1927, State money was spent on highways to the extent of $50,256,589.62. This included road construction, maintenance, and administration. The expenditure was almost exclusively for the benefit of the privately owned automobile, the profit-taking motor bus, and the road-absorbing motor truck. Even railroads receive no such overhead or assistance from the State. If there is a railroad man present, let me put this under his hat for a moment. Even railroads receive no such overhead or assistance from any State. They just passively fight waterways sometimes when they feel like it; they just passively permit the construction of roads for the benefit, in the sense of overhead, of the greatest competitors they have, the motor bus and the motor truck. They never peep. [Applause.]

But—and here are the cold figures—the amount collected in licenses from automobiles and trucks in return for the amount spent on highways was $25,552,121.01, just about one-half the outgo. What did navigation return on the strength of the investment in the Delaware River made by the Federal Government? At the customhouse in Philadelphia, for the fiscal year ending June 30 last, there was collected in customs from ships sailing up the unobstructed Delaware more than $52,000,000—twice as much from the ships on the river as was collected from all the automobiles and motor trucks on all the roads of Pennsylvania. The cost of the roads for the year, as indicated, was $50,000,000 plus. The Delaware River improvement and maintenance cost for the year was about $1,700,000. Which was the better investment? The roads cost us $2 for every one we spent. The waterways gave us back $52,000,000 for $1,700,000 spent. Do I make that illustration clear? [Applause.]

Apart from the primary rights of navigation and the problem of bridges, these figures support the contention that navigation pays, that it is serviceable, and should be free and unobstructed. There is unquestionably a call for bridges, but they should be so constructed and maintained as not to interfere with the ancient rights of navigation or the future rights of trade. Free and unimpeded navigation can not be disregarded without affecting detrimentally the commerce of the country.

Since the beginning of time the natural waterways have been the people's highways. In the United States the support of these natural highways, both as to improvement and maintenance for the development of commerce and for protection in times of peace as well as in times of war, has been approved by Government and people. The expenditure made upon them has contributed to Government revenues and to the national prosperity. To erect over them barriers that impede navigation not only discredits the Government that assumes to develop and protect them, but threatens an unjustifiable limitation upon the commercial progress of the Nation. The seriousness of such barriers over the entrances to major ports can not be defended on any ground, be it commercial, agricultural, or industrial, or in the sense of preparedness for war.

I thank you. [Applause.]

ADDRESS OF MR. CHRISS A. BELL

President WILSON. Gentlemen, the next subject is "Channels and bridges." The speaker is Mr. Chriss A. Bell, of the Chamber of Commerce of Portland, Oreg. [Applause.]

Mr. CHRISS A. BELL. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen, I have traveled some 3,000 miles to speak to you for a very few minutes, because it was impressed upon me very strongly that our time for the presentation of any subject is limited. I assume they may have thought because I was traveling 3,000 miles that I would want to talk about three hours, but such is not the case.

Primarily, I am here to assure the Rivers and Harbors Congress and the delegates from the various communities that we of the West are in hearty sympathy with all of the principles under which you are working. Flood control and the general waterways system of the entire country are as important to us out there as to you.

Secondarily, I am supposed to speak upon the question of harbors and bridges. More properly, I think it might be said the subject would be discrimination, or a suggestion for preventing discrimination between harbors by the erection of bridges. I will confess that I had hoped I might bring possibly not a new thought, but an unexpressed thought to you; but the gentleman who has preceded me, Mr. Moore, whose subject is practically the same as mine, has touched upon almost every point, if not every point, in his presentation that I proposed to use as arguments for the purpose of asking the adoption of a principle to prevent discrimination. However, gentlemen, as he suggested in his paper, we of Portland sometimes are fighters, and I came here 3,000 miles to have my say, and if you remain in the room 5 or 10 minutes I will have it.

Like Mr. Thompson and some others, because of the fact of our limited time, and wishing to place this matter as concretely as I could before you, I have reduced it to notes and will follow them.

At the session of the National Rivers and Harbors Congress in 1926 a platform was adopted, stating that the navigable waters of the United States are national highways and that the public has the right to the use thereof with the least possible obstruction to commerce, and urging that no permit be issued for the construction of bridges which in any way would limit, obstruct, or impair the navigation thereof. There is, however, a fast-growing controversy as to which should have preference, commerce represented by cargo shipments to and from our seaports and the ports of the world or the so-called commerce represented by auto traffic, demanding bridges crossing our navigable waterways for the purpose of shortening distances for tourist travel and for the purpose of local quick transit.

That this controversy has a threatened danger to the navigation of our harbors is a recognized fact by our prominent engineers who have examined into the subject. General Jadwin recently stated before a congressional committee as follows: "There is a steady urge to encroach on these first-grade harbors, and we are getting it in various sorts of ways. I am inclined to the position that we have got to sit very tight and take the position that these harbors belong to the United States and not to the States where they are located. We are just sitting tight, and I think we should hold places like New York, Philadelphia, Boston, Buffalo, Cleveland, and other places, because it means too much to the country to block them either commercially or from the standpoint of national defense."

That is the statement of General Jadwin. To this list we of the West, of course, insist upon adding the four or five major ports of that coast—Seattle, Tacoma, Portland, San Francisco, Los Angeles, and San Diego.

It was not, of course, intended by General Jadwin that he name all of the ports, and I only mention those on the Pacific coast because there were none mentioned in his report, and to call to your attention the four or five major ports of that territory.

As indicated, the controversy is brought about largely by the immense increase of auto traffic in the United States, resulting in the building of more and better roads. It frequently, if not generally, arises and is fostered in any given case by the fact that the financial houses selling bonds to the general public and construction concerns specializing in bridge building are looking for opportunities to promote bridges connecting local thoroughfares and communities. This character of promotion takes into consideration but one question; that is, Is the traffic present and prospective sufficient to justify a prospectus for a bond issue that the public will absorb, thereby insuring the initial cost? No consideration is given to the bigger question of whether or not the proposed structure will immediately or in the future become such an obstruction to navigation as will interfere with the development of the entire community, including the producing and distributing territory of the navigable water to be bridged.

In order to show that we have concrete proof of the statement made by Mr. Moore, and that I have just made, that these matters frequently, at least, are promoted by bond houses, I have only to say that within my own personal knowledge in the States of Oregon and Washington I know of five such that have been so promoted. I desire to quote or read from the contents of a letter that has been sent out by such a bonding house; how broadly it has been sent, I am not prepared to say, but certainly the letter has been sent sufficiently broadcast that the engineers of certain types in our own locality have received the same.

"Our company is vitally interested in the development of toll bridges in the United States and Canada," says a letter from a bond house. "We are ready to develop and completely finance bridges of any size up to $50,000,000 where traffic and franchise conditions are completely favorable. We are pleased to compensate engineers to their entire satisfaction for notifying us of attractive locations which, after investigation, we accept and develop. We desire a map of the location, showing converging highways, location of nearest existing bridges, a general idea of motor traffic in the vicinity," etc.

A bridge so promoted is of immediate interest to the local communities which it is proposed to tap and serve with rapid transit. The local merchants see increased tourist traffic passing through their city, an increased trade from the immediate territory tapped. This statement may be more applicable to our more or less undeveloped West than it is to the eastern situation, but I question if it is much more applicable.

Under such circumstances, it is not difficult to work up an active community demand for the bridge. Having been sold the idea of an immediate gain, it is difficult for the community to visualize the project in its true proportions as affecting the entire territory that is or can be served by the waterway to be bridged. If there is no immediate direct and apparent obstruction to the commerce of the river or harbor, the possible danger to future development will not be recognized. In most cases the immediate obstruction to commerce or discrimination between ports, as the case may be, in the way of delays, additional costs incurred and danger threatened to navigation, is difficult to show to such an extent that it will overcome the national craze for quick transit and the local desire for expected immediate increase in business.

The part of the community actually engaged in commerce so obstructed or discriminated against is declared narrow and selfish in its objections. If the objection is made by another community that may be adversely affected by the obstruction, it will be urged that the objection is caused by jealousy and the selfish desire to impede the growth of a possible competitor for the benefit of the harbor.

Add to this the all too frequent attempt by a rival port, situated on a different harbor or navigable river, but competing for the inbound and outbound cargoes gathered in the surrounding general territory, to hamper the growth of its rival. You have such a project going before Congress and the departments with substantial and effective political backing.

History from the beginning of the commercial life of the world proves that the community which can and does reach the world markets by water and there distribute products which can be produced, manufactured, or gathered from its entire back country and can and does receive in return from the world's markets produce that may be absorbed and consumed by its distributing territory is the community or port which thrives, continues to grow, and eventually reaches its full destiny.

The immediate gain of local quick transit tourist traffic revenue is small in comparison. The incidental delays to local traffic across the waterways so used should not be permitted to interfere to any extent that will hamper and divert such commerce. It is indeed difficult for the individual citizen desiring to reach his home or office in the shortest space of time to realize that a bridge across the river may cause a delay of importance to commerce. It is difficult for a local merchant desiring to bridge a river or harbor for the purpose of connecting improved highways and thereby tapping new territory and diverting tourist traffic to his doors to realize that the bridge may become a menace to the entire territory served by the waterway so obstructed which will, in the end, do his own community much more harm than can be offset by any gain from tourist traffic or local quick transit.

The foregoing very brief presentation of facts that actually do and have occurred leads to the suggestion of a remedy for the purpose of placing on a parity all ports of the United States situated on waterways giving access to the markets of the world.

I might add that the same principles apply to inland ports, but I personally have been interested only in the seagoing business, in ports having seagoing business, and understand in conversation with some here to-day that there is a regulation of the War Department which, in a measure at least, protects inland ports in their relation one to the other.

Congress has full and unquestioned control of the navigable waters of the United States. The Constitution in express terms takes away the power of Congress to pass an act granting a preference to the port of one State over the ports of another State. True, the question at issue when this prohibition was made a part of the Constitution probably was confined to the question of discriminatory taxes and duties, yet back of that immediate question was the great principle that the Federal Government then being founded was not to discriminate between the various independent States or between the peoples and port of one State and the peoples and port of another.

At all times and in all laws this is the principle which dominates the action of the American people. Each individual, each community, is to work out its own salvation without interference from the Federal Government, except in the specific matters over which it is given control. In these matters there must be no discrimination between the various States.

If, then, the Federal Government permits the harbor of a major port which is the outlet of a vast territory which is exporting the products thereof by ocean-going vessels to the distributing ports of the entire world and in exchange is receiving for distribution products gathered at the ports of the entire world, to be obstructed by a bridge having lesser clearances, vertical and horizontal, than have been adopted for a competing port, there is a discrimination that is apparent and needs no argument. Likewise, if at the time of such fixing of a vertical clearance, or within any reasonable time in the future, such ports may look for the visit from vessels whose masts or top works are higher than the clearance allows, then again there is an obstruction and discrimination which needs no additional proof. The dimension of the locks of the Panama Canal established by the governmental commission having charge thereover was fixed at a usable length of 1,000 feet, depth over sills 41.5 feet. After investigation it was decided that the canal could not be bridged by any structure having lesser vertical clearances than 225 feet.

Do these figures not establish minimums for the guidance of the Federal Government in establishing vertical clearance and harbor depths? Is not a permit to bridge any port of the United States having an export and import business by ocean-going vessels using the canal with a structure having a vertical clearance of less than 225 feet a discrimination between ports and contrary to the principles expressly set forth in the Constitution? Is not such a permit also an immediate potential obstruction to navigation?

If it can be said in answer—and I believe this is the answer of the engineers—that the Federal Government has the power to remove an obstruction and therefore it will be assumed that the clearance immediately allowed is sufficient for the time and will be removed if in fact later development proves it to be an obstruction or discrimination, sight is lost of the greatest form of discrimination as between the ports. The moment a harbor is bridged its possibilities as a port are established. The shipping world looks to it as a fixed matter.

As the country develops and shipping demands increase and larger ships are built, the port with an impaired clearance is gradually but surely outstripped by its competitors and its fate as a minor port is established. The commerce to which it is entitled by gradual growth with unobstructed navigation goes to the port that can accommodate it.

Based upon this very brief presentation it is urged that the National Rivers and Harbors Congress not only adopt a platform and pass resolutions indorsing the principles herein suggested, but that it take active steps through proper committees to place before Congress and urge the passage of a resolution establishing a standard for bridge clearances for major seaports of this country, and, in addition, that Congress call a conference of the nations of the world having merchant marines for the purpose of establishing a national standard if this may be done.

I was also strictly instructed at home before leaving that one of the things the National Rivers and Harbors Congress did not do, and one of the things that it disliked to listen to, was a project, a definite, certain project that you were working upon principally, adhering strictly to that.

In this short address I had no intention of making any comment about what is sometimes termed the Longview fight, but the reference made by Mr. Moore may justify a very brief history of a fight that is now over, probably, for the purpose not of getting any assistance for a project, but of emphasizing what may happen to a port.

The city of Portland has about 350,000 people. It is where I was born and raised and my father before me. I might say, incidentally, we have all been engaged in the work of navigating the rivers there and we know something of them—that is, in my own recollection. It is situated on the Willamette River 12 miles above its junction with the Columbia and about 100 miles from the Pacific.

Within my recollection it was impossible for a seagoing vessel drawing more than 14 or 15 feet to go down the stream loaded. There were numerous bars and numerous shoals between Portland and the sea. I forget the exact depth at the mouth of the river at that time on the bar, but it matters not. By the expenditure of many millions of dollars the Federal Government has established a depth at the bar of over 40 feet. Few harbors in the world have a greater depth—comparatively few.

The far-seeing men of Portland, having a belief in the destiny of their town in the improvement of the river from the mouth to Portland, matched the Government dollar for dollar for everything spent in the improvement of the river between the sea and Portland Harbor, with a result that by the expenditure of approximately $10,000,000 of our own money and a like amount of the Government's money in river improvements alone, taking in no consideration of municipal docks, but merely in the digging of a channel for a growing community having a growing commerce, they have provided at this present time a depth the entire distance of more than 30 feet. We are here to-day before the departments, and receiving very courteous consideration, asking for a 35-foot project, which means a project that will float a 35-foot vessel, requiring some additional depth.

When we get the 35-foot project, if our community develops as we hope and believe and know it will, we will go after a 40-foot project.

Some few years ago a large lumbering concern having bought immense tracts of timber below us, between us and the sea, desired a place for their mills and they literally built a town. Before turning a wheel, before anyone save the workingmen were in the community, they built hotels, they built houses, they built stores, and spent millions of dollars received from a bond issue in the building of a town which now has approximately 12,000 people—a wonderful piece of work, a splendid piece of development, and one which is for the benefit of the entire community.

We are assured that the inception of a bridge across the river was not the thought of the Longview people, and from all that we can obtain I am sure we are safe in saying that it was a promotion project in its inception, but bear in mind there would have been no place for the city of Longview, no necessity for a ferry, no necessity for a bridge, if it had not been for the billions of dollars spent by the city of Portland in fixing its channel.

Some few years ago the promoters saw the opportunity of joining two highways, Federal-aid highways; saw the possibility of traffic increase to an extent that on paper, at least, will pay for a bond issue. Many of us believe, as suggested by Mr. Moore, that the project will eventually have to be taken over by the State.

First, they succeeded in getting a project approved, allowing us only a clearance vertically of about 135 feet actually, and at this point let me make clear one thing, because we are extremely jealous of this point out our way, perhaps not so important to you people: It is true that the clearances now given us are 186 feet above the water, but low water in the Columbia River is never reached. That is the zero mark that the engineers use for determining the depth to which they are going to dig. The average high water which we have every year, not taking into consideration exceptional years, at that point is approximately 20 feet. Therefore the actual clearance that ships may have over certain periods of the year is about 165 or 166 feet; at other periods of the year it goes to 175 feet.

As I say, this town, backed by strong financial interests, backed by competitive ports, has been able to secure the permit to throw across the harbor a bridge having this clearance. True, it is substantially more than the Camden bridge and some others, but just as truly we have had vessels already desiring to come to Portland, and some have been to Portland, which need greater clearances. We have in prospect, and believe we will succeed in securing it, the visits of the passenger liners, the around-the-world passenger liners, and other character of ships which justify us in saying we are still not satisfied. What we can do is another question.

I merely cite that, not asking in any sense for an indorsement of any kind or character, but to call attention to the real tangible fight against obstructing discrimination in any port, whether situated in the East or West, anybody may have by reason of selfish interests.

I thank you very much. [Applause.]

THE TARIFF

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a resolution (S. Res. 52) coming over from a previous day, submitted by Mr. McMASTER on December 13 last, which was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the United States Senate favors an immediate lowering of tariff schedules, and tariff legislation, embodying lowered schedules, should be considered and enacted during the present session of Congress: Be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be transmitted to the House of Representatives.

Mr. McMASTER. I ask that the resolution may go over until to-morrow without prejudice. I shall call it up to-morrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection the resolution will go over. Morning business is closed. The calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

RELATIVE TO PARDONS

The bill (S. 1398) relating to pardons was announced as first in order.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with an amendment, on page 1, line 7, to add the following: "but such pardon shall in no manner affect the right of any person to a trial or to prosecute an appeal or writ of error from a judgment of conviction," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That a pardon shall be effective to all intents and purposes from the time of its delivery or presentation, by or under the authority of the President, to the individual named therein as the object of Executive clemency, whether the same shall have been accepted by such person or not, but such pardon shall in no manner affect the right of any person to a trial or to prosecute an appeal or writ of error from a judgment of conviction.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I desire to say further that the amendment recommended by the committee was suggested in the first place by the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY] only in so far as relates to an appeal from a judgment of conviction. The words "to a trial or" were incorporated upon my own proposal, but upon reflection I have concluded that they have no proper place there, because unless a trial has taken place it is within the power of the prosecuting officers to dismiss anyway, and probably a defendant would have no right to insist upon a trial, or, at least, could not effect it. I accordingly move to amend by striking out the words "to a trial or," appearing in line 9 of the amendment proposed by the committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 9 of the proposed committee amendment strike out the words "to a trial or."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, in explanation of the legislation, I desire to say that some few years ago the Supreme Court of the United States decided that a pardon, in order to be effective, must be accepted by the person in whose favor it had been issued by the President. It came about in this way: A trial was in progress when a witness refused to answer questions propounded to him upon the ground that the testimony might incriminate him. This was during the administration of President Wilson.

The President was immediately appealed to to issue a pardon to the witness, which he promptly did, and the pardon was tendered to the witness. He refused to accept the pardon and continued in his refusal to answer questions propounded to him. He was thereupon committed for contempt, sued out a writ of habeas corpus, which went to the Supreme Court of the United States, and it was there held that the pardon was ineffective, that his jeopardy continued, and that he was wholly justified in refusing to answer.

The logical effect of that decision is that if a party should be tried and convicted and sent to the penitentiary for a period of 20 years and should have served 10 years and then it was thought that he might with entire propriety be released, and the President should issue a pardon to him, he could say, "No; thank you; I do not care for any pardon. You house me very comfortably here and provide me with food and clothing and with medical attendance when I require that kind of thing. I do not think I want a pardon." It occurs to me that that is approaching the absurd. Accordingly, it is proposed by the pending legislation that a pardon shall be made effective either when it is delivered or when it is presented to the object of the Executive clemency.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COLUMBIA RIVER BRIDGE, WASHINGTON

The bill (S. 747) granting the consent of Congress to the State of Washington to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Columbia River at or near Kettle Falls, Wash., was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. A similar bill has already been passed.

Mr. CURTIS. A bill covering that matter has been passed.

Mr. WILLIS. The bill should be indefinitely postponed, it being covered by another bill which has become a law.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the bill will be indefinitely postponed.

TERMS OF PRESIDENT AND VICE PRESIDENT, ETC.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 47) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States fixing the commencement of the terms of President and Vice President and Members of Congress, and fixing the time of the assembling of Congress, which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with amendments.

The first amendment was, on page 2, line 3, before the word "day," to strike out "2d" and to insert "15th," so as to read:

ARTICLE

SECTION 1. The terms of the President and Vice President shall end at noon on the 15th day of January——

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], the author of the joint resolution, is this resolution similar to the ones which the Senate has passed upon previous occasions almost unanimously?

Mr. NORRIS. This is practically the same joint resolution that we have passed on three different occasions in three separate Congresses. The changes are immaterial. For instance, the last time the Senate passed the joint resolution instead of providing that the term of the President and the Vice President should begin, say, on the 2d day of January it fixed the day of the week; and the same provision was made as to the beginning of the terms of Members of Congress. On a prior occasion the joint resolution fixed the day of the month, as is done in the pending resolution. When the joint resolution was introduced at this session I changed it to its present form; but there is really no difference between the two. The only objection to this form is that the beginning of the term may come on Sunday, which is true under existing conditions. The House committee in reporting the resolution have reported it favorably every time it has been sent over there, but they have always insisted on putting in the day of the month rather than the day of the week. We thought, to avoid any controversy with the House or with the House committee, it would be just as well to change it in this instance.

Mr. FESS. It may be out of order, but I should like to know whether the House has ever taken any action on any of the joint resolutions which the Senate has heretofore passed.

Mr. NORRIS. The House committee has made a favorable report on the joint resolution, with some amendments, on every occasion when it has been sent to that body, but the House itself has never taken any action on the joint resolution; the joint resolution has always died on the calendar.

I think it would be interesting even to other Members than the Senator who has asked the question if I should read a paragraph from the report submitted by the committee on the pending joint resolution:

This proposed amendment to the Constitution has, in practically the same form in which it is now reported, passed the Senate in each of the three preceding Congresses. It passed the Senate the first time on February 13, 1923. On the 22d day of February, 1923, it received a favorable report from the House committee and was placed on the House Calendar. No action was taken by the House, and it died on the 4th day of March, 1923, because of the adjournment of Congress. It passed the Senate the second time on the 14th day of March, 1924, and on the 15th day of April, 1924, it was favorably reported by the House committee. It remained on the Calendar of the House, without any action being taken thereon, from the 15th of April, 1924, until the expiration of the Sixty-eighth Congress on the 4th day of March, 1925. It again passed the Senate, in the Sixty-ninth Congress, on February 15, 1926. It was again favorably reported by the House committee on the 24th day of February, 1926, and remained on the House Calendar, without any action thereon, from said date until the expiration of the Sixty-ninth Congress on the 4th day of March, 1927.

For something over a year the joint resolution was on the calendar of the House of Representatives.

Mr. FESS. Does the Senator from Nebraska have any hope that there will be more promise for the passage of the joint resolution in this Congress?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I think so. I think the sentiment of the country has been largely increasing in favor of the proposed constitutional amendment, and, so far as I know, there is no opposition to its passage.

Mr. FESS. There has been none at all in this body of any kind whatsoever, has there?

Mr. NORRIS. There has not been much opposition. I think the last time it was pending here there were two votes against it, and on the first occasion there were only seven votes against it.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think I understand the object of the proposed constitutional amendment, but I should like to have the Senator from Nebraska briefly state to the Senate what will be accomplished by its adoption.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, as the Senator from Florida well knows, under the Constitution as at present Members of Congress and the President both begin their terms of office on the 4th day of March after their election, but the old Congress convenes on the first Monday in the following December and continues in session until the following 4th of March. Therefore the new Congress, already at that time elected, remains out of office while the old Congress after the election, even though it may have been repudiated, still remains in office and legislates. The effect of the adoption of the proposed constitutional amendment would be in that respect to put the new Congress at work practically on the 1st day of January after its election in November, as is done in all the States, practically without exception, as to their legislatures.

Another change would be that the so-called short session of Congress would be entirely eliminated; there would be no such thing as a short session of Congress. The Congress would convene in January and could remain in session until it desired to adjourn. The Senator from Florida will recognize, of course, the importance of that change. It would mean the elimination of the jam which always takes place about the 4th of March every other year when the terms of Members of the House and those of one-third of the Senate expire, and which always makes it possible for a filibuster to take place at that time even by one Senator, and thus interfere very greatly, I think, as we all know, with the proper consideration of such legislation as may then be before Congress.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. As I understand the Senator, the Vice President's occupation will not be gone but his issue will be gone.

Mr. NORRIS. His issue will be gone; but he will, I presume, devote his great ability to other issues which will, perhaps, be just as important.

Mr. FLETCHER. So that the Congress which meets in January could continue in session for two years?

Mr. NORRIS. The first one could and the next one could continue in session for a whole year. The short session would be entirely eliminated.

Another change will come about. Under the provisions of the existing Constitution if it should occur that a President were not elected in November and the election should be thrown into the House of Representatives, the old Congress would elect the President and Vice President for the ensuing four years. If this proposed amendment should become part of the Constitution the new Congress rather than the old Congress would choose the President and Vice President. I think it is very important that a Congress which may have been repudiated at the ballot box should not be able to elect a President who would then remain in office for four years beyond that time.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. There is one contingency that might arise in connection with a presidential election, to cover which no action has ever been undertaken, and it ought to be covered, it seems to me, in legislation such as this. For example, if between the date when the Electoral College meets and votes and submits its report and the date of the inauguration both President and Vice President should die there is no provision either in the Constitution or in the law that would provide for filling the vacancy.

Mr. NORRIS. That is a difficulty, I will say to the Senator, which exists at the present time. This proposed constitutional amendment does not attempt to remedy that. There is another difficulty which might arise in a case where the election is thrown into the House. Under the Constitution, if it should occur that one or more of the candidates for President standing on the list of the three highest should die there is no way now under the Constitution by which that predicament could be properly met. But I wish to say to the Senator that I omitted everything in the preparation of this joint resolution which was not absolutely necessary to meet the particular issue of getting rid of the short session. I presume when the resolution shall be considered by the House committee they will add an amendment that will meet the contingency to which the Senator from Ohio has referred, because every time a similar joint resolution has gone there they have added that kind of an amendment; and if they shall add such an amendment in this instance, it is my intention to ask the Senate to concur in it when the joint resolution comes back to the Senate.

Mr. FESS. If the Senator will permit me, it appears to me almost incredible that the Nation in its nearly 150 years of national life has not made provision for a possible interregnum in the Executive office.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; it is strange that no such provision has been made.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, while we are discussing the uncertainties which exist under the present Constitution another could be very readily suggested, which is of very profound importance, and is easily conceivable. The Constitution provides for the case of a failure of the House of Representatives to elect a President by the time the presidential term of office begins. In that event the Vice President becomes President or acts as President; but the question arises if the House of Representatives might later reach a conclusion whether they would have the power to do so after the Vice President has once taken the place. That is a very likely contingency in case the election is thrown into the House of Representatives.

I rather regret the introduction of these possibilities into this discussion, because there are many varying views about these matters, and they may possibly to some extent obstruct the speedy passage of this much-needed amendment to the Constitution proposed by the Senator from Nebraska. If we are going to make provision for all possible cases, the one I have mentioned certainly ought to be given consideration; but I have always felt, Mr. President, that we might very well trust to the future, as has been done in the past, with reference to many of these questions. Nothing of the kind has ever happened in the course of our history, stretching back now for a period of something like 140 years. We can very easily suppose conditions where the most serious embarrassment would arise under the Constitution that exists not only in this respect but in many other respects, but they never have arisen; we have never been troubled; and I feel disposed to take chances rather than to embarrass the adoption of a proposed constitutional amendment which has been prompted by actual past experience of an embarrassing nature.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the Senator from Montana has stated what I tried to state in answer to the question of the Senator from Ohio. The object I had in view was to clear this question of all minor considerations, to accomplish the one important result, and not to take up various contingencies that might arise and try to remedy them in this proposed constitutional amendment, because to attempt to do so would merely open up an endless avenue of discussion as to subjects upon which Senators and Members of the House and legislatures of the States would disagree very greatly, and it might endanger this particular proposed amendment against which I can see no possible objection, and the benefits of which will be great.

These contingencies which might arise could have arisen at any time, but the possibility of their happening is very remote, and when they do arise there are still several things that could occur to prevent any break in the continuity of the Government.

For instance, the Constitution provides that if there is no election of a President, and the election is thrown into the House of Representatives, the House of Representatives shall, as it stands now, proceed to the election of a President; and then it says that if they fail to elect by the 4th of March the person elected Vice President by the Senate shall become President.

We can imagine a condition where neither the House nor the Senate would succeed in electing either a President or a Vice President, and there would be nobody to take the office; but that is very remote. In the House, for instance, the election must take place from the three highest on the list. In the Senate the election must take place from the two highest on the list; and I can not conceive of a tie-up in the Senate in the case of a Vice President unless the Senate should be tied. We have been in existence for 140 years and none of these contingencies has ever happened yet, and there is not a chance in a million that they will happen in the next million years.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator that the case might perhaps occur of the death of the candidate of the majority of the Senate.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Then the Senate would be powerless, because they can vote for no one except the two candidates having the highest votes.

Mr. NORRIS. That is true; yes. That is true now. It would still be true if this amendment were adopted just as it stands now.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I will state that I had no intention of offering an amendment. I was simply making an inquiry.

Mr. NORRIS. I think the Senator's question has brought out some enlightening discussion.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. I desire to propound a question to the Senator from Nebraska.

I observe that the date for the convening of the Congress has been changed in this joint resolution to the 2d day of January.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator will recall that about every seven years the 2d day of January falls on Sunday.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. Is there any reason why the 2d day of January should be specified, instead of the first Monday in January?

Mr. NORRIS. I will say to the Senator—I think he was not in the Chamber—that I explained that once. As far as I am concerned, there is not any reason. I would just as soon have it the first Monday, and as it was passed the last time it was the first Monday; but as we passed it, I think, in the Congress before that, we specified the day of the month. The House every time has changed it from the day of the week to the day of the month, and it will happen sometimes on Sunday; but that is what happens now. When the term of office expires on the 4th of March, that happens on Sunday.

Mr. BARKLEY. But Congress does not meet then.

Mr. NORRIS. No; but the Congress is in session.

Mr. BARKLEY. The present provision is that Congress shall meet on the first Monday in December. It struck me that in the interest of harmony, and to eliminate the necessity of having to delay the convening of Congress one day about every seven years, it would be better to have it the first Monday in January.

Mr. NORRIS. If it stays as it is now we would have to meet on Sunday, which would be the same condition that we have at the present time. About once in seven years the Congress would meet on Sunday. Once in seven years the Congress now is in session on Sunday until noon, and once in seven years the beginning of the term of the President takes place on Sunday. It may be that it would be desirable to have it always occur on a week day, and that is the way I first introduced the resolution, and I had that in view to avoid going into office on the Sabbath day. Personally, it is perfectly immaterial to me; and I will say to the Senator that this time it was changed because our experience has been that every time the House committee have taken it up they have made this change; and I thought that rather than to get into a controversy over a very immaterial proposition that might delay the joint resolution to some extent I would change it here, and the committee felt that way, and so we left it the day of the month.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, if it is introduced in this form the House may change it back the other way.

Mr. NORRIS. Perhaps.

Mr. BARKLEY. My information is that practically all the legislatures of the States convene on some Monday—probably the first Monday in January, or the first Monday of some other month.

Mr. NORRIS. It is not always Monday; but I agree with the Senator that the legislatures of the States, so far as I know, convene on a week day rather than on a Sunday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will continue the reading of the joint resolution.

The reading of the joint resolution was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary was, on page 2, line 5, before the words "day of," to strike out "15th" and insert "2d," so as to read:

and the terms of Senators and Representatives at noon on the 2d day of January, of the years in which such terms would have ended if this article had not been ratified; and the terms of their successors shall then begin.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, line 18, before the words "the Vice President," to strike out "where" and to insert "of the failure to choose"; in the same line, after the words "Vice President," to strike out "has not been chosen"; and in line 20, after the word "shall," to insert "then," so as to read:

SEC. 2. The Congress shall assemble at least once in every year, and such meeting shall begin at noon on the 2d day of January, unless they shall by law appoint a different day.

SEC. 3. If the House of Representatives has not chosen a President, whenever the right of choice devolves upon them, before the time fixed for the beginning of his term, then the Vice President shall act as President, as in the case of the death or other constitutional disability of the President. The Congress shall by law provide for the case of the failure to choose the Vice President before the time fixed for the beginning of his term, declaring what officer shall then act as President, and such officer shall act accordingly until the House of Representatives chooses a President or until the Senate chooses a Vice President.

SEC. 4. This amendment shall take effect on the 15th day of October after its ratification.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. NORRIS. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy-six Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The question is on the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Nebraska if he will explain to us a little more fully than he has the reason for changing the date of the beginning of the Executive's term from March to January, and the reason for putting the beginning of the term of Congress back from March to January.

In other words, while I appreciate fully the disadvantage of having the Congress elected in one November not begin until one year from the following December, I do not quite appreciate why the date should be put back quite as far as the Senator has proposed, and why it would not be satisfactory to him and to others desiring this change to have the Congress elected in November begin in the following March.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I shall be glad to give the Senator my reasons for these particular changes; and I believe they are convincing.

In the first place, the question in regard to the President: Why have we included the President, and why is the President going into office on a different date from Members of Congress? That is a very proper question.

Under another provision of the Constitution, the votes for President and Vice President must be canvassed by the joint session of the House and the Senate; so there is two weeks' difference between their going into office, in order to give the Senate and the House an opportunity to organize and to canvass the votes, in order that the Congress may perform its function provided by another provision in the Constitution. Therefore it seems necessary that the term of the President should begin at a different time from the terms of Members of Congress, and that Congress shall have two weeks' time to canvass the votes for President and declare the election.

The reason why the time for the convening of Congress has been placed at January instead of March is one of convenience for Congress itself.

Everyone here knows that the best time to legislate in Washington is during the winter or spring months. It would be still better if the Congress could begin sooner, but I thought and the committee thought it would be wrong to make the meeting time so soon after the election, and we followed the usual course adopted by all the States in the Union, I think, where the members of the legislatures and State officials are chosen in November and take their offices early in January.

If Congress did not convene until March, and the term began then, as it does now, and we started the session in March, we would get to the middle of the summer before we would get fairly started, and everybody knows that the summer is not a good time to legislate in the city of Washington.

We undertook to provide for the meeting of Congress as soon after the election during the winter as possible, so that the Congress could get through with its work by the beginning of summer. It is quite evident, I think, that if we did away with the short session and have both sessions the same length, on an equal basis, we could transact the business of the country in the interval from January to June. As it is now, when we do have a long session, because we know that the short session is coming on the next year and that we are going to be crowded, we try to do as much as we can in the long session, and it runs on into the summer and sometimes clear through the summer.

Was there any other question the Senator had to propound?

Mr. BINGHAM. I thank the Senator for his explanation, which is very clear. I should like to ask the Senator one other question, Whether the effect of this amendment would be two long sessions of Congress, a long session each year?

Mr. NORRIS. I think the effect of this amendment would be to make the short session longer and the long session shorter. It would equalize them. The time consumed would be just the same. Congress would have it within its power to end a session at any time it saw fit to.

Mr. BINGHAM. The Senator will realize that a great many of the State legislatures meet only every other year.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. BINGHAM. Has the committee considered the advisability of having a short session every other year, which would meet simply for the consideration of appropriation bills?

Mr. NORRIS. No; the committee has not given any consideration to that, because we have had before us no amendment to the Constitution that would bring about such a condition. It would take an amendment to the Constitution different from this one to provide for a short session that could consider only appropriaion bills, let us say.

Mr. BINGHAM. Has the matter been considered of the real advisability of having two long sessions; in other words, having a long session every year? Does not the Senator think that the prevailing popular outcry against too much legislation has something of truth in it, which might lead to the advisability of not having Congress in session quite as much as this would provide?

Mr. NORRIS. There is some weight in that, but I will say that I think the trouble comes because Congress during the short session finds it a physical impossibility to transact the business of the country and attend to the legislation that legitimately and logically comes before Congress. Say, for instance, that we come to the middle of February. The trouble comes not only from the bills that are not considered at all, but the bills that are taken up. A Senator may be interested in some particular legislation. He knows that it must be passed before the 4th day of March, and legislation is pending that he does not like, which he would like to see defeated, which perhaps a large number of Senators or Representatives would like to see defeated. He knows that those who are behind the legislation are determined, and will make a hard fight for it, and he realizes that they are going to consume time that will make it impossible before the 4th of March to get up the particular legislation in which he is interested.

The result is that we get half-baked legislation put on the statute books, legislation passed when Senators know at the time of its passage that there are certain changes which ought to be made, that in it is something that should be stricken out. But they are more interested in something else they are trying to get up, which they want to have passed before the 4th of March, and they let slip by a lot of things they ought to criticize, which perhaps should be defeated, which could be changed, at least, or modified. The result is that we do pass a lot of legislation that has not been given proper consideration, and from that cause I think comes the cry, with some justification, that we are having too much legislation.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. McKELLAR. I did not hear all of the Senator's remarks, and I do not know whether he has already argued the point I am about to suggest or not. Would not the greatest benefit to come from this amendment be the prevention of legislators legislating for the country after they have been defeated?

Mr. NORRIS. That is one of the greatest. I have been over that.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator has already covered that?

Mr. NORRIS. We have discussed that to some extent.

Mr. BINGHAM. Is there not some way by which that feature might be changed?

Mr. NORRIS. What feature?

Mr. BINGHAM. The one just spoken of by the Senator from Tennessee, to prevent legislators from passing on legislation after they have been defeated. Is there not some way to change that without increasing the length of time that Congress shall be in session? The feature of the bill to which I object, and which I should like to see changed before I vote for the amendment, is the feature which provides for additional talking time for Congress.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the disagreeable feature of too much talking in Congress comes, all will admit from their own experience, when we approach the 4th of March during a short session.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is the greatest complaint.

Mr. NORRIS. That is, where we have talking without any reference to any particular, ostensible, visible object. If it were not compulsory for Congress to adjourn on the 4th day of March and end its deliberations, that kind of talking would not take place. I think we could do business in more of a business-like way if we were not limited as to the time of adjournment than though we were limited. It is a mistake, in my judgment, to say that we are going to limit by law the sessions of Congress, because we invite filibusters, we invite half-baked legislation, we invite ill-considered legislation, and give a premium to the man who can talk the longest, if he wants to hold up the Congress even by his own voice, which he can do if we are approaching adjournment time in a short session.

We will find, if we place in the hands of Congress itself the absolute control over its adjournment date, that there will not be any attempts made such as are made now every two years, and the condition we had in the Senate just before the adjournment of the last Congress would be a thing that would be unknown.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President will the Senator yield again?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. Then, if this amendment shall be adopted, it will do away with the necessity for the proposed revision of the rules suggested by the Vice President, in the opinion of the Senator?

Mr. NORRIS. I think so; yes.

Mr. BINGHAM. I should like to ask the Senator, who has spent so much time in studying this matter, whether it is not true that most State constitutions provide for an adjournment date of the State legislatures; and that does not lead in most cases to the kind of talk which the Senator has just been speaking about. The two or three constitutions with which I happen to be familiar, and which I have looked up, provide definite adjournment dates. The matter is not in the hands of the legislators themselves, but is provided for in the State constitutions.

Mr. NORRIS. I am not familiar with the constitutions of all the States, but in a great many cases the time the legislature can remain in session is fixed by constitutional limitation. I think we ought to draw this distinction, which seems to me perfectly clear, that the business of a State is an entirely different proposition from the business of the 48 States which we represent here. The importance of a State legislature, as far as legislation is concerned touching all the people, is infinitely less than the importance of Congress, which controls the entire country, and all the foreign relations, and everything connected with the Federal Government.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I think the Senate of the United States is the only body that permits unlimited debate. No legislature that I know of permits extended debate without limit. The legislatures usually have rules by which they can cut off debate, so that the very thing the Senator is trying to reach here it might be argued is unnecessary, because State legislatures do not have to have such a provision. I do not think the State legislatures are operating under the same system of rules under which we operate.

Mr. NORRIS. No; they are not. The Senator reminds me of a thing about which I want to say just a word, the limitation of debate in the Senate. I voted for the present rules. I did it with a good deal of hesitation. I have a great deal of sympathy with a Senator who says he will never vote for a rule that limits debate in the Senate. In the House of Representatives, where the body is larger, it is necessary that some provision of that kind be made, or they could not transact business. But Senators will find if they will examine the legislation that has gone through the Congress in the last 10 years—and I speak of it with some reluctance because I might be misunderstood—that the place where the legislation is really wrought out is in the Senate. That is no reflection upon the House. The Members of the House are just as able, they are the same kind of people, they are just as patriotic as Senators. They are able to do the same things we can do, but on account of their very numbers they are limited, and they must cut off their hands in order to accomplish anything; they must deprive themselves of the right to debate and the right even to offer amendments in order to accomplish anything, because of the size of the body.

One reason why I have felt anxious for this amendment, which I do not believe is fully appreciated either by the Senate or by the country, is that it will make of this body a deliberative assembly in the truest and the highest sense of the word. That which causes criticism of it now is what happens every two years, when a filibuster takes place.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator have in mind that we are proceeding under Rule VIII, and that at 2 o'clock a motion will be required to bring his joint resolution before the Senate?

Mr. NORRIS. I thank the Vice President. I subside.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I supposed that since we were on the calendar, the discussion of this matter could continue beyond 2 o'clock.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there is no vote, a motion to continue the consideration of the joint resolution at 2 o'clock would be in order.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask unanimous consent that if the matter shall not have been disposed of before 2 o'clock, the rule be suspended and we continue the consideration of the joint resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. BINGHAM. I hope the Senator from Nebraska will continue.

Mr. NORRIS. I had about concluded what I wanted to say.

Mr. FESS. I ask the Senator to permit me to correct what might be thought an error. I do not want to be considered as saying that I am in favor of limiting debate in the Senate, except that debate ought to be germane to the subject that is being discussed. The only objection I have to the present method of proceeding in the Senate is that we permit a Senator to go afield and talk on anything under the sun while we are discussing a particular measure. As long as a Senator is discussing the measure pending, I think he ought to go on as long as he has anything to say. Otherwise, I doubt the wisdom of unlimited debate.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, if I may be pardoned for a very brief statement, I dislike extremely to vote against this amendment, which has already passed the Senate three times by a very large vote. If it were possible to place the amendment in such form as to provide that the next Congress to come in after an election would be the Congress chosen at that election, I should be glad to vote for it, but to vote for an amendment which means two long sessions in each year, and therefore more chance for legislation and more chance for unnecessary talking, does not seem to me a wise thing to do. Therefore, although I shall probably be in a very small minority, I regret that I shall have to vote against the resolution in its present form.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I am not opposed to having the resolution brought up for consideration, and I shall detain the Senate but a moment, knowing how futile would be any effort on my part to defeat the resolution.

In the first place, there is no necessity for this resolution in order to effectuate the principal object the Senator from Nebraska has in mind. I gave some little attention to this question in the Sixty-eighth Congress and offered a bill at that time reading as follows:

A bill to appoint the days for the annual sessions of Congress

Be it enacted, etc., That the first annual session of each Congress shall be upon the 6th day of April next following the election of such Congress; the second annual session of Congress shall be upon the 2d day of January next following; and the third annual session of the Seventieth Congress and of each alternate Congress thereafter shall be upon the 2d day of January next following the appointment of the electors of the President and the Vice President.

Congress has the power under the Constitution to change the time of meeting of the Congress; and if it is not desirable that so long a period shall intervene between the election of the Congress and its convening, that can be cured very easily, if the Congress so desires, by the passage of a bill of the character indicated by the measure which I have just read.

I ask permission to insert in the RECORD as a part of my remarks a statement which I made in the Senate on March 11, 1924, explanatory of my position and giving reasons why I would vote against the proposed amendment. It is wholly unnecessary. We are seeking to tinker with the Constitution when we can accomplish all we desire or legitimately should desire by enacting a measure similar to the one which I have offered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, permission is granted.

The statement referred to is as follows:

I offered this measure for the purpose of avoiding, if we possibly could, a constitutional amendment, as I am very much averse, in the language of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], to constantly tinkering with the Constitution of the United States. In support of this measure, and as a reason for it, I ask to be permitted to offer a few observations.

The Constitution provides that—

"Congress shall assemble at least once in every year, and such meeting shall be on the first Monday in December, unless they shall by law appoint a different day."

The bill to appoint the days for the annual sessions of Congress fixes the date for the first annual session upon the 6th day of April next following the election of such Congress, and the date for the second annual session upon the 2d day of January next succeeding. Provision is also made for a third session on January 2, following the election of the President of the United States, this short session before the end of a presidential term being necessary in order to canvass and declare the vote of the Electoral College for the President and Vice President. This short third session will only be held by alternate Congresses.

The four months intervening between the election in November and the inauguration of the President in March is not too great a time to enable the outgoing President to clear up the work of his administration and to afford the new President time to select his Cabinet and prepare for the assumption of the duties of the presidential office. The short session of the old Congress preceding the change in administrations will also be of advantage for disposing of pending business.

But the interval of 13 months between the election and the first annual session of Congress is too great, and the bill shortens this interval to five months. This interval could be further shortened by providing for the election of Congress in January, which might also cool the judgment of the people. The new Congress assumes office on the 4th of March, and one month later, on the 6th of April, meets in regular session. This affords the new President one month for the preparation of his message and is as early a date as would be proper for the assembling of Congress.

April 6, 1789, was the day upon which the First Congress assembled in the city of New York, canvassed the vote of the Electoral College, declared that George Washington had been chosen President, and organized the Government of the United States under the Constitution. This date, April 6, instead of March 4, should have been accepted as the date for the beginning of the terms of office prescribed in the Constitution, as the Government under the Constitution, both in the de facto and de jure sense, had its beginning upon that day.

It is not necessary to amend the Constitution. The day for the election may be moved up as near the 4th of March as may be desired, and the day for the convening of Congress may be moved back as near the 4th of March as may be desired. The fixing of the days for the election and convening of Congress is within the express powers conferred upon Congress by the Constitution.

Mr. President, I hope that Senators will do me the honor to read what I have said upon this subject before they vote upon the proposed amendment to the Constitution which has been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary by the distinguished senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS]. In my judgment, there is no necessity for amending the Constitution of the United States. We can reach reasonably satisfactory results by executing the plan I have suggested in the bill which I just read to the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the joint resolution pass?

Mr. NORRIS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT]. I understand that if present he would vote as I shall vote, and I am therefore at liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. OVERMAN (after having voted in the negative). I have just noted the absence of my pair, the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. GEORGE. I have a pair with the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. PHIPPS]. I understand that if he were present he would vote as I am about to vote. I will therefore vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. BAYARD. I have a pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED], who is absent. I am given to understand that if he were present he would vote as I intend to vote, and I shall therefore vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. WATSON. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]. I understand that if present he would vote as I intend to vote. I therefore vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. JONES. I desire to announce the necessary absence of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT], the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT], the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF], the Senator from Idaho [Mr. GOODING], the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. PINE], and the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SCHALL]. Each of these Senators if present would vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 67, nays 6, as follows:

MUSCLE SHOALS

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, a few days preceding the close of the last session of Congress the Governor of Alabama and the Muscle Shoals Commission served notice upon the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and also upon the President of the United States that the State of Alabama owns and controls the bed and banks of the Tennessee River and the property known as the Muscle Shoals project. At the request of the President of the United States the Attorney General has submitted an opinion covering that important subject matter, a copy of which I have on my desk at this moment.

It is in the nature of a memorandum which has been submitted to the Attorney General by two very able and capable assistants in his office. I ask unanimous consent that the opinion be published as a Senate document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. KEYES. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to call up for present consideration the bill (H. R. 483) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to acquire certain lands within the District of Columbia to be used as sites for public buildings, which was reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds this morning.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with an amendment, to add a new section, section 4, so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to acquire economically and at an early date adequate sites for suitable accommodations in the District of Columbia for the executive departments, and independent establishments of the Government not under any executive department, and suitable grounds, parking, and approaches thereto, the act entitled "An act to provide for the construction of certain public buildings, and for other purposes," approved May 25, 1926, is hereby amended so as to authorize and direct him to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, all the lands obtainable with the funds that may be appropriated, including buildings and other structures, included within the triangle bounded by Pennsylvania Avenue and B Street, extending from Fifteenth Street to Sixth Street Northwest, and reservations A, B, C, and D, except property owned by the United States or the District of Columbia as such lands appear in the records of the office of the surveyor of the District of Columbia.

SEC. 2. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated in addition to the amounts authorized in said act of May 25, 1926, and without regard to the limitations contained in the first paragraph of section 5 of such act, the sum of $25,000,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to carry out the provisions of this act.

SEC. 3. The buildings constructed under said act approved May 25, 1926, when completed and ready for occupancy shall be turned over to the Office of Public Buildings and Public Parks for care, maintenance, and protection, including the furnishing of heat, gas, and electricity therein, together with all machinery, tools, equipments, and supplies to be used in connection therewith.

SEC. 4. That after title has been vested in the United States to any of the properties herein or heretofore authorized to be acquired or taken within the area embraced in this act, the Secretary of the Treasury be and he is hereby further authorized to enter into contracts for demolishing the buildings thereon, and for clearing and grading the land at such time and to such extent as he may deem proper, and to enter into contracts for plans and specifications for the architectural landscape treatment of the portion of the lands acquired which he may deem proper, with the approval of the Public Buildings Commission created by the act of March 1, 1919, to reserve for planting and for open spaces for the proper grouping of the Federal buildings which have heretofore been authorized or may hereafter be authorized to be constructed within the area embraced in this act, the expenditures on account thereof to be charged to the appropriations authorized under the provisions of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I desire to ask a question of the Senator from New Hampshire in charge of the bill. I have heard some objection to the bill upon the theory that it is proposed under the terms of the legislation, if it shall be enacted, that the building known as the Southern Railway Building is to be purchased by the Government and then demolished. I desire to know whether that is contemplated under the proposed legislation?

Mr. KEYES. I think not, at least not for a great many years. The Southern Railway Building is a modern building. I think when we passed a similar bill at the last session it was rather expected that the District of Columbia would want to acquire that building for use of the District government. Since last winter, however, the District government apparently has adopted a different program which it hopes to carry out and which will greatly benefit the appearance of the north side of Pennsylvania Avenue, and that is to erect a group of district buildings in the vicinity of John Marshall Place. For that reason I believe the District would have no real use for the Southern Railway Building; but the Federal Government certainly will have. That building will be used without doubt for a great many years as an office building to house many of the Federal activities which are now scattered over the city of Washington. It will be a very useful building and will save a great deal of rent to the Federal Government, and I have not the slightest idea that the building will be taken down for years to come.

Mr. WILLIS. As I understand, the amount proposed to be expended under the provisions of the bill is $25,000,000?

Mr. KEYES. That is the amount.

Mr. WILLIS. Is it contemplated that there will be other measures during this session of Congress for the purchase of other real estate in the District to carry out the building program, and if so, what is the probable amount involved?

Mr. KEYES. I think there is one bill which has been introduced to acquire one or two squares on the north side of Pennsylvania Avenue down by the Peace Monument. That land would probably be necessary for the new avenue which is contemplated from the Union Station to the vicinity of the Peace Monument, to connect Pennsylvania Avenue with the Union Station.

Mr. WILLIS. That is the street which is proposed to be called Ohio Avenue?

Mr. KEYES. I understand that there are some who desire to have it named Ohio Avenue.

Mr. SMOOT. That is the plaza proposition, which has nothing whatever to do with the triangle. All the lands provided for in the pending bill are within the triangle.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I do not want to delay action on the pending bill, but I desire this afternoon to make some comments on the coal situation.

Mr. SMOOT. I suggest to the Senator to permit the bill to pass, and that he then ask unanimous consent to speak on the coal situation.

Mr. COPELAND. I do not know what the plan for to-day's session is. Is it intended that the Senate shall go into executive session pretty soon?

Mr. SMOOT. That was the plan, I will say to the Senator from New York.

Mr. COPELAND. I do not think I shall speak more than 10 minutes, but I wish to speak to-day.

Mr. KEYES. Will the Senator from New York not allow us to act on the pending bill? It will, I think, take only a moment.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask unanimous consent that when the pending bill shall have been passed the Senator from New York may be allowed to speak for 10 or 15 minutes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, unanimous consent is granted.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

COMMISSIONERS IN THE COURT OF CLAIMS

Mr. COPELAND obtained the floor.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York yield to me for just a moment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. COPELAND. I do.

Mr. NORRIS. There has come over from the House of Representatives a joint resolution similar to one which was introduced by me in the Senate and referred to the Judiciary Committee. The Judiciary Committee has to-day favorably reported the joint resolution to which I refer. It is identical with the House joint resolution excepting that it uses the word "three," while in the House joint resolution the time of extension of the term of the commissioners is for five years. I now ask unanimous consent that the House joint resolution may be taken up, and if that shall be done, I shall offer an amendment to it so that it will correspond with the report of the Senate committee. If my amendment shall be agreed to, I then shall ask that the joint resolution may be passed.

Mr. OVERMAN. To what does the joint resolution relate?

Mr. NORRIS. It is a joint resolution providing for the extension of the term of commissioners of the Court of Claims.

The House joint resolution provides for an extension of the term of the commissioners of the Court of Claims for five years while the joint resolution as reported by the Senate Committee on the Judiciary provides for an extension of only three years. Under the law we have commissioners for the Court of Claims, and their terms expire sometime next month. The object of the passage of this joint resolution is to extend their activities under the present law for three years more. I think myself their office should be permanent, but it is not.

Mr. OVERMAN. We had quite a hearing in the committee on the matter, and the committee was unanimously in favor of the joint resolution but recommended a change from five years to three years.

Mr. NORRIS. The committee changed their term from five years to three years, but the House of Representatives passed a joint resolution providing for an extension of five years. That, of course, is the committee action, and I can not change their action and increase the term from three to five years; so I wish to amend the House joint resolution, making the change from five to three years to correspond with the action of the Senate committee on the resolution.

Mr. OVERMAN. That is all right.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the resolution (H. J. Res. 82) to continue commissioners in the Court of Claims.

Mr. NORRIS. I move to amend the joint resolution, in line 9, before the word "years," by striking out "five" and inserting "three."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to amend the joint resolution, in line 9, before the word "years," by striking out "five" and inserting "three," so as to make the joint resolution read:

Resolved, etc., That the provisions of sections 1 and 2 of the act approved February 24, 1925 (February 24, 1925, ch. 301, par. 1, 43 Stat. 964; U. S. Code, p. 899, sec. 269), providing for commissioners in the Court of Claims, their appointment, powers, and procedure be, and the same are hereby, continued in full force and effect for the term of three years from the date of the approval of this joint resolution.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the joint resolution to be read a third time.

The joint resolution was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. NORRIS. I now ask that the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 45) continuing commissioners in the Court of Claims, which was to-day reported from the Judiciary Committee of the Senate, be indefinitely postponed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

THE COAL SITUATION

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, there is a great conflict going on at the present time between the mine owners and the striking union miners. I am not seeking at this time to fix any responsibility, but simply to present to the Senate the situation as it is. Perhaps in the course of my remarks I may suggest something by way of a legislative remedy for the prevention of future situations of this kind. I desire to have read by the clerk a telegram which I have just received.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the clerk will read, as requested.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

PITTSBURGH, PA., January 3, 1928.

Senator ROYAL S. COPELAND,
Senate Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR COPELAND: Reading your article on the coal situation prompts me to wire first-hand information. The Young Women's Bible Class of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Beechview, Pittsburgh, made investigation on December 2 in mines Nos. 2 and 3 at Castleshannon and mine No. 8 at Coverdale. We found large families of bright children without shoes and stockings and not sufficient food or clothing—conditions almost unbelievable could exist in America. We found a newborn babe without any clothing, the first one born in the barracks of Coverdale. We immediately opened a receiving station in Beechview, and we were the first organization to extend relief to these destitute women and children in the mines. It seemed the heavens opened, and in less than three weeks we distributed 1,000 pairs of shoes and stockings, 500 well-filled baskets of groceries, and a lovely Christmas treat for 1,200 children. This is to say the sympathy of the people is expressed in greater degree than upon any previous demand. Judging from the quality of all kinds of clothing, the contributors must have sacrificed. We were happy to provide ample clothing even for this very small portion of the area in distress. The use of coal being a public service, surely the Government will come to the rescue of these people, who are honest and industrious and must not be allowed to perish. We are not concerned in the controversy, but from a humanitarian standpoint we are urging you to use all the power at your command. I met you when you spoke in this city at a meeting. The barracks in which they are forced to live you could insert a lead pencil between the boards.

Very sincerely,

IDA L. ALLEN,
Teacher and Treasurer of the Relief Committee.
Mrs. H. G. SCHRAEDER,
Chairman.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, the telegram contains a recital of conditions, not in Armenia or in some remote part of the earth, but within less than half a day's journey of this Capitol. This is a situation, too, in a country boasting of prosperity. I have on my desk photographs recently taken by the Daily News of New York, from an inspection of which any Senator who desires to know the conditions in Pennsylvania can learn them. The good woman who sent the telegram refers to the barracks where the miners are living. Here [exhibiting] are photographs of those barracks, the crude buildings between the boards of which she says a lead pencil may be inserted, and directly across the street are the buildings which are owned by the mine companies and which were occupied by the miners until recently, but from which they have been dispossessed.

Here [exhibiting] are photographs of constable notices and photographs showing how the miners have been turned out of house and home and how their goods have been sold. They are destitute; they are without the means of support. Why is it possible in this great rich country of ours to have a situation like this?

Mr. President, we must face this problem. For two years, during the Sixty-ninth Congress, I begged the Senate to take some action which might make it possible for the President to act in a crisis of this character, but the Senate did not choose to take action. We must, however, face the situation and in some way find a solution.

Let me tell you what the situation is, Mr. President. Every time there is a strike—and I am speaking now about the bituminous coal mines—new mines are opened and old mines increase their output beyond any point which the future needs of the country will justify. In addition, mines which have been lying dormant have been resurrected.

I think I am right in saying that there are 32 States in the Union where bituminous coal is found. It is not like the anthracite deposit which is found in but a few counties in the State of Pennsylvania, for bituminous coal is found and mined throughout our Nation.

Every time there is a strike somewhere and certain mines are closed new mines are opened in some remote section of the country. During the war almost 4,000 new bituminous mines were opened because of the need of the world for bituminous coal. At the present time we have in operation in this country between ten and fifteen thousand bituminous coal mines. There are sufficient miners to operate those ten or fifteen thousand coal mines if there were any need of the coal, but since there is no such need, the miners are without work.

When I recite the situation as it exists this very day I am not seeking at all, Mr. President, to blame the mine owners or to say that they should put these men at work. The fact is the mine owners themselves are suffering. The fact is there is no work for these men.

During the year which has just closed there were mined 519,000,000 tons of soft coal, which is near the peak in quantity of soft coal mined since 1919. This, too, was at a time when industry was slack and fuel oil and water power were being substituted for coal. However, the point I wish to bring out is that although year after year we have been opening new mines, now, instead of needing the great number of available coal miners, we have a surplus of from 200,000 to 300,000 such miners. Some of them are in the State of the Senator from Alabama, working, as I remember the statement made to me by the Secretary of Labor yesterday, for $1.92 a day. But they do not work every day; they only work two or three days a week, because there is no demand for their service. That is true all over the country. So many men have been brought into coal mining and there are now so many miners that under no circumstances is it possible to set them all at work.

What are we to do about it? This morning I introduced a bill—and a similar bill was introduced in the House by Mr. JACOBSTEIN, of my State—to do away with the antitrust laws so far as they operate to prevent cooperative mining and cooperative marketing. It is strange to think that under any circumstances it could be desirable to lessen competition, but there is such a competitive strife and such a degree of cruel competition going on in bituminous coal mining that the whole industry is threatened with bankruptcy. Every Senator in this Chamber who is conversant with the facts, knows that I state the truth. To-day the situation is such that coal is being carried six or eight hundred miles from one State to another, and because of competitive conditions is sold at the same price as coal which is carried 100 miles within the borders of the State of production. Any sacrifices are made, on the part of those who have coal, to sell it; and in order to break the union in certain quarters coal is being shipped from nonunion sections of this country to sections where they have union mining, in order that those union miners may be put out of business.

We can not disregard the situation. We must deal with it intelligently. We can not afford to pass it over and simply disregard it as we have done in the past. We must take effective action.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. To what extent has the condition which the Senator now describes been enlarged or developed recently? My impression is that there has been a very great surplus of bituminous coal employees for many years; and I should like to know how much worse the condition is to-day than it was four or five years ago.

Mr. COPELAND. In reply to the Senator from Massachusetts, who has always taken such an intelligent interest in all these matters having to do with human welfare, I will say this: Of course, it was during the war that this condition was first brought to our attention in a striking way. There was a demand from everywhere that we should cultivate more acres, and raise more wheat and corn, and more everything else; and so at that time we were urged to develop more coal. Since then, however, nearly 4,000 new mines have been opened, and why have they been opened? I want to make that clear to the Senator.

Every time the mines are closed up, we will say, in Massachusetts——

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Unfortunately, we have not any.

Mr. COPELAND. Well, in Pennsylvania—put it that way—I think you are fortunate that you have not any mines in Massachusetts. You have cotton mills, however, in Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. We do not think it is fortunate, in view of the price we have to pay for our coal.

Mr. COPELAND. It is unfortunate; is it not?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Yes; I think so.

Mr. COPELAND. When coal sells at $2 or $3 at the mines, and, when it gets to the people of Massachusetts they pay $6 to $10 for it, certainly there is something wrong with the methods of distribution.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. There is something wrong with our economic system when the costs of transporting coal are so excessively greater than the costs to produce it.

Mr. COPELAND. Yes. That is true, of course, of everything in the way of products necessary for the family. If the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER] were speaking, he would call attention to the fact that the farmers get seven and one-half billion dollars for what we pay twenty-two and one-half billion for. Between the producer and the consumer the price has been trebled.

However, when a strike occurs in the northern regions the mines in the Southern States and other places are operated full tilt, and, if need be, new mines are opened.

This bill provides against the opening of new mines except under certain conditions. Since the Senator has raised this question, I refer to section 5 of the bill:

> Every application for car service to a new bituminous coal mine shall be submitted by the carrier to the Interstate Commerce Commission for its approval. This application must be accompanied by a certificate of necessity and approval by the Secretary of Commerce.

Why is this?

Suppose mines were discovered in Massachusetts—and there might well be mines discovered in the western part of Massachusetts, up in the Berkshires. Suppose coal lands were discovered in that State. The owners of these coal lands would immediately apply to the Interstate Commerce Commission for car service in order that they might ship this coal. At the same time that they applied for the car service they would make an appeal for miners; and just at this particular time, when there is so much unemployment in Massachusetts because of the Republican "prosperity," a lot of the men from Massachusetts would be induced to go into coal mining. They would become coal miners.

Then, when the strike is over in Pennsylvania, we will say, and the mines of Pennsylvania open, mines which can be operated much more cheaply than those in Massachusetts, then the coal mines in Massachusetts are closed, or operated at a loss, and these men who have become coal miners are put out of business or work part time. That has gone on and on and on until to-day we have 250,000 surplus coal miners, and that is the reason why the dreadful situation shown by these photographs exists in Pennsylvania, Illinois, Ohio, Indiana, and other fields.

I observe that the chair is occupied at this time by a distinguished Senator who is himself an authority on the subject of coal [Mr. SACKETT in the chair]. He realizes, unquestionably, that it is a fact that by reason of the interference of the antitrust laws it is not possible for mines to be consolidated. It is not possible to put the expensive, impracticable mine out of business. It is cheaper to operate at a loss than to shut down completely. The result is that we have a tremendous amount of expensively produced coal upon the market. How are you going to settle that? The only way I can see is to do away with the interference of the antitrust laws, and permit these consolidations.

Then, in the next place, every mine has its own marketing outfit. It has its own machinery for selling its coal; and if the mine owners of a given mine in Kentucky venture to cooperate with the owners of another mine in Kentucky, or with one in West Virginia, they come under the displeasure of the Federal Trade Commission, and the antitrust laws are put in operation against them.

I do not see any way to solve this problem except by waiving the operation of the antitrust laws so far as they relate to bituminous coal. I would not for a moment vote to do that for anthracite coal, because anthracite coal is taken from a relatively small number of mines in a limited number of counties in a limited area of one State, and there could be developed such a monopoly in anthracite coal that any price the market would bear could be charged for that product.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Does not that condition exist now?

Mr. COPELAND. Oh, yes; it does exist now; but, of course, in the case of anthracite coal they are taking advantage of the fact that they are an intrastate group, and in that way they seek to avoid any Federal interference.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The difference between the anthracite situation and the bituminous situation is that one is already monopolized and the other is competitive.

Mr. COPELAND. That is it; and it will be increasingly competitive as the years go on, at the expense of the public, the mine owners, and workers, unless we curb it; and not alone will we have 250,000 surplus miners, but if we have no curb placed upon the opening of new mines there will be a million. There will be any number of surplus miners as time goes on. It is essential that we protect the public from the wastes and inconveniences which result from the present ruinous and uneconomic competition.

This measure, which has been thought out not alone by the authors of the bill but by many eminent economists as well as some officials of the Government, seeks to meet the present situation and also to prevent the conditions, fear of which undoubtedly the Senator from Massachusetts has in his mind, that there might be created a bituminous coal trust as offensive to the people of the United States as the anthracite trust is. We have sought to protect against that.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I want to say to the Senator, if I may, that I am in sympathy with the condition he describes and to which some relief should be extended. I have grave doubts about the relief suggested by the Senator, however, but I am willing to be enlightened. The Senator is to be commended for the great interest he has always taken in this important subject, and I am anxious to cooperate with him in finding a solution.

Mr. COPELAND. I assume that at the proper time, or perhaps now, the Senator will suggest the particular objection he has; but before he does that, perhaps I may venture to show him how we have anticipated some of the objections that he will raise.

For instance, the Senator from Massachusetts has pointed out that in Pennsylvania there is in effect a monopoly; and that is true. We have suffered from it. He has suffered from it in his State; we have suffered from it in our State; and when we had this terrible strike two years ago, when we could get no action because of the unwillingness of Congress to act, we had a situation where the people in Boston and the people in New York suffered physically. There was not only suffering, but there were deaths which could be attributed to the lack of hard coal by reason of this monopolistic situation on the part of the owners of the anthracite mines.

But I doubt, myself, that it will ever be possible to monopolize bituminous coal mining. You would have to buy a large part of the land in 32 States to do it. The initial investment would be so tremendous that it would be impossible to carry out such a project. However, in order that there might be no monopolistic tendency, we have provided that in the formation of these associations, which might be called trade associations, there shall be a State or geographical limitation imposed upon their membership.

Under the bill that I have introduced these associations are limited to the confines of a single State, or to a limited geographical area, as determined by the Secretary of Commerce. In other words, western Pennsylvania and northern West Virginia, if the latter State could ever agree with western Pennsylvania in anything—I think perhaps that is doubtful—might be formed into one association. There could be another which would cover Kentucky and Tennessee; another, perhaps, covering Ohio and Indiana; but there would have to be limited areas in order that the monopolistic feature which the Senator fears might be avoided.

Mr. President, I did an unusual thing in the reference of this bill. I did it deliberately. I had it referred to the Committee on Education and Labor. Perhaps it should go to the Committee on Interstate Commerce; but I had it referred to the Committee on Education and Labor because the other bill, the bill which I introduced in the Sixty-ninth Congress, which was approved by that committee and put upon the calendar, and the same bill which I introduced this year, was referred to that committee. I was told by the chairman of the Committee on Education and Labor that the coal men or other persons have asked for a hearing.

That bill and the one I am discussing to-day are related. If there is to be a hearing upon the bill which was presented last year, we might at the same time have a hearing upon this bill. The same men are interested who will come before the committee; and I bespeak for this bill the careful consideration which the importance of the subject deserves. We must find a way to solve the problem, or the bituminous-coal industry is bankrupt.

I am not sure that the railroads are particularly anxious to have this question solved. They are buying bituminous coal cheaper than they ever did before, and they can carry it great distances, to parts of the coal fields where union miners are employed, and can put out of business those mines where union miners are employed, to create situations such as we have pictured here.

Unless we find a way to solve the question, we are going to have not only in western Pennsylvania, but in every State where coal mining is done, a repetition of what is going on now in that territory. I hope that the Senate will recognize the situation, which has so much to do with human welfare, not alone of these workers, but of workers generally throughout the country.

I leave the discussion to-day with this description of what we are seeking to undertake, hoping that when the matter comes formally before the committee, and later, as I hope it will, before the Senate, there may be consultation and discussion. We have no pride of authorship in this bill. We are here simply to present the matter as it appears to us, but to beg of the Senate that there shall be found a solution of this tremendous problem.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from New York a question?

Mr. COPELAND. Certainly.

Mr. BAYARD. I probably misunderstood him. He said a moment ago that the railroads were carrying coal to districts where the unions were out on strike. Does the Senator mean to say that the railroads are conspiring with the owners of the mines in distant districts to bring their coal into the districts where the union miners are striking for the purpose of breaking the strike?

Mr. COPELAND. That is the effect.

Mr. BAYARD. In other words, the Senator's claim is that the railroads are in conspiracy with the owners of the mines to break up the unions?

Mr. COPELAND. I do not know that I should like to use the word "conspiracy"; perhaps we will say that there is a "gentlemen's agreement" in order to accomplish the thing the Senator has suggested.

An examination of my bill will disclose that it has in it the following constructive features: First, it provides for voluntary cooperation and consolidation of soft-coal mines; second, it legalizes such consolidations by exempting them from the operation of the Sherman Antitrust Act; third, it limits these consolidations to regional areas approved by the Secretary of Commerce; fourth, it sets up the necessary legal machinery for restricting the overproduction of soft coal; fifth, it places in the Secretary of Commerce the responsibility and power to supervise such trade associations in order to protect the public, the independent mine owners, and mine labor from exploitation.

I bespeak for this bill a careful study of every Senator. The proposed legislation has a fundamental relationship to the prosperity and well-being of the country.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question before he takes his seat?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. NEELY. Will the Senator be good enough to name the railroads and the mining companies that he believes have entered into the gentlemen's agreement that he has mentioned, and also to specify where the agreement is now being executed?

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, is the Senator more interested in the matter which he has mentioned than he is in the seeking of a solution to prevent a repetition of the situation described by the writer of that telegram? Is he more interested in going into a discussion of the other subject? I have no definite information, let me say frankly to the Senator. I have not wanted to have. I do not know even the names of these mining companies down in western Pennsylvania. I am not interested in the names of mines or of railroads. But I am interested in a situation which threatens the life of an industry so fundamental to American progress as bituminous coal mining, and the Senator from West Virginia, I am sure, must have a greater interest than I have, because there are a tremendous number of those mines in his own State.

Mr. NEELY. The Senator from West Virginia is very deeply interested in the matter, indeed. Otherwise he would have asked no questions.

May I further inquire of the able Senator from New York, to what place coal is now being shipped from nonunion mines for the purpose of destroying the unions in the territory to which the coal is being transported?

Mr. COPELAND. Does that have a bearing on the question?

Mr. NEELY. How can the Senate determine the value of the Senator's conclusions without knowing the facts upon which they are based?

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, in order that the Senator may have full information I suggest to him that he see Mr. Kerwin, the director of conciliation of the Department of Labor, and he will there see charts and get information that will be illuminating to him, as they have been to me.

Mr. NEELY. I understood the Senator to say that the bill which he has introduced represents not only his own thought and judgment but also the conclusions of some of the officials of this administration.

Mr. COPELAND. I would not quite say that, Mr. President. The conclusion was reached in our minds after consultation with officials of the administration, among others. I do not need to say this in this presence, but in no sense whatever do I represent this administration.

Mr. NEELY. The Senator is capable of greatly improving it. But since this administration has manifested considerable hostility to the coal-mining industry in West Virginia and other Southern States, I am anxious to know, for example, whether Doctor Smith or Mr. Hoover has collaborated with the Senator from New York in the preparation of his proposed legislation.

Mr. COPELAND. I will be very happy to state that Mr. Hoover—and who was the other gentleman?

Mr. NEELY. Doctor Smith.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. Hoover and Doctor Smith have not collaborated.

Mr. NEELY. Doctor Smith is the eminent economist who thinks that West Virginia should have waited a half a century before attempting to interfere with Pennsylvania's monopoly of the soft-coal business of the country, a monopoly that was for many years almost as exclusive as that which our erring sister State now enjoys in the matter of political corruption.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, last year the Senator from West Virginia and I were on opposing sides relative to the importance of the bill which bore my name, and which was upon the Calendar of the Senate for two years. I have no criticism to pass upon him because of the position which he took. I regard the Senator from West Virginia as a conscientious and able legislator, an ornament to the Senate. But I do not wish him to form the impression that this particular legislation which I have discussed this morning is the legislation which we were talking about last year. I venture to say that if the Senator from West Virginia will consult the mine owners in his State, and if he will take pains to consult the heads of the workers—they do not have unions, I believe, in his State, but if he will consult those who are active in the organization of labor, not "organized" in the technical sense, but those who work—he will find that they will be eager for this sort of legislation.

I do not care what Doctor Smith or Doctor Brown or Doctor Jones may have said about West Virginia in the past, the fact remains that these mines in West Virginia have been opened and they are giving to the country what the Senator from West Virginia says is the best coal ever mined. I have no reason to doubt that. Anyhow they are operating. But certainly the Senator from West Virginia does not want to have many more mines opened in West Virginia, or Virginia, or Pennsylvania, or Ohio, or Indiana, or any other State, because every time new mines are opened, immediately the fundamentals of the industry are attacked. We can not prosper as a manufacturing nation unless we have bituminous coal, and a stabilized price, and a stabilized flow of coal. Those are the things which are involved in this bill.

So far as the administration is concerned, let not the Senator be troubled. I am not speaking for the administration. I have never been invited to breakfast by the administration. I have never partaken of any of the buckwheat cakes and sausage. I have never ridden upon the Mayflower. I am just a poor benighted resident of New York.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, excepting the place from which the Senator comes, everything he has enumerated speaks volumes in his favor. May the Senator find consolation in the parable which teaches that he who is momentarily denied the crumbs that fall from a rich or great man's table may eventually receive a great reward in heaven.

Mr. COPELAND. Then, Mr. President, with this very happy retort, I think we may close the discussion for the day. But I serve notice now that the Senate has not heard the last of this question. I do beg Senators to study it, to inform themselves regarding the evils of the present situation, in order that together we may work out some means of solving what is a very important national question.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, there is more rejoicing around the throne over one sinner who returns to the fold than over ninety and nine who are already there. During the last session of the Congress a few of us experienced great difficulty in preventing the Senator from New York from passing a bill under which the coal industry might have been destroyed. The measure that the Senator offered last year was, in my opinion, destructive. The one he offers now seems to be constructive. Let all of us who have been trying to save the most depressed, unprofitable, and bedeviled but withal the most important industry of the country, rejoice over the fact that the distinguished senior Senator from New York has at last taken his place on the right side of the coal-mining question. Although in the past the Senator's sins in this matter may have been as scarlet, they shall now be as white as snow.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I would not care to have this facetious statement pass unchallenged, because in the RECORD it will look serious. I do want to say that while I have fuller information than I had before, it has not wiped from my mind the conviction that the country still needs the legislation for which I was striving last year.

Mr. NEELY. That is "the most unkindest cut of all." It compels me to retract much that I have just said in the Senator's favor.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, January 4, 1928

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

"The Day-Spring" from on high hath visited us, and we thank Thee, our Heavenly Father; His star hath shown on the brow of night and opened the gates of the morning, and again we praise Thee. O God, the ceaseless surge of time and tide rolls on; helpless we are to stay the travel of the years. We implore Thee to help us to be diligent and not fretful, lest we fail ere the set of sun. Oh, may we not be chilled by the outlook. Give us a sane and a reasonable faith—a faith with its radiant facts, with its convincing principles, and with its simple commandments. Yes, give us a sympathy that includes all humanity. Again, dear Lord God, give us a religion with the arch of blue above its head and all Thy earthly children round its altars. O give us a large measure of health, wisdom, and charity for the new year. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Wednesday, December 21, 1927, was read and approved.

SWEARING IN OF MEMBERS

Mr. BECK, of the seventh district of the State of Wisconsin, and Mr. KURTZ, of the twenty-first district of the State of Pennsylvania, presented themselves at the bar of the House and took the oath of office.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I offer a resolution of the highest privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers a resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 72

Whereas GEORGE S. GRAHAM, a Representative from the State of Pennsylvania from the second district thereof, has been unable from sickness to appear in person to be sworn as a Member of the House, and there being no contest or question as to his election: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Speaker, or a deputy named by him, be, and he is hereby, authorized to administer the oath of office to said GEORGE S. GRAHAM at Mount Sinai Hospital in New York, N. Y., and that the said oath when administered as herein authorized shall be accepted and received by the House as the oath of office of the said GEORGE S. GRAHAM.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, as I understand, there are several precedents for administering the oath to a Member in this way.

The SPEAKER. There are a number of precedents.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, the resolution as read provides, I believe, that the oath may be administered by the Speaker or by some one designated by him. I presume that contemplates a Member of the House, though I do not know and I do not think it is very material. My recollection is that in one case where a Member took the oath out of the city of Washington he was permitted to take it before any officer entitled to administer oaths in the State. However, I do not think it is very material.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I will call my friend's attention to the fact that in the Aiken case the oath was administered in the State of North Carolina by some officer having authority to administer oaths.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would, if possible, designate some Member of the House, but failing in that, he thinks he would have to designate some person who has the right to administer oaths.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Speaker, does the resolution state that a Member of the House may be designated?

The SPEAKER. No. The resolution gives the Speaker a free hand in designating the person who may administer the oath, but the Speaker would feel bound by the precedents. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

THE DEPARTMENTS OF STATE, JUSTICE, COMMERCE, LABOR, AND THE JUDICIARY APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. SHREVE, from the Committee on Appropriations, by direction of that committee, presented a privileged report on the bill (H. R. 8269) making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice and for the judiciary, and for the Departments of Commerce and Labor, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes, which was read and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I reserve all points of order on the bill.

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Speaker, I desire to inform the House that the bill will be taken up to-morrow immediately after the convening of the House.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

Sundry messages in writing from the President of the United States were presented to the House of Representatives by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

GEN. THOMAS C. CATCHINGS

Mr. COLLIER. Mr. Speaker, it is with much sorrow that I announce to the House the death of Gen. Thomas C. Catchings, of Vicksburg, Miss., who served with great distinction in this body for 16 years.

General Catchings was one of Mississippi's most distinguished men. He was a brave Confederate soldier; he was a great lawyer, a great attorney general, a great statesman, and, above all, a Christian gentleman of the highest character and integrity. He was chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and, together with Speaker Crisp and Mr. Outhwaite, represented the majority membership of the all-powerful Committee on Rules.

While he attained high eminence in his profession and gained a national reputation for his ability and distinguished service in this House, yet the greatness of his fame rests upon his tireless efforts and splendid accomplishments in all matters connected with river and harbor work. It was due to his ability and his influence, together with the confidence his colleagues reposed in him, that the Yazoo River was diverted through a canal to Vicksburg, a stupendous work requiring years to accomplish, the benefit of which has many times justified the cost of the undertaking.

At Vicksburg those rugged hills, once red with the blood of fratricidal strife, are now marked by a beautiful military park, whose lofty and enduring monuments commemorate alike the glory, the heroism, and the virtues of those who over half a century ago wore those colors which suggested "the gray of the early morning and the blue of the noonday sky." That beautiful and historic military park is another tribute to the ability and influence of General Catchings.

Mr. Speaker, my State has lost one of her most distinguished sons, and a great and useful man has passed away. [Applause.]

THE "S-4" DISASTER

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, as there is nothing urgent before the House at this time, I ask unanimous consent for permission to address the House for 15 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House: On my return to New York for the Christmas holidays I found the dominant thought in the mind of everyone with whom I met was the S-4 disaster.

I also found a great deal of apprehension that everything that was humanly possible at the time to save lives was not really accomplished. I also found that people generally had the impression that it was possible to hook a submarine or to have salvage apparatus and equipment right on hand, able to lift a sunken boat out of the water.

I did not know much about the subject, and I am sure you will all understand I do not know very much about it now; I surely am not attempting to qualify as an expert after a short trip of 36 hours on a submarine. The thought came to me that if it were possible to go on the spot and also to see the construction and operation of a submarine, at least, it would be possible to understand the language of the experts on the job. I obtained permission from the department and boarded the S-8, a sister ship of the S-4, at New London last Monday and went to Provincetown to talk with the men on the job and observe the operations there. I simply desire to relate to the House what I saw.

Gentlemen, in the first place, you must bear in mind that the S-4 weighs a little over 800 tons and now lies embedded in the mud in 100 feet of water. This must be kept in mind in considering the task of both rescuing the men within the hull and salvaging the ship.

On December 17 last, about 3 o'clock in the afternoon, the S-4 was standardizing; that is, the S-4 had just left drydock, she was clean, and they were making submerged speed tests by traveling over a marked and measured course at the point of Cape Cod, near the harbor of Provincetown, Mass.

There is a mile marked out at the end of the hook of Cape Cod. There are two posts there, and when the ship comes abeam of the posts it is timed and continues the run until it arrives at the end of the course which is similarly marked. There are four large markers, and the location is known as a submarine course for that purpose. She was making her tests of speed submerged, going full speed at the time. Her two periscopes, naturally out of the water and visible. The S-8 had just finished its tests, and the supervisory officials from the department had left the S-8 and had boarded the S-4 to check up on these tests.

The Coast Guard cutter Paulding was outside of the hook when the officers noticed a four-mast schooner within the harbor of Provincetown or on the inside of the hook. The Paulding was on rum-chasing duty. The vessel apparently looked suspicious to the Paulding and she turned around and came into the hook. As she came in the S-4, submerged, was traveling along the marked course and the Paulding was going, I am informed, at 18 knots an hour; the ships collided and the S-4 sank.

The Paulding immediately dropped a buoy on the spot to mark the position of the S-4 and steamed into the harbor. The cutter Paulding immediately reported the accident by wireless.

The message was received at New London, the submarine base, and Admiral F. H. Brumby immediately boarded the salvage ship U. S. S. Falcon—I will tell you more about the ship in a minute—and proceeded to the scene of the accident. The U. S. S. Bushnell, the flagship of Admiral Brumby and the tender ship of the group of submarines to which the S-4 belonged, was at Portsmouth, and she immediately steamed to the point of disaster. The S-8, which had just left the position, intercepted the message and immediately returned to Provincetown under the command of Lieut. Frank Worden. It was the S-8 that used its oscillators and immediately started sending out messages, but it was several hours before she received any reply from the living members of the S-4 crew. The S-8 arrived on the spot, I believe, late that night and the Falcon arrived with Admiral Brumby in the early hours of the next morning and immediately started rescue operations. The Bushnell arrived later that morning.

The submarine is a little over 200 feet long. It was hit amidship on the starboard side, I believe—that is, on the right side—about the center of the ship. The submarine is divided into several compartments, all airtight compartments, and the six men who were alive were in the forepart of the ship, the torpedo room. It would seem that these men alone had the opportunity to close the bulkhead door of their compartment. Apparently the men in the control room were killed or drowned instantly.

The very first compartment on the forward part of the ship is the torpedo room. Then comes the room that corresponds to the forecastle of a ship—the bunk room and mess room, all in one, of the crew.

Under this space and also further aft are the storage batteries. Then there is a small space there for the officers' quarters, very small space indeed. The officers' wardroom on the ship is really not much larger than this table. The table is a little narrower than this table with a bench on both sides and [indicating] just big enough for four to dine at a time. Right back of that to one side is the gyroscope compass and on the left of that is the hatchway to the conning tower. Back of that is the control room where the men operate the engines and where they operate the controls when the vessel submerges. Back of that are the engine rooms and then the motors.

The vessel is propelled by Diesel engines when it is on the surface. When it is submerged it operates by electric energy from storage batteries.

There are 120 storage batteries on a submarine and each battery or each cell weighs a ton. So right there you have 120 tons of dead weight. When the ship is on the surface these batteries emanate hydrogen gas, and by a system of ventilation the hydrogen gas is forced out. When the ship is submerged there is not so much gas emanating because the batteries are being discharged, but there is no way of forcing this gas out, so that the system of ventilation is changed, and it all circulates within the ship, the gas intermingling with the pure air. If the air in the ship at any time contains 6 per cent of hydrogen gas it causes an explosion, but it is kept down to about 2 per cent during the time the ship is submerged. As soon as salt water comes in contact with these batteries it creates chlorine gas and this, of course, is fatal to human life. Therefore, without a doubt, a very few minutes after the accident happened chlorine gas was formed and that must have gotten most of the men who were not in the torpedo compartment at the time. Death must have been caused by drowning of some of them and the rest almost instantaneously from chlorine gas. It must have been just a matter of minutes.

Now, the S–4 is down in slightly over 100 feet of water in the mud. She is now full of water with the exception of the torpedo compartment, so that when you take the weight of 800 tons you must add the weight of the water in her at the present time. There is not a crane or a derrick existing that will lift that much, even if it were on land, discounting the fact that to actually lift her it must operate on water and very choppy and rough water at that point.

As soon as the Falcon arrived in the early morning of December 18, 1927, it moored over the U. S. S. S–4 and located the submarine, or what was then believed to be the submarine, with a grapnel. A diver was sent down to verify the catch and reported that it was the S–4. He also verified the existence of life in the torpedo room. Besides the grapnel line, a descending line was secured to the S–4. I do not believe that at any time was the S–4 lost to the Falcon or to the officers in charge of the operations. It is true that later, owing to the very heavy sea, both of the lines, the grapnel line and the descending line, snapped and it was necessary then to again catch the S–4 with a grapnel to replace these lines that were broken on account of the very heavy sea at the time. It was during these operations, during the time that the men were working to fix the second grapnel on the S–4 in order to replace the broken descending line, that some of the tugs and boats approached the scene and were ordered back by the officer in charge. It is hardly fair to say that the S–4 had been lost. What apparently gave cause to the statement that the S–4 had been lost was the necessary maneuvers to again attach a line to the vessel. A grapnel is dropped to the bottom and the towing boat must necessarily go to and fro until the grapnel catches securely onto some part of the hull. After this was again done a diver descended on this line and secured another line more firmly and permanently than a grapnel hook could hold and this descending line is used by the divers in going right down to the boat.

There are two tubes or salvage air lines to which the air pipe can be attached; one is to the ballast tanks and the other is to the compartments of the submarine. If a submarine is to be lifted quickly without the aid of pontoons it is necessary to first free the ship from water in the ballast tanks. If the water is cleared from the flooded compartment and the ballast tanks are still full, it is my understanding that there is then still insufficient buoyancy to float the ship. So they connected with the ballast tanks and started the pump. The ballast tanks were, of course, full, as the ship was submerged when the accident occurred. There is no doubt about that.

They pumped for one hour, I am told, when they noticed bubbles coming up through the water. They apparently emptied one tank and then arrived at the point where either the hull was fractured or else the ship was so tilted that the compressed air took the path of least resistance, continuing out of the Kingston valves instead of distributing itself to the other tanks and forcing the water out of them. So nothing was being accomplished after one hour of pumping. They knew that they had emptied one tank and that was all they could do—on the ballast tanks—leaving two filled with water.

They immediately shifted to the compartment air line and started to pump. It was at this point that the weather became very bad. The Falcon was bobbing all over the place, and Diver Michels' line became fouled. It was later learned that water was getting into the torpedo room through this line, demonstrating that the tube had been punctured or broken. So, it seems nothing could be done during the life of the men to lighten the ship sufficiently to float her.

Under ideal conditions if it were possible to empty the ballast tanks by pumping compressed air into them and forcing the water out of the ship and then clearing in like manner at least part of the compartments of water, it would be possible to float the ship, even with one or two of the compartments filled. Unfortunately, these conditions did not exist in the S–4.

These operations took two days, and when it was seen that it was impossible to lift the ship an air line was attached to the CS valve and tube, the listening tube that connects the torpedo department. This is a T-shaped contrivance with rubber bulbs on each side very sensitive, and when the vessel is submerged they listen in by using a stethoscope and can hear the revolutions of a propeller of a ship or the pumping of the ship and know that a vessel is in close proximity.

Everyone that has spoken to me about this matter has asked me the same question: "Why did they not pump air into that compartment and keep these men alive?" Well, you may say, why did they not? The reason, as I understand it, is that these men were in an air-tight compartment full of air of normal pressure. If more air were pumped it would soon make a high-pressure chamber out of that compartment, and human life will not last long under such conditions. It would have been necessary to pump air at the rate of 45 pounds to the inch before they could open any valve and release the foul and excess air. If there were less air pressure and a valve opened it would immediately fill the compartment with water. So, gentlemen, you see it is much easier to sit around the table and say, "Why did they not pump air into that compartment and thus keep these men alive?" than it is to be on the job operating 100 feet below the surface of the water trying to get air into an air-tight compartment.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, can I have 10 minutes more?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that his time be extended 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. So what they did then was to pump 5 pounds of air and then release 5 pounds, and they kept that up for 36 hours. In the meantime, it was ascertained that the men were no longer alive. During all of this time the work on the surface of the water continued. Permanent moorings were placed, preparations for diving and rescuing continued, and continue feverishly to this very moment.

Something was said about taking the U. S. S. Bushnell away and taking one of the divers, who had been injured, to Boston. Some criticism was directed against Admiral Brumby because of that. What happened was this: As soon as there was a sign of life within the hull, they tried to operate under every condition, and against their better judgment they sent down divers, although the water was deep and the Falcon was bobbing and tossing furiously. Of course, as you know, the diver is connected with the ship both by a rope and by air tube. If the ship is bobbing and tossing, one can readily see that the diver is either yanked about, pulled up, or a severe strain is placed on the lines. Communication with the divers becomes extremely difficult. Besides, the tube is liable to break; and if it breaks, the diver gets no air and is either drowned or asphyxiated immediately. Notwithstanding those conditions, they kept sending divers down. Owing to the heavy sea it was necessary to give the tube and line considerable slack, and by giving the tube and line slack they were fouled on part of the deck of the S–4.

This happened to Diver Michels. When they did not receive any more signals from Michels, they sent Diver Eadie down. He went down and found Michels's line fouled with the wreck. He sent for a hack saw and he sawed for 45 minutes before he could release Michels. The minute Michels was released, his suit being full of air, he bobbed up to the surface. As a rule when working under water 100 feet they lift the diver up for 30 or 40 feet, and leave him there for 10 minutes, and then another period of 5 or 10 minutes after 40 more feet. In that way the pressure is gradually decompressed. When Michels came to the surface, after they had unscrewed his helmet, they put him in a decompressing chamber and gradually decompressed the pressure, and on the advice of the doctor he was sent to the hospital at Boston. The weather was so severe at this point, the wind blowing almost a gale and heavy seas, that it was simply impossible to send any more divers down at that time. It was then that the Bushnell was rushed to Boston to take Michels to the hospital. At no time was the place abandoned and at no time were operations or preparations for operations as soon as weather permitted discontinued. I wish that I could give you a more graphic description of the heroic conduct of these men. Let me read of their conduct and deeds direct from the official communication from Admiral Brumby to the Navy Department commending these men for their heroism and service and recommending that they be officially recognized for these deeds:

1. The commanding officer desires to call attention to the heroic conduct of Fred G. Michels, chief torpedoman, in connection with the attempted rescue operations on the U. S. S. S–4.

2. When the U. S. S. Falcon arrived at scene of wreck of the U. S. S. S–4 a heavy sea was running, wind force 7 to 8 Buford scale, temperature of air 25° F. Due to the weather conditions the Falcon was unable to plant moorings, and anchored near life rings which had been planted over the U. S. S. S–4, approximate position, by the U. S. S. Wandank. The U. S. S. S–4 was found by dragging grapnels. The Falcon then anchoring well to windward of grapnel catch, paying out chain and dropped back to bring the grapnel catch on the quarter. The U. S. S. Mallard and U. S. S. Lark were anchored on port and starboard quarter of the Falcon and lines run to them. This gave a very slack moor, dangerous for diving on a wreck job in deep water, but with the probability of life involved, divers were asked to go down. Eadie, Carr, and Michels were the best divers on the Falcon. Eadie was first selected and went down grapnel line, examined the S–4, found that there was life in the torpedo room, and secured descending lines. Carr was next diver selected to hook air hose to S–4's main ballast tanks, and succeeded in doing this. Michels was the next diver selected to hook air to the compartment's air line, but due to the bad moor of the Falcon, the very adverse weather conditions for diving, Michels was very badly fouled.

3. Michels is an old and experienced diver and well realized the condition under which the dive was made. I feel that he freely exposed himself to danger beyond the call of duty and devotion to service, and in recognition thereof I recommend he be awarded the Navy Cross.

HENRY HARTLEY.

Subject: Fred G. Michels (142–69–39), CTM, USN.

1. Forwarded, approval strongly recommended.

2. I was present on board the Falcon at the time of this incident as senior aide to the officer in charge of S–4 rescue operations, having been sent to this duty because of my previous experience in connection with salvage of S–51.

3. The weather and sea conditions were extremely bad for diving, and the Falcon had had only time for the very precarious moor described in letter above. The only divers then on board whose capabilities were positively known were Eadie and Carr and Michels, of whom Eadie was the first and Carr the second diver sent down—and nothing but the endeavor to save life warranted sending either of them down.

4. By the time Carr had come up it was thoroughly dark and the rising wind and sea appeared to make further diving impossible, but Michels was called upon to try to attach an air hose to the S–4's compartment salvage air line, on the extremely remote possibility that the "gag" valves, normally kept open, in this line were closed in the motor room, engine room, control room, and battery room, and the line undamaged in the breached battery room, thus permitting air to be fed into the torpedo room, where six men were known to be alive.

5. Michels was thoroughly aware of all the circumstances, including the extremely remote chance that the accomplishment of his task would be of any use, and had full appreciation of the grave risks he was incurring, but his response to the call was prompt and willing. The desperateness of his dive is confirmed by the fact that though he is an excellent diver, of large experience in deep diving, the yaw and lift of the Falcon were so great that he could not keep his life line and hose (frapped together throughout their length) clear while trying to secure the blowing air hose to S–4's conning tower connection, and became so badly fouled that another diver, Eadie, had to be sent down to clear him. Eadie has been recommended for a medal of honor. Michels was on the bottom under the described conditions for over three hours.

6. The award of at least a Navy cross to Michels is thoroughly deserved by him.

1. On December 18, 1927, the Falcon moored over what was presumed to be the U. S. S. S–4 after a grapnel caught on some object on bottom. Eadie was selected to prove the grapnel catch, using grapnel line for his descending line. The catch proved to be the S–4. Eadie made examination of the S–4, sounding with a hammer, and reported life in the torpedo room. On reaching the limiting time on bottom, he was brought to the surface and work proceeded on the information he gave.

2. Carr was diver next selected to hook air hose to the S–4 salvage air lines. Carr succeeded in doing this; time on bottom 1 hour and 15 minutes, or 15 minutes longer than the period I had decided was the safe limit, due to temperature as well as depth.

3. By this time darkness had set in, a heavy sea running, wind force 7–8 Bufort scale.

4. Michels was the choice among the remaining divers to attempt hooking air hose to S–4 compartments for breathing purpose.

5. Diving conditions were now very bad and would have been discontinued except for the reason that life was involved. Michels having much experience as a deep-water diver, it was decided to take this chance to get air on the S–4 compartments before the wind and sea forced the Falcon from her moorings.

6. Michels went down, taking a water light and air hose, tools, etc., for making the connection. The usual telephone communication was carried on and Michels was apparently making progress. When about three-fourths hour on bottom Michels reported that he was badly fouled.

The telephone tender could not understand him clearly. Taking the phone I was able to judge from the apparent difficulty he was having to talk over the phone that his condition of foul was serious, and advised him that Eadie would be sent down to clear him. (There was a relief or rescue diver dressed and ready, but all things considered, Eadie was asked to make his second dive within a period of five hours and readily consented.)

7. When Eadie was dressed, telephone trouble developed, delaying his descent, so that Michels was on the bottom about one and one-half hours before Eadie reached him. Eadie was given a diver's lamp, cutting plier, hammer, and large wire cutter.

8. Eadie found Michels's life line and hose was foul of broken part of S–4 starboard side where rammed by the Paulding and also on starboard side by parts of Paulding's plating torn off by the collision, also tangled with the air hose he had taken down, and so badly tangled that he was lying down and could not rise. Eadie first cleared Michels so he could stand and set about to clear his hose.

9. Eadie cleared one side, but could not find where the hose passed in and around some twisted and bent metal, presumably a part of the Paulding's plating. He next searched for most likely place to attempt to cut away this metal, and asked that a large hacksaw be sent down to him. Hacksaw was sent down on his air line and phone cable. Working with saw and hammer Eadie was able to cut away a piece of metal after having alternately sawed and hammered steadily for about 40 minutes. Upon cutting away the metal, Eadie was then able to trace Michels's air hose and complete clearing him.

Eadie's total time on bottom to clear Michels, 1 hour 45 minutes.

Michels's total time on bottom, 3 hours 20 minutes.

Temperature of water, 34° F.

Depth, 102 feet; sea, heavy.

10. I have had much experience with deep-water diving and consider Eadie's work in this case worthy of the highest praise. His skill and judgment were insurpassable. His courage and fortitude were heroic. A man not possessing these qualities would have failed. Eadie not only saved Michels's life but exposed himself to personal danger much above the call of duty and devotion to service.

11. I have the honor to recommend Thomas Eadie, chief gunner's mate, for a medal of honor in accordance with the reference.

1. Forwarded, approval strongly recommended.

2. I was on board Falcon at the time of this event and am fully cognizant of all the circumstances. In addition, I already know Eadie from his excellent work, morale, and judgment during the salvage of the S–51.

3. Eadie's conduct on this occasion deserves all the praise and every credit that may be given to a real man who deliberately, knowingly, and willfully took his own life in his hands to respond to the desperate need of a companion diver under wholly adverse diving conditions. What is more, by his cool, calculating, and unhurried work he succeeded in his tremendous task.

4. There is no doubt in my mind that Eadie's deed in saving Michels entirely fulfills the law's requirement of "extraordinary heroism in the line of his profession."

1. The commanding officer desires to call attention to the heroic conduct of William J. Carr, C. B. M. (PA), U. S. N.

2. When the U. S. S. Falcon arrived at scene of wreck of the U. S. S. S–4 a heavy sea was running, wind force 7 to 8 Buford scale, temperature of air 25° F. Due to the weather conditions the Falcon was unable to plant moorings and anchored near life rings which had been planted over the U. S. S. S–4, approximate position by the U. S. S. Wandank. The U. S. S. S–4 was found by dragging grapnels. The Falcon then anchoring well to windward of grapnel catch, paying out chain and dropped back to bring the grapnel catch on the quarter. The U. S. S. Lark and U. S. S. Mallard were anchored on port and starboard quarter of the Falcon and lines run to them. This gave a very slack moor, dangerous for diving on a wreck job in deep water, but with the probability of life involved, divers were asked to go down. Eadie, Carr, and Michels were the best divers on the Falcon. Eadie was first selected and went down grapnel line, examined the S–4, found that there was life in the torpedo room, and secured descending line. Carr was next diver selected to hook air hose to the S–4's main ballast tanks and succeeded in doing this.

3. Carr is an old and experienced diver and well realized the condition under which the dive was made. I feel that he freely exposed himself to danger beyond the call of duty and devotion to service, and in recognition thereof I recommend he be awarded the Navy Cross.

F. H. BRUMBY.

I venture to state that every Member join in the admiral's praise and commendation of the services rendered by these men.

There remains now but one thing, and that is to bring the S–4 to the surface in order to remove all of the bodies and to examine the hull and conditions, the only and mute source of information. As I have said before, a body of 800 tons, with perhaps additional 200 or 300 tons of water, can not be lifted outright from the bottom of the ocean. The only known way at this time is the process employed in the raising of the S–51. Large pontoons are filled with water, sent to the bottom, and secured with chains to the hull of the vessel. When sufficient pontoons have been so secured the water is released from each pontoon by attaching an air line to it and forcing compressed air, which releases the water. The pontoon is then made air-tight, and when sufficient pontoons are so prepared and there is sufficient buoyancy the vessel is lifted to the surface.

This work is exceedingly slow and tedious; most of it must be carried on under water, and naturally will take considerable time.

It took 65 diving days to lift the S–51. She was in 30 feet more depth of water than is the S–4. So one can easily figure how long it will take by working night and day to get the S–4 floating. When we speak of days, we speak of diving days. It must be remembered that they can not work when the water is choppy or weather conditions make diving impossible. Yesterday the water was so cold that diving was impossible—not that it was too cold for diver's comfort, but the moisture in the air froze in the air line. The tube is made in sections and the connections of the tube are such that inside one tube there is a smaller tube, over which the two ends meet. As the air enters one tube, it naturally enters the smaller surface and when it gets to the next section which is larger the air expands, and moisture is created at this point, and that moisture freezes. The minute it freezes the tube is stopped up and the diver receives no air. You can not keep a man under water unless you pump air to him. So that in that way the temperature of the water interferes with the diver, because it is humanly impossible to get air down to the diver if the air-supply line is choked with ice.

I found the morale of the men, the crews of the other submarines, excellent. They understand that this is one of those unavoidable disasters that come to men who are engaged in that perilous work.

I have stood on the floor of this House and I have criticized the Navy very often. I have criticized it because of its aviation policy, and in a good many other instances; but after observing those men on the ship, commencing with Admiral F. H. Brumby and Capt. E. J. King and Capt. Henry Hartley, and Chief Gunner Tiffals and Divers Fred G. Michaels, Thomas Eadie, William J. Carr, and all the men who are on the job, and working night and day, it seems to me that the least we can do is to admit publicly that they are doing everything that is humanly possible, and give them encouragement to continue this work under such trying and difficult conditions. [Applause.]

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. So far as giving them more encouragement is concerned, I received a telephone message at my house the other day from Mrs. Jones, the widow of the lieutenant commander who commanded the S–4. She told me she had four children and that all she possessed in this world was $45 a month insurance from her husband's insurance. She asked me to see whether there was not some way by which some legislation could be passed giving her relief and for the support of herself and her children.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I believe that at the proper time we ought to give consideration not only to the question of insurance for the men and officers who are in the submarine service, but we ought to grant additional compensation—not one dollar a dive, but additional pay for submarine service similar to that given for those in the flying service.

And another thing I want to say in this connection concerning the divers. These men not only put their heart and soul in their work but risk their lives every time they go down on an operation such as they are working now. Yet the Government, and that means us, for Congress has the power to fix compensation, allows them extra pay of only $1.20 an hour when they are under water. To give you an idea of the cost of divers when a private firm was asked for divers in the salvaging of the S–51 the estimate of cost was $1,300 a day for four divers, the Government furnishing all the necessary surface equipment.

Permit me to say that it is much easier to operate a submarine by long distance sitting in a warm, comfortable office than it is from the conning tower of the boat itself. It is easy to criticise and say what should be done not knowing actual conditions. Let us not try to discover from the House Office Building mechanical devices for raising vessels from the bottom of the sea. With all due deference, I do not believe that the solution will come from that source. What we can do and what we should do is to equip the Navy with the best available and last word in submarines. We should also see to it that life on board of these submarines is made as pleasant as conditions will permit. For many years to come there will be danger in submarine navigation. We have accidents on the surface of the water; we have train and automobile collisions, and unfortunate accidents are bound to happen. Naturally it grips the heart to think of men trapped in a compartment of a boat 100 feet under the water in communication with the world and yet unable to be helped. Yet we hear often of men trapped in mines, men working in excavations who are likewise trapped under conditions that make it impossible to be rescued in time to save life. It must also be remembered that when a vessel sinks in deep water all hope of rescue or salvage is out of the question. So that all that we can do is to take every possible precaution by providing equipment, training, and caring of personnel to minimize inevitable and unavoidable accidents that are bound to happen.

Living conditions on the submarine are not exactly comparable to the Ritz-Carlton or to the Mayflower Hotel. I believe that both officers and crew should receive additional pay such as we are now allowing for flying service. Quarters for the officers and men should be provided when the submarines are at their base. Insurance should be provided by the Government for the dependents of men who lose their life in line of duty.

Now, let the House of Representatives send word down to Provincetown that we have confidence and faith in these men who are working night and day, and we know they are doing everything which is humanly possible under the circumstances. [Applause.]

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I wish to join with the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] in commenting on this tragedy and in confirming, to a considerable extent, what he has said. He has been on the scene and has given us a splendid account of the situation. But I wish to treat the matter from a somewhat different angle. Three days after the sinking of the S–4, with her crew of 43 officers and men, I reached my home on the cape, only some 60 miles distant from the scene of the accident, and since it had happened in the waters of my own district I felt it my duty to go to Provincetown, alike as a Representative in Congress and as one of the public, deeply affected by the calamity and anxious for the rescue of the six men known to be still alive in the submarine. I want to say here that the Navy was presumably doing its best, but, assuming that this was so, the fact remains that their best was not good enough, and the country has a right to demand something better in the future, to demand that adequate plans and preparations be made to prevent the recurrence of such a national calamity. That such adequate plans and preparations were not in existence is now, I think, an established fact and, lacking them, failure to save the lives of the imprisoned men and to raise the sunken craft within a reasonable time was a foregone conclusion. An element of sentiment must necessarily enter into a happening of this nature, and it should. Accordingly I want the Members of this House to know that there on the end of Cape Cod, the tip of my district, the men who lost their lives in the S–4 did not go unwept and unsung. On Christmas night the church people held religious services at the water's edge and members of the local Masonic lodge held a special service directly over the sunken craft. I feel that the people of that locality should be thanked for what they did, as they were expressing, audibly, the feelings held throughout the whole Nation.

Perhaps my arrival at Provincetown was in a way at an inopportune time. I know that the weather had been rough on Sunday and Monday—so rough that the whole fleet of rescue ships had left the submarine and put into the shelter of the harbor, an act which may have been necessary but which brought local criticism, such as the remark which I heard, "Could at least one ship not have stayed out if merely as an escort to the boys down there, even though they could do nothing?" This was a mere matter of sentiment, it is true, but the men of Provincetown were deeply affected, and naturally.

As I say, my visit was unfortunate in one sense, since I arrived on a day when the sea was calm; and nothing was being done. I went, first, to the town offices, where every accommodation had been furnished for the many newspaper representatives who were there, frequently making heroic sacrifices in order to try and secure and give the Nation the news of the disaster. I found all of them deeply exercised, because on that day they could get almost no news. There seemed to be a strange inactivity, except for small boats, and after trying nearly all day without avail to discover what was going on and why grappling irons were being used it became known through one of their number, who had formerly been in the Navy, decoding a wigwagged message, that the S–4 had been lost. It was not found until 5.17 that afternoon. On Sunday a diver had gone down and attached a marker buoy. The intervening storm had caused this to break loose and thus all of Wednesday, when the sea was practically calm and a large fleet of vessels was on the spot, was wasted in an effort to locate the lost submarine. And this on a day when salvaging operations could have been carried on under most favorable conditions! It is difficult to understand why greater care had not been exercised in placing the marker and taking ranges. This seems to me to be a matter for pertinent criticism, and surely it could have been prevented if proper methods had been used. America produced the first practical submarine, but it has been left for another nation not only to make use of the submersible as an effective weapon of war but to improve and develop the reasonable safeguards which should, beyond question, surround a type of craft the operation of which is extra hazardous. The statement has been made—and I believe is authentic—that if such an accident had happened in the German Navy the ship could have been rescued within 24 hours and the lives within her have been saved, simply because Germany is fully prepared against such an emergency. They have plans all worked out and practiced in advance for dealing with it, and among them, I am informed, is a regulation that the first diver to go down and locate the sunken craft marks her position not with one buoy but with three, one of red, one white, and one green, securely attached to the bow, amidships, and stern. If such a method had been followed by our Navy, is it likely that all three would have broken away? I think not; and priceless hours would not have been wasted. This criticism is in no sense one of the divers—for whose courage and ability I have the most boundless admiration—but it is one of policy. I may say the same of Admiral Brumby. He is an able officer and to be commended in that he has not remained in his cabin and directed the work therefrom, but has been on deck in all kinds of weather personally aiding and supervising. Still I must regret that at times he was so curt in his answers to those making inquiries of him.

The newspaper men and others reported this fact to me, and it has been the subject of newspaper comment. Under these circumstances I did not feel like seeking an interview with him. Mr. McGinley, of Pennsylvania, whose son was locked in the sunken vessel, also expressed his concern over his failure to obtain reasonable information, although he bore it stoically, saying "If I could only go home with the body of my boy I would be satisfied." But he was merely told that the raising of the vessel might be put off until spring. This, too, is a matter of sentiment largely, but it has its part in such a calamity.

I had no wish to criticize the Navy, but when things of this nature came to my attention I felt that I had a right to express myself. I felt obligated if possible to help the newspaper men and through them all of the country to get the truth as to what was being done.

I also felt justified in making certain other general criticisms pertinent to the tragedy, the first being, "Where was the tender when the submarine was engaged in underwater evolutions? Why was it not present to warn craft away from the path of the submarine?" I was told by a captain, who had been attached to a life-saving station in that vicinity for 30 years and who had seen submarines operating on that measured mile for 10 years, that such was the custom. He said, "I have watched them for 10 years, and there has always been a tender present to warn vessels off the course. I have since learned that this has indeed been the custom, although it was not a matter of naval regulations. But surely it should be in the future, and should have been in the past.

Many newspapers have printed editorials bearing on this subject, as well as the loss of the S–4 after she had been located and the unwillingness of the officials to give out the story, and I believe that such criticisms are valid. The latter one may, of course, be answered by a statement that the Navy hoped every minute to find the lost vessel and did not wish to add to the terrible worry of the Nation; but does it not rather seem predicated on a desire to cover up a grave mistake by what, as it proved, were futile and unfortunate methods, since the fact was certain to become known?

One editorial, from the Boston Herald of December 27, I should like to incorporate in these remarks, and I offer the following:

[From the Boston Herald, Tuesday, December 27, 1927]

CRITICISM OF THE NAVY

Years ago when Sir William Howard Russell summed up his conclusions as to the results of his famous mission to the Crimea he offered a general observation to the effect that an incursion of outsiders often proved salutary in the case of such highly organized and consciously superior establishments as the British Army. That was a mild statement, coming from the man whose ability to see straight and to write straight had made all England uneasy over conditions in the peninsula, and finally had encompassed the defeat of a British ministry. Russell told the truth; the truth stung and produced resentment, but in the end the truth prevailed.

We are reminded of that incident by the tone assumed by some officials in their replies to the criticisms of the salvaging operations at Provincetown. Many of these criticisms have been hysterical, unjust, silly, as we have said before on this page. But not all of them. The public is uneasy over the story of the sinking of the S–4, with the loss of more than two score of lives. The public conceives that it has some rights in the case, the right to know all the facts and the right to obtain full and fair answers to all fair questions. There are naval officers who denounce such questions as an imposition, an unjustified inquisition. The Secretary of the Navy himself has adopted a somewhat querulous tone in the presence of inquirers. Certain defenders of the Navy have talked as though Members of Congress, citizens of the Republic, relatives of the lost men, have no rights in such a situation, that their duty is to keep out of the way and gratefully accept whatever information may be doled out to them.

We have three remarks to offer on the present situation:

1. The public rightly insists on its right to information. The money spent on armament comes from the taxpayers of the Nation. The lives lost in peace time no less than in war time come from the citizenship of the Nation. The Navy Department and the whole naval service are the instrumentalities to which the Nation entrusts the doing of certain necessary things. When all is said and done the men in office in Washington and the men in uniform scattered about the country have one purpose at heart, and there is no more justice in the denouncing of the members of a lawmaking and money-voting body as outsiders and fools whose sole interest is in playing politics than there is in the denouncing of the officers of the Navy and the members of the Navy Department as anxious only to protect their own close corporation and to clear the service from blame. It will be a distinct gain when that fact is recognized. A shining illustration of what sometimes occurs even in war time is the story of the exposé of Northcliffe and the Times of the fact that British soldiers were trying to fight in France with the wrong kind of shell, and he was begged to withhold that story from the public lest he impair the patriotism of the British people.

2. The Navy might well learn something of the arts of publicity. There would be less unrest to-day and far less criticism had the officers at Provincetown done all within their power to provide the people with exact and full information about a calamity which had gripped the emotions of the whole Nation. The public is very prone to surmise indifference and incompetence when in peace time and under conditions requiring no secrecy information is altogether withheld or grudgingly bestowed.

3. There is just one way to convince the public that the naval officers, of "training perhaps unparalleled in any other profession," and masters of "the technical affairs and internal management" of their department—to paraphrase the language of a reserve officer—that these officers have made no mistakes, have done everything within their power to save the lives of the men in the sunken submarine, and in general that the Navy is as quick to adopt new methods, and as ready to go by the shortest route to any desired goal, as private enterprise is said to be. There is a widespread belief that this is not the case. Red tape? There are a good many men outside the service whose opinions are entitled to respect who think that red tape in emergencies hinders and hampers far too much the energies of brave and eager workers. The bureaucratic mind is a thing by no means unknown in Washington. We are proud of our Army and Navy engineers, but all the engineering ability of the country is not in the service, and we have heard many times that outsiders are not always made welcome when they have reforms to advocate or improvements to suggest.

We may remind the Navy that not all its critics have been civilians of late. We may note in passing that nobody seems to be more touchy over an intimation of fallibility than have been many able men in uniform of late. The naval and the departmental methods may be all right. We hope they are. But it now is the job of the Navy and the department to convince the public of the fact, if it is a fact. An investigation conducted exclusively from within is hardly likely to allay the uneasiness of the earnest multitude who seriously consider the story which has come through from Cape Cod. If Congress shall decide that there shall be another kind of investigation, with expert engineers and the best ability the Nation can provide, but out of uniform, it will be well for the naval authorities to accept the decision in good spirit, to cooperate in every way in the process of the examination. That way probably lies the restoration of the prestige of the Naval Establishment. We impute no sinister motives to anybody. But there are doubts to satisfy, and if in the quest of information the way to important reform or improvement shall be shown, so much the better for the service and for the Nation.

I, for one, do not at the present time wish to offer any resolution for an investigation of this tragedy. Nevertheless, I think that the country is demanding that a searching investigation be made before the matter is regarded as closed, and this is evidenced by the scores of letters which I have personally received from many parts of the United States, the writers of which were not all merely distressed and incensed citizens by any means. Many have come from reputable inventors, civil engineers, and former members of the Navy itself. Personally, I should prefer to wait until the naval board of inquiry now sitting on the accident had made its report.

I shall not take the time of the House fully to present the criticisms and countless suggestions which have come to me as a result of this tragedy. As a result of the seeming inactivity and the dreadful waiting for news during those early days it was inevitable that there should be both from all quarters. Nor do I wish to add anything to such criticisms as I have to-day made, many of them inspired by the feeling which I found rife at Provincetown, except to say that I can not feel that, as stated by the Secretary of the Navy—submarines are not built merely to be rescued, but are strictly for military purposes, and so must carry nothing which might interfere with their use in time of war.

Rather I should say that they should be equipped with every possible safeguard commensurate with the limited space in them, even if some, or all, of these had to be removed in war time, when every sailor and soldier is called upon to gamble with his life. Certainly I am not a mechanical engineer, and perhaps my criticisms were—as was suggested by the department—those of one inexpert in the work of salvaging, but I do know that engineers have developed plans whereby life on sunken submersibles can be saved and the ship herself raised within reasonable time, and it is inconceivable to me that our Navy has tested all of them and found them all worthless or impractical. Certainly the telephone buoy is used in foreign submarines. Then there is the matter of grappling rings, as employed on German U-boats. If I have been correctly informed, Lieutenant Commander Ellsberg, who was in charge of raising the S–51 and was for a time working on the S–4, having been reenlisted as a reserve officer, stated in a public illustrated lecture that if the ship which was sunk two years ago had been so equipped, much time and most dangerous labor in tunneling under her in order to place chains to be attached to the pontoons would have been saved. He even made the statement, I believe, that such rings could and should be attached to all submarines in the future. Why have they not been? Surely the doing so offers no insurmountable mechanical difficulties, since bands therefrom could go to the keel. Nor would they entail great expense, and they might be removed in time of war if they should impede the speed of the ship.

Finally there is the question as to why we have no salvaging ship especially designed to meet such emergencies as the sinking of the S–4, similar to the German tender Vulcan, which is a horse-shoe shaped craft especially built for that purpose and fitted with lifting devices and pontoons. Perhaps in answer to these inquiries the Navy Department may say that they have not been provided because of lack of necessary appropriations and that every dollar allowed it is allocated and needed for other purposes. They may say that the Bureau of the Budget and Congress are to blame. In part this may perhaps be a fact, yet if, after the sinking of the S–51, the Navy Department had asked the Congress for a special appropriation to test out and apply safety and life-saving devices to submarines and provide a rescuing ship I am inclined to believe that the money would have been gladly appropriated and perhaps the S–4 would not still be 100 feet under the waters off Provincetown and some, at least, of the lives of her crew would have been saved.

This is not time for mere recriminations or even explanations. The Navy should act, Congress should act, immediately, to see to it that every possible safeguard is provided to prevent a recurrence of this horrible event. If submarines can not be made intrinsically safe, as is probably the case, let us assure for them comparative safety by providing every conceivable safety devices which can be applied for use in times of peace, both for their protection and swift salvaging in case of accident. If necessary, let us, too, build one or more ships similar to the Vulcan, fully equipped for the work of rescue and have them available in the general vicinity of submarine operations. Let us see that submarines, when submerged, are properly guarded from above and that all testing grounds are marked on marine charts. The cost might be considerable but what is that compared with the safety of costly submarines and the lives of American sailors, which will never be valued in mere money?

Mr. Speaker, I certainly do not wish to seem to be condemning the Navy, of which we have every right to be proud. Had I been on board a submarine with the gentleman from New York I have no doubt but that I should have been impressed, as he was, with the fact that every possible effort was made, under the existing conditions. Nevertheless I feel that nothing is so good that it can not be made better and that the Navy should be the first to admit that improvements might and should be made. If the conditions which existed when the S–4 went down can not be changed, Heaven help us! But I believe that they can and will be in the future. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from New York whether he will print his remarks in to-day's RECORD?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I came into the Chamber after the gentleman had commenced his remarks, and I would like to take advantage of this occasion to say that I will make some observations to-morrow when we have up for consideration the appropriation bill which our committee has just reported. I will not hesitate to criticize the Navy, but I would like it understood that nobody is criticizing the devoted men who are endeavoring to remedy the errors already made. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts and the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask permission to address the House for one minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to address the House for one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, will the Chair inform me whether there is upon the Speaker's table a communication from the President of the United States?

The SPEAKER. There is.

Mr. BUTLER. May we have that communication read at this time?

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will read the communication from the President.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the Congress of the United States:

I transmit herewith a letter from the Secretary of the Navy recommending that the Congress be requested to authorize the appointment of a commission of experts for the purpose of considering the development of safety devices for our submarines, such commission to be empowered to call witnesses and to pay their expenses and also to make such inquiry and investigation into the S–4 disaster as may be desirable.

I recommend to Congress the passage of a joint resolution authorizing the appointment of such a commission of experts and that the sum of $20,000 be made available for the purposes stated.

CALVIN COOLIDGE.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 4, 1928.

The SPEAKER. Referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs and ordered printed.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I have here the official resolution, following the request of the President of the United States, and I ask unanimous consent that this resolution may be read and then referred to the proper committee.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will read the resolution for the information of the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution providing for a commission to investigate and report upon the facts connected with the sinking of the submarine S–4 and upon methods and appliances for the protection of submarines

Resolved, etc., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized and requested to appoint a commission which shall be composed of five members, three of whom shall be selected from civil life and two shall be retired officers of the Navy. Vacancies occurring in the membership of the commission shall be filled in the same manner as provided for original appointments.

SEC. 2. It shall be the duty of the commission to investigate and ascertain the methods and appliances adopted and used by the Navy in the operation of submarines to prevent collisions, to protect the lives of officers and crews, and to salvage the vessel in case of disaster; and to make recommendations wherein these methods and appliances now in use may be changed and improved for the good of the service and the better protection of human life.

SEC. 3. It shall be the further duty of the commission to investigate the full facts of the sinking of the submarine S–4 in collision on December 17, 1927, with the United States Coast Guard destroyer Paulding off the Massachusetts coast, and the rescue and salvage operations carried on by the United States Navy subsequent thereto, to supplement the investigation now being made by a naval court of inquiry.

SEC. 4. To carry out and give effect to the provisions of this resolution the commission hereby created shall have power to issue subpœnas, administer oaths, summon witnesses, require the production of books and papers, and receive testimony taken before any proper officer in any State or Territory of the United States.

SEC. 5. The members of the commission shall select a chairman from among their number; they shall serve without compensation as such, but shall be paid out of the amount appropriated their actual and necessary traveling, hotel, and other expenses incurred in the discharge of their duties by such officer of the Supply Corps of the Navy as the Secretary of the Navy may designate, upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the commission, which approval shall be conclusive upon the General Accounting Office. Nothing herein shall affect the pay or allowances of the commissioners selected from the Navy. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $20,000, to be expended by the commission in accordance with the provisions of this resolution. The President is authorized, upon request of the commission, to designate such personnel of any department or Government establishment, including the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, and Coast Guard, as may be necessary to assist in carrying out the purpose of this resolution.

SEC. 6. The commission shall, as soon as practicable, submit a full report to Congress, by way of the President, giving the results of its investigation and its recommendations. All records of the commission, upon the completion of its duties, shall be deposited with the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. McCLINTIC. I want to ask the chairman of the committee a question, if I may?

Mr. BUTLER. Of course, if I have the floor so that I can answer my friend's question I would be delighted to do so.

Mr. McCLINTIC. It seems to me that no one in this House could possibly object to the provisions contained in that resolution and inasmuch as some proceedings have already been started, does not the gentleman think it would be a good idea to ask unanimous consent to pass that resolution?

Mr. BUTLER. No; it should go to the Rules Committee for further amendment and for such amendments as the House may see fit to make to it. However, I will ask the Committee on Rules to pass upon this resolution at its very earliest opportunity.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, may I make an inquiry? Does this resolution go to the Rules Committee?

Mr. BUTLER. I thought it did, sir, or I would not have introduced it.

Mr. SNELL. It is in the nature of an investigation, and while it is more comprehensive than the average resolution of that character, I think it ought to go to the Rules Committee.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. The resolution provides for the creation of a commission outside of Congress itself.

Mr. SNELL. I admit the resolution goes much further than the ordinary resolution providing for a commission of investigation.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Of course, the ordinary resolution authorizing an investigation by a committee of Congress, whether a standing committee or a special committee created for the purpose, necessarily goes to the Committee on Rules; but when it is to create a commission outside of Congress itself, while I have no objection to its reference——

Mr. BUTLER. I thought that would be the shortest and quickest route for it to take, I will say to my friend from Tennessee.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. But I want to offer this suggestion, if I may. I do not know who has the floor.

Mr. SNELL. This is all by unanimous consent.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. There was something said in the message of the President about a letter from the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. BUTLER. Yes; I have it here.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I was wondering if it would not be of interest to the House to have that letter read.

Mr. BUTLER. I intended next to ask the permission of the House to have the letter read.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BUTLER. Oh, I will be delighted, if I have the floor.

Mr. BLANTON. This resolution was drawn by the Navy Department and sent to and approved by the President, and then handed to the gentleman for introduction.

Mr. BUTLER. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. And the gentleman knows that unless there is a provision placed in the resolution which would cause the commission to go out of existence within one year or two years, the commission may be alive for the next 100 years. Does the gentleman think it wise to not provide against that?

Mr. BUTLER. I agree with the gentleman, and I am against commissions of all kinds. I would suggest that the Committee on Rules amend the proposed resolution to provide that the commission shall go out of existence as soon as it can make a report and then fix a time within which they must report.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I think that if the resolution is referred to the Committee on Rules, the House can rely upon that committee reporting the resolution very promptly and making such additions or amendments of the resolution as may be deemed necessary.

Mr. SNELL. And we will consult the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I had assumed that the proper place for this resolution was the Committee on Rules, and therefore I made my request that that committee should act promptly.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is in some doubt, under all the circumstances, as to whether this resolution should go to the Committee on Rules or the Committee on Naval Affairs, but will give the question some consideration to-day before referring it.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Would it be in order to ask unanimous consent that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Rules?

The SPEAKER. That is within the jurisdiction of the Chair.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker, in the meantime may not the letter of the Secretary of the Navy be read?

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will read the letter of the Secretary of the Navy.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

JANUARY 4, 1928.

The PRESIDENT,
The White House.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: It is desirable that a commission of experts be assembled to consider the development of safety devices for our submarines, and that such commission be empowered to call witnesses and to pay their expenses. In the opinion of such a board it may be desirable to secure expert testimony from those experts who developed submarines for other nations as well as our own. Such a commission appointed without congressional authority might perform valuable service in the consideration of plans already submitted and in the analysis of the work of the Navy Department in the development of the submarine, but could not undertake a more comprehensive investigation without congressional authority. It is desirable also that such a commission be empowered to make such inquiry into the S–4 disaster as they may deem necessary to supplement investigation by the naval court of inquiry. For these reasons it is desirable that congressional authority be obtained for the appointment of such a commission of experts and that a small appropriation be made available for their necessary expenditures.

Sincerely yours,

CURTIS D. WILBUR.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] be allowed to proceed for 25 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut?

There was no objection.

NICARAGUA

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, the significance of the situation in Nicaragua, as I see it, is that a stupid and inept administration has gotten us into a difficult situation and now we are having to fight our way out of it. We have been embarked upon a foolish and dangerous venture, and now we must make our way out of it the best we can if we can do so consistent with national honor and safety.

WE ARE AT WAR IN NICARAGUA

There is war in Nicaragua. It is not the war of the American people; it is the war of those whom it is our ill-fortune to have in charge of the American Government. It is a war which they entered upon without the consent of the real rulers of this country.

That it is war no one can in sincerity question. We read this morning that 1,000 American marines are being embarked for service in Nicaragua; that already there are 1,400 there, and that naval vessels are being rushed to Nicaraguan waters. It is stated that the work of garrisoning the ports will be taken over by the blue jackets so as to leave the total of 2,400 marines free for fighting. And all this after 12 months of the Coolidge brand of "pacification."

I clipped from a paper this morning a dispatch from San Salvador:

A memorial directed against the "hostilities" by American marines in Nicaragua was presented to Col. Charles A. Lindbergh to-day by a group of private citizens of Nicaragua who are living in San Salvador.

The memorial greeted Colonel Lindbergh as a flying ambassador and representative of the true spirit of the United States, as a hero of the air as well as a messenger of peace. It requested the colonel to use his good offices so "that the American marines may cease their hostilities in Nicaragua," as this would help to make "friendship prevail instead of distrust."

The memorial further referred to various declarations of President Coolidge concerning respect for right and freedom, and stated that the President's words were not evident in the Nicaraguan situation.

PEACE IN THE AIR, DEATH IN THE JUNGLE

Our ambassador of peace wings his way through the air and our emissaries of death struggle in the jungles of Nicaragua, fighting in a cause not an American cause. Of course, I do not blame the marines who are there nor the officers who are in command. They are but performing their work of soldiers, doing what they are commanded to do. I place the responsibility squarely where it belongs, upon the administration which sent them there. The administration is responsible for the death of every American marine who may fall, and for the sacrifice of American honor and of principle which is involved in the fact that they are in Nicaragua. [Applause.]

The memorial presented to Lindbergh recites truly that he is representative of the true spirit of the United States as a messenger of peace. If it were left to the people they would recall the marines, instead of sending recruits to help them in the distasteful task which they have been sent to perform. Had the people been consulted, no marine would have been sent upon the soil of Nicaragua. It is the administration's war; it is not the people's war. The people have not been consulted. They want peace; they desire to respect the rights of our sister Republic. They would rather serve Nicaragua than to oppress her.

The administration has its purposes to accomplish. I dare to say here that those purposes are not American and not consistent with the ideals and institutions of America. It is the administration's war. A year ago we were told that there were about 5,000 of our armed forces in Nicaragua. That number included, of course, blue jackets from the Navy—how many marines I do not know. A large number have been there ever since.

A BLOODY BUSINESS

I read this dispatch, clipped from a newspaper dated December 14 last:

UNITED STATES HAVING HARD JOB IN TRYING TO QUELL NICARAGUAN TROUBLE

WASHINGTON, December 4.—Pacification of Nicaragua is proving about the hardest job the United States marines have ever tackled. Despite the optimistic statements issued from time to time by State and Navy Department officials the northern half of the Central American Republic is still, after a seven-month campaign, seething with insurgency and general disorder.

To date the pacification has cost the lives of more than 800 Nicaraguans, according to figures compiled to-day from official reports, while several hundred others have been seriously wounded in clashes with the American interventionists and native guards. In the last month there have been at least 86 known deaths among the natives.

Based on announcements by the marine command in Managua and by officials here, minimum casualty figures show 714 Nicaraguans to have been slain, 152 killed or wounded, and 220 wounded in the period from May 15 to December 11. At the same time 7 marines and 6 native guardsmen have been killed and 2 marines wounded.

Recorded casualties among the Nicaraguans (who have been termed bandits by the State Department) are not complete. Upon several occasions after skirmishes with the insurgent natives the marine command has declared that the extent of the casualties among the "bandits" could not be determined. Nor do these figures include the number of Nicaraguans who, lacking medical attention, have died from their wounds.

Early in October the casualty figures showed that upward of 540 Nicaraguans had been killed. On November 15 the toll was 628 killed, 187 killed or wounded, and 152 wounded. Since then the following clashes between natives and marines have taken place:

November 21: Near Telepaneca, 3 Nicaraguans killed.

November 23: Somoto, 4 Nicaraguans killed; large number wounded; 1 marine wounded.

November 25: Laguna, 4 Nicaraguans killed; 7 wounded.

November 26: Elchipote, 37 Nicaraguans killed; unknown number wounded. (Originally 4 natives were reported to have fallen in this engagement, but that figure was officially corrected by Col. L. M. Gulick, marine commander.)

December 5: Between Jicardo and San Fernando, number of Nicaraguan casualties unknown; 2 native guardsmen killed.

December 9: Antigua, 20 Nicaraguans killed; 20 wounded.

December 10: El Portero, 5 Nicaraguans killed; several wounded.

December 10: Somoto, 3 Nicaraguans killed; 3 wounded.

December 11: Santa Rosa, — Nicaraguans killed; several wounded.

December 11: Telepaneca, 8 Nicaraguans killed; several wounded.

Included among the recent casualties were two marine airmen, Second Lieut. E. A. Thomas and Sergt. Frank Dowdell, who were captured by a band of Nicaraguans after their plane had crashed into a mountain near Ocotal early in October. The Navy Department reported that they were killed by their captors.

Recently the Marine Corps announced that the "bandit extermination" program would be prosecuted with increased vigor at the end of the rainy season late this month. The aviators now in Nicaragua have been reenforced and have been supplied with new equipment for the avowed purpose of conducting an intensive bombing campaign as soon as dry weather arrives.

Under the marine rule of the Central American country, according to reports received in Washington, all persons traveling through northern Nicaragua must register with the marine command in Managua, so that the airmen will have information about their routes and itineraries and not drop bombs on them. This is considered here to presage a ruthless drive against all "bandits" and insurgents in the northern Provinces.

Think of it; we have killed some 800 to 1,000 Nicaraguans and probably wounded 2,000 additional. We have killed and wounded these men who were not "bandits" but were fighting for their country and the right to govern themselves.

All these casualties and all this bloodshed occurred before the recent battle when a number of marines lost their lives and probably some hundreds more of Nicaraguans were killed and wounded. Can anybody honestly deny that war is being carried on in Nicaragua?

AN UNCONSTITUTIONAL WAR

Technically our country is not at war. From a legal standpoint the United States has not entered a war. There is only one way by which we may legally enter into a war, and that is by a declaration of Congress. The Constitution gives to Congress the exclusive power of declaring war.

It is true that the President is Commander in Chief of our Army and Navy, but it was never within the minds of those who wrote the Constitution giving him these powers that he might command the Army and Navy as his fancy might dictate. It was intended that the President's function as commander of the Army and Navy should be under the direction and control of the Congress of the United States through its power to declare war. If the President can send our marines to wage war in Nicaragua the President can send our Navy to England and bombard London to-morrow.

It may be that Congress has not said to the President you shall not use our armed forces in the invasion of a country with which we are at peace. You shall submit such matters to Congress for its decision as the Constitution contemplates. Nevertheless the failure of Congress to exercise its power has in no sense diminished the right to do so. We have the power to remedy the situation that exists in Nicaragua by a resolution commanding the President not to pursue the course which he is following. [Applause.] A resolution which would restrain him from usurping the functions of a military dictator.

VIOLATES SPIRIT OF CONSTITUTION

The extreme seriousness of this situation lies in the fact that the President is deliberately violating the spirit of the Constitution by carrying on a war without the consent of Congress. I imagine that if you should ask those who compose the group about him, to whom he looks for support and advice, they would assert that they compose the cult of original "constitutional worshipers." My observation of such gentlemen is that they love the Constitution when it protects them in their special privileges and interests, but they defy its spirit when it stands between them and what they want to do. They love the Constitution when it serves them; they despise it when it protects the liberties of the people.

As one who has regard for the welfare and happiness of his fellow creatures from the standpoint of the Nicaraguans themselves, of course I deplore what has been done. I sympathize with them. They are under the heel of a foreign oppressor. It fills me with shame to admit this of my country. My comfort is that it is not the people who have done this wrong; it is an administration which misrepresents the people.

The Nicaraguans have no liberties, they have no self-government, they have none of the cherished things for which our fathers died. Naturally we feel for them, as we would feel for any people fighting for liberty. Anyone who really believes in Americanism and that governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed must grieve for the Nicaraguans who are laying down their lives for these principles.

But, after all, Nicaragua is a small country, with only a sparse population, and perhaps sometime, in the ultimate end, when American imperialism has worked its will with them, they will be given some of the benefits of the material welfare that belongs to our civilization. When we have at last forced it upon them it may be there will be some compensation for their sufferings and for the loss of their liberties. What concerns me most, however, is not what Nicaragua is losing, not what the Nicaraguans are suffering, but what America is suffering and what America is losing.

AMERICA MUST PAY THE PRICE

Every man must know that America can not exist as an imperialism abroad and a democracy at home. It can not continue as "the land of the free and the home of the brave" with its foreign policy under the dominion of a military autocracy.

We can not hold here at home that governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed and yet in foreign countries ruthlessly deprive the people of their right of self-government. We can not preserve liberty here and practice autocracy abroad. We can not have the free ballot box at home with American marines dictating at the elections of a foreign country. [Applause on the Democratic side.] America can not exist democratic at home and autocratic abroad.

IS AMERICA TO BECOME AN IMPERIALISM?

Mr. Speaker, if we are to give up those principles which we have cherished and held dear, then the people of this country should be consulted about it. The real sovereigns, the real rulers of America, should have some chance to express themselves.

If it be true that the love of liberty is dead—liberty for ourselves and for all others—and that we are to embark upon a policy of imperialism abroad, which can only result in the counterpart of that policy here at home, the issue should be submitted to the American people for their decision. It is not right, it is not fair, for those whom we have placed in office on other issues to commit this country to such a policy.

I want to see my country great, but great in its love of liberty. I want to see my country powerful, but I want it powerful in just and righteous conduct toward our sister nations. I want to see our influence spread, but I no not want it to be spread by the force of arms. I would rather have it spread by the influence of love. I want others to adopt our culture because of its worthiness. I would rather that we should deserve to rule the world without doing so than that we should rule without deserving to do so.

Mr. Speaker, the worst thing about all of this is, that as we strike our sister Republic down the blow comes back and at last we strike ourselves. The most serious consequence of all is the consequences which shall be worked upon the institutions of our country. Are we to have an imperialism in America? Are we to be converted into a nation which shall compete with the nations of the Old World in the exploitation of the weak, the helpless, and the poor? Have we ideals like those of ancient Rome by which we shall claim for ourselves the right of dominion and draw tribute from servile populations of the remote corners of the earth? Is that our ideal? Let me say to you that if it is we will go as Rome went. The Romans could not hold to their own liberties, yet take away the liberties of others. And so they lost their liberties, and so we shall lose ours.

TO WAGE WAR WITHOUT THE CONSENT OF CONGRESS IS USURPATION

Mr. Speaker, the action of the President in making war without the consent of Congress and without the consent of the people of the United States is a violation of the spirit of the Constitution. It is an usurpation which if persisted in will result in ruin to us in the end.

There is little doubt that we would have had war with Mexico a year ago had not public opinion in the United States responded, had it not beat upon the door of the White House and challenged the President and dared him to provoke the war which he openly threatened. He listened to the voice of the people then. God grant that there may come from the people now some such expression of aversion to his policy as will drive the President from the course which he is pursuing in Nicaragua.

This war that is being carried on in Nicaragua is the administration's war, but the treasure that the President is expending in it is the people's money, and the blood that he is causing to be spilled is the blood of American boys. And the consequences which may ensue will fall upon the American people. [Applause.]

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I will.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Of course I am always diverted and edified by the remarks of the gentleman from Alabama, but I would like to ask whether the fact that we are in Nicaragua to-day is not with the consent and sanction and practically at the request of the only government there is in Nicaragua and practically at the joint request of the recently warring factions. Now may I——

Mr. HUDDLESTON. May I answer. The gentleman is putting another question——

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. For the purpose of assisting the Nicaragua Government to restore peaceful and orderly conditions in Nicaragua?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Not if the President is to be believed. He stated in his message to Congress a year ago as the reason why we were in Nicaragua that it was for the protection of American lives and property and to protect the concession for the canal which we may some day decide to construct.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I ask for five additional minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. We are there to protect American lives and property, so the President said. His statement was challenged then and the charge was made that there were no Americans whose lives were being jeopardized in Nicaragua and that no American property was in danger. The matter finally settled itself down to the general belief that the President was merely helping certain American bankers to collect debts for loans which they had made.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. If the gentleman will permit, in reference to what the gentleman from New York said, everybody will recall the government he speaks of in Nicaragua, the Diaz government, was reputed to have been given assurance in advance of Diaz being installed that our Government was going to support him. Diaz is the man asking help in Nicaragua, and we know what sort of a man he is.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. And the President sent his representative to Nicaragua not as a representative of the people, for probably he could not have been elected as a constable by any constituency in the United States. [Applause.] He is said to have made some kind of a trade with Moncada based upon the assurance that Moncada should be the next President of Nicaragua. This is the common report.

So Moncada quit fighting. Benedict Arnold also quit fighting, but the Revolutionaries fought on and won American independence. So far as we know, those who are fighting against us in Nicaragua to-day are fired with just as sincere a love for their country as our ancestors were for ours. It is unspeakably hypocritical and dishonest to call such men "bandits." They are fighting for liberty. Whether we think them right or wrong, we as brave men must respect their sacrifices and the spirit in which they give their lives. [Applause.]

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BEGG] may proceed for 15 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Ohio may proceed for 15 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, it is rather embarrassing to me to sit and listen for half an hour to such an indictment of my own country, particularly when that indictment for its facts is founded on newspaper articles. I am ready to grant to any man that there may be two schools of foreign policy regarding the protection of life and property in foreign countries. There is not any question of doubt in my own mind to which school I belong. Therefore I have chosen to reply in brief to the remarks made by the distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON].

In the first place, the United States has but one principle on foreign policy that any man can claim is at all permanent and fixed. That is the Monroe doctrine. I challenge any man to cite any other principle of the American Government that is permanent in dealing with foreign nations that does not vary with succeeding administrations. Now, the Monroe doctrine, as everyone of you knows, came into existence as the result of the Holy Alliance in the Old World, which was formed in the year 1815 for the sole purpose of arresting, if possible, the spread and growth of Spanish-American republics, and the plan of procedure of the so-called Holy Alliance was to restore the Crown in Spain; and Spain in payment for the restoration was to come to the Americas and stop the establishment of Spanish-American republics and create instead Spanish-American monarchies. By 1823 the Holy Alliance had functioned with her part of the contract and Spain was ready to begin the performance of her part of the bargain, to wit, interfere with the establishment of governments according to the wishes of the several peoples. And every time I read our history I thank God for the fact that Monroe had the courage of his convictions and that there was none of the demagogue in him. In his message to Congress in January he made a great speech, not to Congress, not to America, but to the world at large. Here, in our language, in brief, is what he said:

> Any attempt by any foreign power to interfere with the destiny of any America would be interpreted by the United States as an unfriendly act.

I will ask you gentlemen who are students of history, Was that pronouncement respected by Spain and the rest of the nations? I call your attention to the fact that James Monroe did not come to Congress with that message and ask for another dollar to increase the national defense. He did not ask for the privilege of enlisting another man in the Army or the Navy or the Marine Corps. He merely made his speech, and the Old World heard and respected that pronouncement of the American doctrine, known afterwards as the Monroe doctrine.

Again, I will call your attention—and particularly the attention of my colleague from Alabama—to an incident which happened during the administration of a President of his own political faith, Grover Cleveland. When England undertook to interfere in a minor matter under the pretext that it was vital to her interest, in cold-blooded language President Cleveland issued a restatement of that doctrine to the mistress of the seas; and when President Cleveland spoke he did not have a Navy much more serviceable than a good fleet of fishing smacks, and his Army did not contain 125,000 trained soldiery. And yet Mr. Cleveland said in substance to England, "You are violating the Monroe doctrine, and the peace of the world will be more secure if you stay out of that affair."

Did the greatest naval power in all time respect that restatement of the Monroe doctrine? It goes without saying that she did.

Again, I will ask, Did Cleveland request any increase for naval defense or for the Army defense? Not one nickel. And yet the mistress of the sea respected that restatement of the only downright simon-pure statement of the foreign policy of America that has ever been made.

Then, following Cleveland, what do we have again? Mr. Roosevelt, when the nation that builded the biggest military machine that has ever been assembled by a single power sent a part of her fleet down into Venezuelan waters over a little boundary dispute, what did Mr. Roosevelt do? In our language he gave them a limited time to withdraw their fleet out of those waters. Did Germany respect it? She certainly did. Yet Roosevelt's Army was less than 125,000 men and his Navy was no better than Cleveland's. Yet he commanded the respect of the biggest military machine, I say again, that the world ever saw down to that hour.

I say that Cleveland and Roosevelt, by the restatement of that all-American doctrine, contributed more to the peace of the world, in my humble judgment, than could have been done by any manner of means otherwise.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEGG. Not now; not until I am through with my statement.

Then we come down to this Nicaraguan affair. It is the most glorious opportunity for a man who wants to be careless of his facts and who is not in favor of preserving the national honor of America among the nations of the world to make an inflammatory speech to the uninformed, such as that which we have had from the gentleman from Alabama and others for a number of years. [Applause.]

I said at the outset that there might be two schools of foreign policy. I said I would state the one to which I belong, and I will do it now. So far as I am concerned, I believe it to be the responsibility of the United States to protect my life and my property wherever I may be in all the world [applause] so long as I am obeying the laws of the country in which I happen to reside; and I will say again, that if the national sovereignty does not extend beyond the boundary of the United States, why have a national sovereignty in times of peace?

You damage my property in Ohio. It will not be the Federal Government that will come and punish you. It will be, first, the county sovereignty and if they are unable to punish you, then it will be the State sovereignty, but never in all the history of America has the Federal sovereignty been called upon to protect a single individual's property in a State.

In other words, I believe America's future is dependent upon two things: First, fair treatment of every foreign country with which she deals; and, second, a firm, courageous, and fair foreign policy so that her own citizenship will respect her influence in the affairs of the nations of the world. [Applause.]

Again, Great Britain and Italy asked the United States to protect their nationals in Nicaragua and to protect their property. I will submit to you, and I will submit to my friend from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON], if we were not foursquare up against the proposition of either protecting the lives and property of the nationals of the rest of the world in Nicaragua or of saying to them, "You may protect your own"?

In other words, maintain the Monroe doctrine or disavow it like a man. To have said to the rest of the world, "We will not protect your nationals and you can not," would have made us guilty of murder every time a national had been killed. Those of you who choose to put yourselves in that category are welcome to the assignment, but for me, put me on the side of the American principle that to be a citizen of the United States means you will be protected as to life and property throughout the world as long as you are a law-abiding citizen.

Now, the situation was a revolution between two men who wanted to be President of Nicaragua. Those details have been recited here repeatedly. If they have not, I can insert them. They are chronologically accurate and can be put in if you want them. In the contest between the two men danger threatened. Our nationals appealed to us, the parent country, for protection. We sent the marines, the international police. Is there anything startling about the fact that we sent the marines to Nicaragua? If you will acquaint yourselves with the facts, you will find that the marines have been in Nicaragua the majority of the time since 1895 down to 1924; and that, too, at the request of the government in Nicaragua each and every time. [Applause.] Why were they withdrawn? President Harding got tired of the change in governments by revolution in the Central Americas and thought he could do something to contribute to peace. So he invited those countries to come to Washington to see whether they could not make a treaty of adjustment, and they made a treaty in which each agreed with the other, the Central American powers, not to recognize any man gaining his power by a coup d'état or revolution. General Chamarro signed for Nicaragua, and yet in less than 18 months he had raised a revolution in Nicaragua and seized the government. Certainly we could not recognize him. Although we were not a signatory to the treaty, it was made under the guidance and protection of the United States, and we refused to recognize that government. Then after he had thrown out a number of his congressmen until he could get control of the congress, he elected a man as his successor and that man by the Nicaraguan constitution, which is in writing and in my office, could not qualify; and, of course, we refused to recognize him. Then in Nicaragua they themselves restored the regularly elected congressmen, and they elected Mr. Diaz, who does meet the qualifications of the constitution. I am referring to the written constitution of Nicaragua. He does meet the requirements. He was elected according to their constitutional methods by a two-thirds majority of the congress which was elected by the people at a regular election, when the United States was not in there militarily.

What could we do? To have refused to recognize that government would have been to do the very thing my friend from Alabama charges us with now doing, namely, decide and control who shall be the president.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. NELSON of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEGG. I prefer not to yield until I have finished my statement. Then I will yield, if I have the time or if the House will grant me additional time in which to answer.

Mr. NELSON of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman take this into consideration: Congress's authority; has that been respected, and under what law is this being done?

Mr. BEGG. All right. That is easy and will not take long. The Constitution of the United States absolutely puts the control of the armed forces in the hands of the President of the United States, and nobody contests that. This is not war. This is preserving the peace and protecting the lives and property of our own nationals as well as the nationals of other countries, because there is no stable government there. Had Nicaragua a stable government able to do justice in the event of injury to our nationals, as well as injury to the nationals of other countries—like the gentleman from Alabama referred to London, I would criticize the President of the United States even more severely than he, were we to go in. I would criticize him if he were to do such a thing as that; but that is not the case in Nicaragua. There is no stable government there and there has not been, and the United States is protecting the peace of the world by sending the marines to Nicaragua greater by a thousand times, in my judgment, than if she kept out and failed to do her duty.

Now, let us see what might happen. Great Britain suggested that if the United States would not consent to protect the nationals of Great Britain that she would dispatch a man-of-war, fully armed and fully equipped, to Caribbean waters in order to protect her own nationals.

Now, let us assume we had followed the policy suggested by my friend from Alabama and had said, "No; we will not send our marines to Nicaragua; we will let every fellow look out for himself." Great Britain would have dispatched her man-of-war and you gentlemen know better than I that this man-of-war of Great Britain would not have allowed the rattle of the anchor chain to have been stilled before 100 yards alongside of her would have been settling in her berths a French man-of-war, and that man-of-war would never have gotten the anchor on the bottom of the ocean until 100 yards farther over would have been an Italian man-of-war. None of the three would have been settled in its berth before there would have been a Jap man-of-war sliding in alongside of them.

Why, gentlemen, there is not a more spectacularly beautiful sight in the world than to see the warships of the powers all congregated in a single harbor; nor is there one more hazardous to world peace than to permit them to congregate in the same waters, each there to protect a selfish interest.

I maintain that instead of contributing to war or starting war by sending the marines down there to do police duty, we have performed the greatest peace-time effort that has been performed since the World War was ended.

Mr. ROMJUE. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. BEGG. I can not at this minute.

Then, what has the United States at stake? If we were to let the war powers congregate and go into Nicaragua, the control of the Panama and the Nicaraguan Canals, which are the bottle necks of commerce between the Occident and the Orient, might be jeopardized.

I will say to you that if you can show me how the American standard of living in economics can be maintained with some other power than the United States controlling the bottle neck of commerce, I must be shown. In other words, the prosperity of the United States insists that we must control the routes between the oceans for commerce. The peace of the world, it seems to me, insists that we must maintain a stable form of government in Nicaragua until such time as the citizenship is developed to the point where it can maintain orderly government like the rest of the civilized nations of the world. [Applause.]

Under the privilege to extend my remarks I will insert a statement which I printed in the Manufacturers Record, of Baltimore, in reply to an article by a Mr. De Kalk:

As regards the statement that President Diaz is merely a puppet set up as President to administer the country without consulting the electorate, it may be said that in the elections of October, 1924, Solórzano was elected President and Sacasa Vice President. In October, 1925, General Chamorro carried out a coup d'état and made himself master of the situation. The Vice President left the country, going first to Salvador and then traveling to the United States. Solórzano resigned and went to San Francisco. General Chamorro had himself elected a senator, despite the provisions of article 141 of the constitution, providing that "Soldiers in actual service shall not be permitted to hold offices filled by popular election." He then had himself elected first designate and took over the Presidency. General Chamorro could not be President, as such action would be recognized as contrary to the provisions of Article II of the general treaty of peace and amity signed by the five Central American Republics on February 7, 1923. This article reads as follows:

"Desiring to make secure in the Republics of Central America the benefits which are derived from the maintenance of free institutions and to contribute at the same time toward strengthening their stability and the prestige with which they should be surrounded, they declare that every act, disposition, or measure which alters the constitutional organization in any of them is to be deemed a menace to the peace of said Republics, whether it proceed from any public power or from the private citizens."

Consequently the governments of the contracting parties will not recognize any other government which may come into power in any of the five Republics through a coup d'état or a revolution against a recognized government, so long as the freely elected representatives of the people thereof have not constitutionally reorganized the country. And even in such a case they obligate themselves not to acknowledge the recognition if any of the persons elected as president, vice president, or chief of state designate should fall under any of the following heads:

"1. If he should be the leader or one of the leaders of a coup d'état or revolution, or through blood relationship or marriage, be an ascendent or descendent or brother of such leader or leaders.

"2. If he should have been a secretary of state or should have held some high military command during the accomplishment of the coup d'état, the revolution, or while the election was being carried on, or if he should have held this office or command within the six months preceding the coup d'état, revolution, or the election.

"Furthermore, in no case shall recognition be accorded to a government which arises from election to power of a citizen expressly and unquestionably disqualified by the constitution of his country as eligible to election as president, vice president, or chief of state designate."

The United States refused to recognize Chamorro, as it had publicly announced on June 30, 1923, that it would adopt as its policy in the future recognition of governments in Central America the provisions of Article II of the treaty quoted above. Chamorro continued in office without recognition for several months, but in the autumn of 1926 finally retired, turning over the Presidency to Señor Uriza. The United States declined to recognize him also, as he had not been elected in a constitutional manner. Chamorro had put out of office a number of members of Congress elected in 1924 at the same time that Solórzano and Sacasa were elected, and had substituted his own followers in their place. These men now left the Congress and those originally elected were reseated, and this Congress then elected Adolfo Diaz as first designate on November 10, 1926. Article 106 of the Nicaraguan constitution provides as follows:

"In case of the absolute or temporary lack of a President of the Republic, the office of Chief Executive shall devolve on the Vice President, and in default of the latter, in one of the emergency candidates in the order of their election. In the latter case, if the Congress is in session, it shall be its duty to authorize the intrustment of the office to the representative whom it may designate, who must fulfill the requirements for President of the Republic."

At the time of this election President Solórzano was in California and Vice President Sacasa was in Guatemala, having been absent from Nicaragua for nearly a year. On November 17 the United States recognized Diaz as constitutional President.

In other words, the United States refused to recognize Chamorro and Uriza, who were not constitutionally elected, but when Diaz was constitutionally elected it recognized him. There is no question of setting up a puppet government. The Congress elected at the same time that Solórzano and Sacasa were elected, elected Diaz under the terms of their constitution, and he was recognized by the United States. If the United States had not recognized him it could have justly been charged with meddling with the internal political affairs of a neighboring republic. There was no choice in the matter.

It is not correct to say that Solórzano was elected "with our marines still in control of the country." In October, 1924, there was a legation guard of 100 marines in Managua. This guard had been there since 1912 at the direct request of each succeeding administration. They had nothing whatever to do with the conduct of the elections in 1924. Prior to that time the Liberals had charged that they could not carry out a revolution on account of the presence of the marines, and that if the United States Government did not supervise the elections they could not get into office through the ballot box. They thus charged the United States with maintaining in office a government that did not represent the will of the people. On the other hand, should the marines be withdrawn it was freely admitted by the Liberals and others that there would be a revolution within a very few days. To meet this situation the United States Government suggested to Nicaragua that it employ an expert in electoral matters to draw up an electoral law and that it be put in force in the elections of 1924. Also that in accordance with the convention of 1923 it convert its army into an efficient, well-organized constabulary. This Government stated that it felt that should the new electoral law be properly enforced the government coming into office January 1, 1925 (when Solórzano and Sacasa actually did come in) would represent the will of the majority of the people, and that therefore that administration could maintain itself in office without further assistance than its own efficient constabulary. The marines could then be withdrawn without injecting any new element of danger into the situation.

Dr. Harold W. Dodds, of the National Municipal League of New York, was employed in 1922 and drew up a new electoral law, which was voted in 1923, and it was this law that was first applied in the elections of 1924. This Government suggested that as the new law was unfamiliar both to the officers that had to enforce it and the electorate who would exercise their rights under it for the first time, the Nicaraguan Government might find it advantageous to ask Doctor Dodds and other assistants to help them in carrying out its provisions. The Nicaraguan Government did ask Doctor Dodds to help with the registration of the voters in the spring of 1924, but declined to have any assistance during the actual voting in October.

Solórzano, therefore, was not elected with our marines or any other American officials in charge. The Nicaraguan Government, under President Martinez, who was backing the candidacy of Solórzano and Sacasa, refused to have any outside assistance and this Government had nothing whatever to do with those elections. The responsibility for them rests wholly and solely upon the Nicaraguan Government. Solórzano was not a Liberal, but a dissident Conservative. Sacasa was a Liberal. It was a coalition ticket.

After Sacasa fled the country, he came to Washington to request that the United States intervene by force to put him back in the Presidency by ousting Chamorro. In other words, he asked the United States to meddle in the internal political affairs of Nicaragua and to use armed force to that end. He was told that this Government does not do this; that in accordance with its announced policy of upholding the treaty of 1923 it would not recognize the dictatorship of Chamorro, and also that it would not intervene unless American lives and property should be in danger.

The American minister was not withdrawn from Nicaragua when a dictator assumed office. That was when he was most needed to try to use his influence to prevent any rash action and to protect American lives and property. His staying there did not give recognition to the new government, and it is not so understood in international law. He remained on, not out of friendship for the usurping authorities but to protect American interests and the lives of American citizens.

It is stated that a number of members of the Nicaraguan Congress were impeached, including sympathizers of the Liberal President—Solórzano was not a Liberal—and Vice President who had been thrown out; that their places had been taken by Conservatives, and that this rump Parliament proceeded to impeach the exiled Vice President, Sacasa. The article contends that "At the same time the unconstitutional strictly partisan so-called 'Congress' elected Adolfo Diaz to the Presidency." As stated above, this is not correct. The Liberal members of Congress, who had been put out by Chamorro, were reseated and Chamorro's followers were put out after Chamorro's retirement, and the Congress that was elected with Solórzano and Sacasa in 1924 elected Diaz to the Presidency. He was then recognized by the United States. The statement is made that Diaz offered the United States "anything we wanted in exchange for American protection. So flagrant were some of the proposals of submission to the will of the United States if he were retained in power that even Washington was forced to restore the dignity of the frightened weakling." There is no truth in this. Diaz did ask for American protection against the armed intervention of Mexico, but that was all. Mr. De Kalb in his article has let it go with a general statement. It is safe to say that he could not make it more specific.

In the next paragraph Mr. De Kalb states that Sacasa went to Puerto Cabezas on September 1, 1926, and organized a legitimist government, and that "he was undoubtedly supported by Mexico, in which she was entirely within her sovereign rights." In other words, Mexico admittedly did what the United States had refused to do; that is, to support by arms one of the factions in dispute. The United States refused to recognize Chamorro or to intervene by arms against him or anybody else, or on behalf of anybody. When the constitutional government came in the United States recognized it. Mexico did not, but supported Sacasa with arms, thus taking sides and intervening in the internal political affairs of a neighboring country. Mexico was carrying on imperialism in its most flagrant sense, which, Mr. De Kalb says, "she was entirely within her sovereign rights" in doing. The United States maintained a strictly proper attitude and is then charged with imperialism. It was only after Sacasa started his revolution, supported by Mexico, to overthrow the constitutional government in Nicaragua that the United States intervened, and it intervened at first merely to protect American lives and property. United States forces were landed where the fighting was taking place, which was on the east or Atlantic coast. Neutral zones were established where there were Americans living and holding property in order to protect them. The neutralization was impartially carried out, however, and Conservatives, as well as Liberals who came within the neutralized zones, were disarmed by the American forces.

With regard to the statement that Colonel Stimson insisted upon the retention of Adolfo Diaz in the presidential chair until the new election in 1928, it may be said that after thoroughly canvassing the situation he found that there was no person acceptable to both the Liberals and Conservatives who could be put in temporarily, hence the only feasible solution was to retain the constitutional President for the balance of his term.

Our acts in Nicaragua have not "sown seeds of distrust and hatred." Those who have sown seeds of distrust and hatred are those who willfully misstate the facts and who, without taking the trouble to find out the true situation, are only too ready to condemn their own Government and declare anything that it does wrong and illegal, at the same time expressing as "entirely within her sovereign rights" the interested action of a foreign government. The officials in charge of the foreign affairs of the American Government do not resent honest criticism. If anyone goes into the facts and can find a better solution of the problems confronting them, they would welcome their suggestions, but loose, irresponsible statements misrepresenting facts and made without having taken the trouble to verify them only do an immeasurable harm.

The United States Government has consented to supervise the 1928 elections at the joint request of the Conservative Government and the Liberal opposition. This is a policy of helpfulness to a neighboring country, a policy that has as its aim the making of those countries into stable, strong, independent governments. If the United States had "adopted a policy of imperialistic aggrandizement" it would be more suiting to such a policy to fish in troubled waters and not to try to bring about stability. If the United States had entered upon a policy of imperialistic aggrandizement there would not now be an independent government in Cuba, an independent government in Panama, an independent government in the Dominican Republic, and in Haiti, nor anywhere in Central America, for that matter. The countries where the United States has lent its helping hand are the most prosperous. Cuba, when it won its independence, was bankrupt politically, financially, and economically. It is now an independent country; it has a stable government; a country with a little over 3,000,000 inhabitants, but having $1,300,000,000 American capital invested there, and a yearly trade of $560,000,000 with the United States alone. The trade of the United States with Cuba is greater than that of any other country in Latin America. These facts speak louder than the irresponsible statements of misinformed propagandists against their own government.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Ohio may have correctly stated the feeling of a majority of the people of the United States upon one question of international policy, namely, that it is the policy of the United States to protect the lives and property of American citizens. He may have stated a necessary policy growing out of the Monroe doctrine, but that which throughout this entire Nicaraguan difficulty has been always in my mind is, When was the life of any American citizen ever in danger in Nicaragua? When was any property of any American citizen, which it was the Government's duty to protect, ever in danger in Nicaragua?

Surely the gentleman from Ohio will not assert it is sound American foreign policy for the Government of the United States to say that if a private citizen of America lends money to a private citizen of another country, we will see that he is able to collect his money. This is not the protection of property which I understand is embraced in the doctrine generally laid down, that it is the duty of the Government to protect American lives and property. This does not mean it is the duty of the Government to collect the debts of a citizen against citizens of a foreign country when he has taken his chances in the marts of trade of the world. There is a distinction, too, in the duty of the Government as to protecting life and as to protecting property.

Accepting the doctrine laid down by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BEGG], I ask what are the facts? No one has ever yet cited an instance, so far as I know, when the life of any American citizen was in danger in Nicaragua or when the property of any citizen situated in Nicaragua was threatened with destruction. I should like to know what are the facts.

Mr. ROMJUE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I yield.

Mr. ROMJUE. When certain resolutions were before the committee about a year ago, the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House at a meeting to consider these resolutions had this question put to them: When and what American life had been destroyed or threatened with destruction, and what and where was a single dollar's worth of property destroyed or threatened with destruction? Not a single member of that committee could answer, and yet they asserted, as has been asserted here to-day, that we are there to protect American lives and property.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I just wish to add, Mr. Speaker, in view of the turn which affairs have taken in Nicaragua within the last few days, it seems to me it is highly important that the administration, upon whose initiative the action has been taken and war has been waged—because it is war—ought at least to make known to the American people when an American life was in danger or when any item of property which it is the duty of the American Government to protect was threatened. If this can be done, perhaps we can get a different perspective upon this question, but this has not yet been done by the administration or by the gentleman from Ohio or by anyone speaking for the administration. [Applause.]

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman withhold that for a moment?

Mr. TILSON. I withhold it.

The SPEAKER. There are a number of messages to lay before the House, and before doing that the Chair will state he has given some consideration to the reference of the resolution of investigation offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER].

Under ordinary circumstances such a resolution, not involving the membership of the House, would be referred to the committee having jurisdiction of the subject matter.

In this case it would be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs. But in view of the fact that a request was made by the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs and the ranking minority member that it should go to the Committee on Rules, the Chair will refer it to the Committee on Rules, but does not desire it to be a precedent for general reference.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for one minute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to address the House for one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I rise simply to make this statement, that although we may have originally gone into Nicaragua for the protection of American lives and property, we are there to-day by the consent, with the authority, and at the request of the Government of Nicaragua and with the full concurrence of the Liberals as well as the Conservatives, in fact in pursuance of the agreement, effected by Mr. Stimson, for the settlement of the revolution in Nicaragua. We are not waging a war in Nicaragua. On the contrary, we are assisting the Government of Nicaragua and the people of Nicaragua to restore orderly and peaceful conditions in that distracted country.

It is, in my judgment, not only our right but our duty to be there, Mr. Speaker, under existing circumstances; our duty to our own people, who are there by right; our duty to the people of other countries, who have the right to look to us to restore peaceful conditions in Nicaragua. The circumstances leading to our armed forces being in Nicaragua at this time have been too often related, must be too familiar to us all, to bear repetition at this time. A bitter, brutal, bloody, internecine conflict was under way, with no prospect for peace whichever side prevailed. Our marines were in Managua, the capital, as they had been there before under similar circumstances. They were not only protecting the capital but guarding the railroad, the one means of communication with the coast. In that situation the President requested Henry L. Stimson, a very distinguished citizen of New York, a former Secretary of War, who has recently been appointed Governor General of the Philippines, unanimously confirmed by the Senate for that great office, to go to Nicaragua and try and settle the business. His coming was hailed with satisfaction and relief by Liberals and Conservatists alike. He succeeded in his mission. He brought about a settlement under which they are assured, for the first time in their history, of a really fair election in Nicaragua in this year.

Liberals are participating in the government as well as Conservatives. A nonpartisan constabulary, organized and officered by marine officers, has been established. The fighting of the two factions has ceased. Both sides have laid down and turned in their arms. The people have been returning to peaceful pursuits. Not only Moncada, the Liberal general in chief, but all the Liberal chieftains, except one Sandino, agree to and have abided by this settlement. Sandino broke away and with a small band has been terrorizing and keeping up a condition of guerilla warfare in the north near the Honduran border. The only war being waged in Nicaragua to-day is the combined effort of our marines and the newly organized constabulary to overcome Sandino. Notwithstanding Sandino's audacious enterprise, the prospect for a return to general peace is, I believe, Mr. Speaker, brighter than it has ever been before.

It is lamentable, terribly unfortunate, that this Sandino situation exists in Nicaragua to-day. That we should be obliged to risk and spend the lives of our brave marines in such an enterprise. But, on the other hand, the settlement effected by Mr. Stimson must be carried out. We must do our part to make it effective. Indeed, for one I feel that the gentlemen on the other side of the aisle might be in better business than in attempting to harass and embarrass the administration of their country in coping with the very difficult and unavoidable present situation.

Mr. Speaker, rather than withdraw the marines at this time, which is apparently what our friends across the aisle are advocating, I feel that, in view of all that has occurred, peace must be restored in Nicaragua at whatever cost and maintained. Indeed, that we must see this Stimson settlement through, though the effort requires even more than the Marine Corps.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. I ask unanimous consent that his time be extended one minute.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BLANTON. I want to ask the gentleman this question: Suppose the Republic of Mexico should request the President of the United States to send our Army into Mexico to help him to preserve peace, to help him engage in war with another country—does the gentleman contend that the President of the United States would have that authority until Congress so directed him?

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Of course, if it was to assist the President of Mexico to wage war with a foreign country; no. If it was a question of assisting the existing government in the maintenance and preservation of law and order, I believe it would be the right and duty of the President to acquiesce.

Mr. BEGG. President Wilson did that very thing.

Mr. BLANTON. No; President Wilson was protecting American life and property. Repeated acts of war constitute war. The President of the United States has no authority whatever to engage in war either with or against foreign countries until the Congress of the United States authorizes it.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

REGINALD ETHELBERT MYRIE (S. DOC. NO. 32)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs and ordered printed:

To the Congress of the United States:

I transmit herewith a report from the Secretary of State regarding the claim presented by the Government of Great Britain on behalf of Mr. David S. Myrie for compensation on account of the death of his son, Reginald Ethelbert Myrie, in the Panama Canal Zone on February 5, 1921. I recommend that the Congress as an act of grace and without reference to the legal liability of the United States in the premises authorize the appropriation of a sufficient amount to effect a settlement of this claim in accordance with the recommendation of the Secretary of State.

CALVIN COOLIDGE.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 4, 1928.

CLAIMS ARISING OUT OF THE OCCUPATION OF VERA CRUZ, MEXICO (S. DOC. NO. 33)

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs and ordered printed:

To the Congress of the United States:

I transmit herewith a report by the Secretary of State requesting the submission anew to the present Congress of the matter of the claims arising out of the occupation of Vera Cruz, Mexico, by American forces in 1914, which formed the subject of a report made by the Secretary of State to the President on February 5, 1926, and my message to the Congress dated February 6, 1926, which comprise Senate Document No. 49, Sixty-ninth Congress, first session, a copy of which is furnished for the convenient information of the Congress.

I renew the recommendation originally made by President Harding that in order to effect a settlement of these claims the Congress as an act of grace and without reference to the legal liability of the United States in the premises authorize an appropriation in the sum of $45,518.69, and I bring the matter anew to the attention of the present Congress in the hope that the action recommended may receive favorable consideration.

CALVIN COOLIDGE.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 4, 1928.

CLAIM OF RICHARD L. SPRAGUE (S. DOC. NO. 35)

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with accompanying documents, was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs and ordered printed:

To the Congress of the United States:

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs and ordered printed:

To the Congress of the United States:

I transmit herewith a report by the Secretary of State concerning the plans of the International Society for the Exploration of the Arctic Regions by Means of the Airship for the establishment of geophysical observations of the inner Arctic regions, toward the accomplishment of which the 19 governments whose countries are represented in the society have been requested to make an annual contribution for five years for required preparatory work, in accordance with a schedule furnished by the society and accompanying the report of the Secretary of State. The annual contribution requested of the United States is $300.

The attention of Congress is especially invited to the strong indorsements of this project given by the Secretary of the Navy, the Acting Secretary of Agriculture, the Acting Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution, the National Research Council, and the Carnegie Institution of Washington, as recited in the report of the Secretary of State.

In view of these favorable comments, and in conformity with the recommendation of the Secretary of State, I lay the matter before Congress for its determination whether it will authorize an annual appropriation of $300 for five years, as the contribution of the United States, on the condition that the other governments approached will also contribute the quotas assigned to them.

WIDOWS' PENSIONS, WAR OF 1812

Mr. GARDNER of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I introduced a bill seeking to amend the pension laws with respect to Civil War widows. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD upon that subject.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARDNER of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I have to-day introduced a bill to amend section 4 of the act of May 1, 1920, which section is a part of the act of May 1, 1920, granting pensions to Civil War soldiers and Civil War soldiers' widows, as well as to the widows of the War of 1812 and the Mexican War. The only changes that this bill makes in the present law are: First, where the present law provides that the widow must have married the soldier, sailor, or marine prior to June 27, 1905, in order to have a pensionable status, this bill changes that date from June 27, 1905, to June 27, 1915, which is the same date the Committee on Invalid Pensions uses in granting special acts.

I think this change should be made for the reason that there are many deserving cases where the widow married the soldier after June 27, 1905, and many cases are now being pensioned by special act that could be eliminated by the general law if this change were made. The second change is in the case of remarried widows. The present law provides that a remarried widow of a Civil War soldier is entitled to a pension—if it be shown that such subsequent or successive marriage has, or have been dissolved, either by the death of the husband, or husbands, or by a divorce without fault on the part of the wife.

The bill I have introduced, instead of using—or by divorce without fault on the part of the wife—

uses the wording:

by divorce on any ground except adultery on the part of the wife.

This change is the exact wording of the act of May 1, 1926, applying to Spanish-American War widows. I see no reason why a Spanish-American widow should be pensioned under a more liberal law than a Civil War widow. And I see no reason why the same kind of a provision should not apply in both cases. I know of several cases in my own district where, in each case, a deserving widow has permitted a worthless husband to divorce her without her making an appearance in court and resisting the divorce suit, not knowing, at the time, the effect it would have on her application for pension, when, in fact, the widow could have secured the divorce had she made the application. As the present law now stands, reading—without fault on the part of the wife—

the Pension Bureau has construed that law to mean that where the husband secured a divorce, the widow is not entitled to a pension; nor is she able to prove, under the rules of the Pension Bureau, that the divorce was granted without fault on her part. I think this is an important change that should be made in the present law. The third change that the proposed bill would make in the present law is the provision reading as follows:

Provided, however, That such widow as mentioned in this section, of any Civil War veteran, upon arriving at the age of 70 years, shall receive $40 per month, and upon arriving at the age of 75 years, shall receive $50 per month; and provided further, That such widow, as mentioned in this section, of any Civil War veteran shall not be entitled to such pension unless it be shown that she married such soldier, sailor, or mariner at least five years prior to his death, and lived and cohabited with him continuously from date of such marriage until the date of his death.

Everyone knows that a large majority of these Civil War widows are now past an age when they are able to earn a living for themselves, and many of them are helpless, and many are helpless and destitute. Everyone knows that a helpless and destitute widow can not live on $30 per month. These widows are passing away rapidly, at the rate of 19,000 a year, and it is only a matter of a few years until they will not need pensions. The husbands of these widows came to the relief of this country at a time when the Government sorely needed their services. They offered all they had for the benefit of their country. I feel that the Government now owes a duty to these widows to provide the comforts of life for them the remainder of their days, and it is not doing so when it is simply making them the pitiful allowance of $30 per month. This proviso will be helpful to the widows and is liberal with the Government. Under this provision the Civil War widow would draw only the $30 until she arrives at the age of 70 years. She would then draw $40 until she arrives at the age of 75 years, and from that time on $50 per month. This provision also provides that in order for a widow to have a pensionable status under the provisions of this bill she must have married the soldier at least five years prior to his death and lived and cohabited with him continuously from the date of such marriage until the date of his death. Certainly this provision is not unfair to the Government. The last change in this bill is simply bringing the widow of a soldier of the War of 1812, and of the war with Mexico, up to $50 instead of $30 as now provided by law. I have been informed that there are over 7,000 bills for special acts for pensions and increases of pensions for these widows that have already been filed. I have filed a number myself that are deserving cases. It is a physical impossibility for the clerks of the Committee on Invalid Pensions to examine and pass on all of these claims during this session of Congress, and that means that many deserving cases will not be considered. This bill would provide for a majority of these cases. I believe a large majority of the Members of Congress are in favor of this bill or a similar bill. We owe a duty to these widows and to the country to enact some needed legislation along this line. Delay in this matter means that many deserving widows must suffer. I sincerely hope the Committee on Invalid Pensions will give early and favorable consideration to this bill or to a similar bill that will give relief to these widows who are entitled to receive such relief.

THE FEASIBILITY OF AMERICAN RAILROADS ENGAGING IN WORLD SHIPPING

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD upon the merchant marine, and to include therein a statement by Mr. Hurley, a former member of the Shipping Board, bearing on the acquirement and operation by American railroads of ships to engage in foreign commerce.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. Speaker, I have frequently urged the importance and advantage of connecting rail and ocean transportation, and the adoption of a uniform through export and import bill of lading between connecting rail and ocean carriers. I have also suggested the feasibility of United States railroads engaging in foreign ocean shipping. In a recent letter to the United States Shipping Board Hon. Edward N. Hurley, of Chicago, discussed this subject in a most illuminative manner. Mr. Hurley was the war-time chairman of the United States Shipping Board, has given a great deal of study to an American merchant marine, and has written several books upon this and kindred subjects.

Under leave granted to do so, I quote from Mr. Hurley's letter to the Shipping Board, as follows:

WHY RAILROADS SHOULD ENGAGE IN WORLD SHIPPING

As a manufacturer interested in overseas trade I wish to present some suggestions as to how our Government may be helpful in establishing a permanent merchant marine, which it must have if its industries are to meet the increasing competition for world trade and which also will help build up our national defense.

The railroads of our country are vitally interested in foreign trade, as by its increase or decrease their tonnage and earnings are directly affected. Ninety per cent of all passenger and freight business for overseas emanates from the interior and is carried to our ports by the railroads. I am submitting for your consideration further reasons why they should become engaged in overseas shipping in cooperation with our present privately owned shipping companies.

Railroads could become interested in our overseas shipping either directly by building and operating ships or indirectly through stock ownership in American shipping companies that are now carrying our foreign commerce.

There is no law prohibiting any railroad from owning or operating ships or from holding stock in shipping companies engaged in overseas business. Section 11 of the Panama Canal act, which prohibits railroads from owning and operating ships in intercoastal trade, should be repealed. If the railroads become engaged in world shipping, they should be allowed to participate in intercoastal traffic.

Freight rates on all ships engaged in the intercoastal business should be under the direction and control of the Interstate Commerce Commission. The mid-west manufacturer feels that he is being discriminated against by his Government in being required to pay an excessive toll on his railroad freight to the Pacific coast as against his Atlantic coast competitor who ships goods by water through the Panama Canal at very low rates. The mid-west manufacturer has paid his share of the cost of building the canal and should not be penalized.

Some equitable adjustment of rates should be made by the Interstate Commerce Commission that would be fair to the mid-west manufacturers, the people on the Pacific coast, and the railroads and shipowners. Furthermore, the Shipping Board should not sell low-priced ships for intercoastal business, thus enabling purchasers to cut freight rates and further demoralize the coastwise business, thereby creating unfair competitive transportation conditions through a government-owned canal.

America is known as the land of efficiency. In no other industry is its efficiency so striking as in railroading. The railroads owe it to the public of America, to themselves, and their stockholders to extend this efficiency to ocean shipping. The vicissitudes of a hundred years of herculean struggles have built for them organizations capable of applying to shipping the efficiency which is needed and can be had by cooperating with the leaders of shipping companies now engaged in operating passenger and freight ships.

Congress and public opinion no longer frown upon amalgamations of railroads, as they did for 30 years. Railroads some years ago were forced to buy up competing water transportation routes on lakes and rivers. Those water lines in Northern States, to be sure, could operate only in summer, but that was enough to cripple railroad service by their competition and left the land lines to stagger under overload through the winter months. This practice grew on the meat which fed it, and the consequent abuses became offensive. The result was Federal control through the Interstate Commerce Commission and attendant legislation. Out of this grew coordination of rail and water transportation rates, with great advantages to the shippers by reason of through bills of lading, with apportionment of rate to each carrier, whether by land or water.

The opening of the Panama Canal has brought about serious competition in transcontinental business for the railroads. The appropriation of public moneys for the building of that waterway carried with it legislation calculated to guarantee this means of competitive ship and railroad operations, since railroads may not own coastwise tonnage. The Southern Pacific was allowed to retain its New York to New Orleans ship line as a feeder for its main line largely because that ship line was almost entirely built up with the support of the Southern Pacific rail lines.

Although the railroads are thus made keenly aware of the cheapness of water carriage as compared with land transportation, it is doubtful whether any railroad authority has ever made a real study of the relative costs. A freight vessel of 10,000 tons burden transports the equivalent of 10 full-size trainloads. It operates without the cost of franchise, capital charges for roadbed, right of way, signals, or heavy taxes paid to States.

A scientific study of the strategic value of steamship connections to the Southern Pacific might reveal some factors of the greatest importance to the officials and directors of our eastern and other trunk lines. But even more illuminating would be a study of the great trunk line operated by the Canadian Pacific. No railroad in America has made greater progress in a given period of its existence, and this in spite of the fact that this line traverses thousands of miles of almost uninhabited territory and but little developed land. Its vast fleets of great steamships plying on both the Pacific and the Atlantic have been no inconsiderable factor in this success. Its experience points an object lesson to other American railways.

Let us now consider some of the elements with respect to which the railroad as a steamship owner and operator may favorably affect the cost factor in ocean transportation. First of all, in the matter of freight solicitation: The Luckenbach Steamship Co. has made the statement that 22 per cent of its gross revenue is directly chargeable to the expense of solicitation. This ratio is verified by other steamship companies. Every railroad maintains solicitation agents in every city, town, and hamlet in its territory and the same facilities would serve to procure freight for steamship lines as well. The large trunk lines also maintain expensive offices in foreign countries, which offices might be similarly utilized without additional expense. As a matter of fact, these soliciting facilities already are engaged in helping steamship lines engage freight, in order that such freight may be routed by each line into its own terminals.

Fuel takes over 30 per cent of a steamer's gross revenue. Here, also, the railroads serving the territory where coal is produced would find an added revenue in their direct control of ocean carriers. Terminal facilities are maintained already by the trunk lines in every seaport which they enter; and in most cases these expensive terminal facilities are extended without charge to any steamship line which loads cargo moving over the railroad concerned, or which discharges there.

In a great many of our large ports, notably in New York, through which moves by far the largest volume of our foreign trade in manufactured goods, there is duplication of port facilities to an enormous extent. Both the steamship and railroad companies maintain expensive wharves and docks and both are served by harbor lighterage facilities valued at millions of dollars and adding frequently as much as $1 per ton to the cost of moving freight from one terminal to another. Much, if not all, of this duplication and excess expense could be eliminated by railroad ownership of steamship lines operating in foreign trade.

Absolute control of the cargo to its ultimate destination would enable the railroad in such ports as New York to eliminate a great deal of harbor expense, such as lighterage and towage. It would, furthermore, enable the road to avoid much car "lay up"—one of the most annoying expense items to every road. The coordination between rail and water carriage which would result from railroad ownership of strategic steamship lines would result not only in enormous savings to the railroads, but would serve to reduce the cumulative expense which shippers or consignees must eventually absorb.

The railroads have had a very expensive object lesson in the comparative cost of ocean transport as against rail carriage. Until quite recently rail carriers found that freight from points as far west as St. Paul, destined for the Pacific coast, was routed to the Atlantic seaboard for transshipment via intercoastal steamship lines through the Panama Canal. Obviously shippers and consignees did not reconcile themselves to the extra long period of transit without having a compensating advantage in greatly reduced freight costs. In other words, intercoastal steamship lines could, in effect, absorb the cost of a rail haul one-third to one-half as great as that on direct rail delivery, then make a water haul four times as long as the direct rail haul, and could still undercuote the railroads on their direct haul.

The chief factor contributing to this cheap transportation to the Pacific coast was the Panama Canal. Another factor was the building of our great war-time fleet—some fifteen hundred freight steamers having been built by the Government, a very large number of which have since passed into private hands. These steamers were sold at prices in some cases far less than the cost of a new locomotive. Many others are still available to private purchasers at similarly low prices, and a little foresight on the part of railroads will lead to an appreciation of the unique opportunity which awaits them.

The shipping act of 1920 mandates the Shipping Board to develop port facilities, with a view to the expansion of American commerce. Yet it is obvious that merely running steamers into and out of a port does not create commerce. The real creators of our commerce are the carriers which have made our ports. In the beginnings of our industrial expansion it was the Erie Canal which gave New York its first great impetus. It was a similar rivalry, so generated, which spurred the people of Baltimore to create and develop the Baltimore & Ohio Railway. It was the people of Philadelphia who gave the Pennsylvania system its first backing. New York holds its supremacy as a port largely because of the fact that four great trunk lines make that port their main terminal.

There are certain systems that enjoy a preferential position with regard to freight movements of goods entering into foreign commerce by reason of highly lucrative territory which they cover. These railroads could, with great profit to themselves and to the country, participate in the ownership of ocean tonnage. They could not only reduce costs, as above pointed out, but they could readjust their rate structures to meet the needs of exporters in certain highly competitive fields. Transportation could be made, as it were, an exportable commodity and be sold on a large scale and on a sound economic basis.

OPPORTUNITY RIPE FOR RAILROADS

The first American railroad in this country to give this subject the scientific inquiry and study which it deserves will grasp the opportunity to make itself the premier rail system of the Nation. It will attain the same relative preeminence which is enjoyed by the Canadian Pacific. Such a railroad will find on examination that construction costs in American shipyards are to-day from 25 to 35 per cent greater than costs in foreign yards. They will find also that the Government is not unwilling to sell good ocean-freight bottoms at a cost of about six to eight dollars per dead-weight ton—tonnage which would cost from six to eight times more if purchased in foreign or American yards. The railroad would thus have an initial capital cost well below its foreign competitors, being placed in a position of receiving an inducement in the form of low interest on capital charges.

Several railroad mergers already have been consummated, and plans for even greater amalgamations are now awaiting action by the Interstate Commerce Commission. Were one of these mergers to contemplate including in their unified ownership and control a substantial steamship operation for European service, there can be no doubt that it would prove of great interest to Congress, the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the public.

It is equally probable that the Panama Canal act prohibiting the operation of railroad-owned tonnage through that waterway would be repealed if it could be shown that the interests of the shippers and the public in general would be safeguarded, as they most assuredly can be. It is not less likely that the disruption of the intercoastal steamship conference—an event which is threatened momentarily—will eventually develop into a grave menace to the general freight-rate structure of the trunk lines of the country. If that occurred, it would set the roads back where they were 20 years ago and tend to undo a great deal of the enlightened legislative provision already made for sound transportation facilities and avoidance of friction with the public.

Railroad administrators surely must be aware of the delicate nature of their present status, and must realize that even a slight disturbance of that adjustment would be likely to cause the loss of almost all the ground that has been gained. A well-conceived project designed to bring about greater coordination of rail and water transportation facilities would be a most useful factor in serving to strengthen and conserve the impregnable position in which railroads are at last placed.

Doubtless there is little concerning railroad operation practice in Europe the study of which would serve to improve railroad efficiency in America; but Europeans can teach us much in the matter of eliminating the obstacles to close and effective cooperation between land and water carriers. Highly developed port and terminal facilities are made to serve jointly the railroads and steamship lines in all of the greatest ports of England and the Continent. Railroads in England control channel tonnage in trade with Ireland, Holland, France, and Belgium. The Swedish State railways and the Danish State railways control deep-water tonnage trading in the Baltic, all with advantage to the public and to themselves.

The past 15 years have witnessed a notable change in the manner of handling some of our basic commodities in foreign trade. The great industrial companies in America controlling oil, steel, sulphur, lumber, coal, nitrate, motors, fruit, sugar, etc., have acquired ocean shipping facilities operating in foreign trade as well as coastwise and intercoastal trade. These industrial companies sell water transportation on a wholesale basis, applying the same principle as is now so successfully used for mass production in manufacturing. However, this places the smaller manufacturers of such commodities as can not be so standardized or are not manufactured on a vast scale at a disadvantage with respect to deliveries in foreign markets.

This situation affords a strategic opportunity for the railroads to come to the relief of these small shippers and others who control no shipping of their own. By so doing they not only would materially advance their own interests, but they would render an important public service. If vast aggregations of capital centered in a single industrial enterprise may legitimately increase its control over foreign markets by engaging in the steamship business, why may not a railroad offer equal advantages to the thousands of smaller shippers on its line whose existence and prosperity are largely involved with the fortunes of the railroads?

It is pertinent to point out that this country has outgrown its swaddling clothes in the matter of international contacts. Twenty years ago only 5 per cent of our total production of all agricultural, manufactured, and mineral commodities entered into foreign trade, and of those the greater part was raw materials or food supplies. We are confronted to-day with the necessity of finding markets abroad for our manufactured goods in tremendous quantities, with a surplus which can not possibly be consumed at home. Industrial capacity already under power could produce an enormous exportable surplus. We are fast approaching the economic and industrial condition of such countries as England, Belgium, and Holland, of whose production from 50 to 75 per cent enters into foreign trade. It is that economic condition which has forced Great Britain to be a great sea power in respect of her transportation. The same is true of Germany.

A merchant marine has not been a real necessity to America in the past, but the time is not far ahead when the same forces which operated through the usual course of business expediency to encourage ship operation on the high seas in the nations of Europe, both great and small, will force American business to compete with the foreign fleets of the world. It will not be a matter of academic theory. It will come to us as it did to them—a matter of self-preservation and of sound business expediency. No set of men, no combination of interests, and no other organized enterprise is so well fitted to take up this task of transportation on the seven seas at this time as are our American railroads.

It is perhaps unbecoming to any steamship man to admit inefficiency in his own line of business; but the fact is that few if any steamship companies operating, whether in America or elsewhere in the world, ever have made a really scientific study of rate classification. A great deal of money is lost by steamship owners everywhere because they do not follow a sound and scientific system of rate making. It is a fact proven beyond hope of contradiction that American railway management, working in conjunction with the experts of the Interstate Commerce Commission, have developed the work of rate schedule making into an exact science. In this respect, also, the railroads can contribute much toward increasing net return from steamship operation.

In conclusion, and by way of summary, let me say:

American railroads may legitimately and with material advantage to themselves and to the Nation at large engage in the ocean steamship business for these following reasons:

First. American public policy no longer is inimical to a reasonable expansion of railroad activities beyond the immediate sphere of their present operations.

Second. Congress is correctly interpreting the temper of the American people with respect to amalgamations, toward a fair return on capital invested in railway enterprise, and any soundly conceived plan to make even more secure the prosperity of the railroads, while at the same time securing a more economic and efficient system of coordinating rail with water transportation.

Third. Railroad management and experience in efficient organization can bring to the steamship business in America a cost-reducing factor which is foreign to anything now known in American steamship experience.

Fourth. Any one of the great trunk lines, with vast terminal facilities in New York and other seaboard cities, can utilize such facilities through its own steamship operations with attendant savings to shippers and with profit to itself.

Fifth. By availing itself of the opportunity to purchase Government tonnage at prices so low as to be almost nominal, a railroad may very materially appreciate its capital structure and increase its earning power, with comparatively slight capital interest charges.

Sixth. By reason of the present political exigencies which demand the upbuilding of an American merchant marine and the maintenance of ship lines in foreign trade, a railroad engaging in such enterprise may fortify itself by gaining the support of Congress, of the executive branch of the Federal Government (and especially of the public and the Interstate Commerce Commission), not only with respect to such enterprise but in the matter of rail consolidations which may be linked up with the mergers.

Seventh. Finally, in view of the opening up of a new era with respect to foreign commerce expansion wherein the United States is certain to make pheonomenal strides in obtaining markets abroad for manufactures already being produced in very great excess of our own domestic demand, railroads are afforded an unique opportunity to gain the prestige and increased power which is certain to follow their more active and direct participation in international trade movements.

I wish to say that I am firm in the belief that participation by the railroads in the ownership and operation of our merchant fleet should be encouraged by the Shipping Board. If the railroad executives, directors, and their bankers will make a careful analysis of the amount of their passenger and freight traffic that now goes overseas, I am sure they will find that it is an important part of their present business, and any increase in overseas tonnage that might be brought about by railroad activity in owning and operating ships can result only in further increasing their business and earnings.

SENATE

THURSDAY, January 5, 1928

The Chaplain, Rev. ZeBarney T. Phillips, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Father of lights, with whom can be no variation, neither shadow that is cast by turning, send out Thy light and Thy truth that they may lead us. As the duties of another day await us we would thank Thee for Thy loving care of us, for Thy gifts of health and strength, and for the companionship of friends with minds made reverent by honest thought. Give us new hopes and cares which may supplant our own too small concerns. Make us too great for narrow creeds of right and wrong, which fade before our unslaked thirst for good, and grant us peace serene, through Him who is the Prince of Peace, our Savior, Jesus Christ. Amen.

The legislative clerk proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings when, on request of Mr. CURTIS and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

Mr. McLEAN presented the following joint resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Connecticut, which was referred to the Committee on Finance:

Senate Joint Resolution 36, requesting the Congress of the United States to repeal the provisions of the revenue act of 1926 which pertain to the taxation of estates

Resolved by this assembly—

Whereas by the provisions of the Federal revenue act of 1926, which impose taxes on the estates of deceased persons, this State is being subjected to a form of coercion in order to compel the imposition of State death taxes at rates higher than its citizens desire to impose upon themselves for their own needs and benefit; and

Whereas any form of coercion, or financial inducement to States, by Federal authority is in distinct conflict with the spirit of our constitutional government, is offensive to sound policy, and is destructive of the responsibility of citizens and of States with respect to the power to levy taxes, the most vital of the powers which inhere in government; and

Whereas joint levies of taxes by the Federal Government on the one hand and by the States of the Union on the other hand, are unprecedented in the history of this country, and are particularly offensive when the Federal enactment operates in any way to influence or control the exercise of sovereignty by the respective States: Therefore be it

Resolved, That it is the judgment of the general assembly that the Congress of the United States should forthwith repeal the provisions of the revenue act of 1926 which impose taxes on the estates of deceased persons, leaving this field of taxation exclusively to the States of the Union in times of peace; be it further

Resolved, That certified copies of this resolution be forwarded to the Senators and Representatives from this State in the Congress of the United States, and they are hereby requested to spread these resolutions in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, or to select such other means as may be appropriate to apprise the Senators and Representatives of other States of the contents hereof.

Approved April 29, 1927.

STATE OF CONNECTICUT,

Office of the Secretary, ss:

I, Francis A. Pallotti, secretary of the State of Connecticut, and keeper of the seal thereof, and of the original record of the acts and resolutions of the general assembly of said State, do hereby certify that I have compared the annexed copy of the resolution requesting the Congress of the United States to repeal the provisions of the revenue act of 1926 which pertain to the taxation of estates with the original record of the same now remaining in this office, and have found the said copy to be a correct and complete transcript thereof.

INVESTIGATION OF AFFAIRS IN NICARAGUA

Mr. WHEELER. I send to the desk a resolution and ask that the clerk may read it.

The Chief Clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 102), as follows:

Whereas the executive branches of this Government have been and are now carrying on a war in Nicaragua without the Congress of the United States first having declared war as is provided by the provisions of Article I of the Constitution of the United States; and

Whereas American boys connected with the Marine Corps of this Government are being killed in said warfare so being made and carried on in violation of the Constitution because of mismanagement and inadequate protection being afforded them; and

Whereas it is claimed by the executive branches of our Government that said boys are in Nicaragua to protect American investments and concessions in said country; and

Whereas the claim has been made that some of the investments are based on concessions obtained by questionable and unconscionable methods owing to the lack of capital in the Republic of Nicaragua; and

Whereas such investments and concessions, if unjust in their terms endanger legitimate business not only in Nicaragua but in other foreign countries; and

Whereas American investments abroad, already amounting to many billions of dollars, are increasing rapidly and controversies regarding the rights and duties of holders of such concessions constitute an increasingly important part of our foreign relations and produce tensions which may easily lead to war; and

Whereas statements purporting to be issued by the executive branches of our Government, or by the spokesman for the White House, were published in the newspapers of the country to the effect that our armed forces in Nicaragua were to be strictly neutral as between the contending forces in that country; and

Whereas subsequent events clearly show that our armed forces have not acted as neutrals but have taken an active part in a controversy wholly within and affecting solely the rights of the people of a friendly nation in defiance of every fundamental principal upon which this Government was founded: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized to investigate the terms and conditions under which concessions have been procured in Nicaragua by United States citizens and by corporations and other associations in which United States citizens are financially interested, and the nature and extent of such concessions, with particular reference to (1) the source and sanction of such concessions, and (2) the principal aspects of public policy involved in the treatment, as property rights for purposes of diplomatic protection of such concessions.

Resolved further, That the said Committee on Foreign Relations or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof is authorized to investigate who ordered the marines to be sent to Nicaragua, why they were sent there, why they have been kept there, why they have not acted as neutrals, whether or not it is the purpose of the executive branches of our Government to continue to usurp the power of Congress given it by the Constitution of the United States, namely, the power to declare war, and any other matter or thing which to the committee or a subcommittee thereof may seem meet and proper in the premises.

For the purposes of this resolution such committee or subcommittee is authorized to hold hearings, to sit and act at such times and places, to employ such experts and clerical, stenographic, and other assistants, to require by subpœna or otherwise the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, to administer such oaths, and to take such testimony and to make such expenditures as it deems advisable. The cost of stenographic service to report such hearings shall not be in excess of 25 cents per hundred words. The expenses of such committee or subcommittee shall not exceed $30,000, and shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate upon vouchers approved by the chairman of such committee or subcommittee. Such committee or subcommittee shall make a final report to the Senate as to its findings.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I ask that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations at this time, but I give notice that at a later date I shall have something further to say concerning the resolution and the situation in Nicaragua.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

JANIE HARRIS

Mr. LA FOLLETTE submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 103), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate hereby is authorized and directed to pay from the contingent fund of the Senate to Janie Harris, widow of Albert Harris, late a waiter in the employ of the Senate, a sum equal to six months' compensation at the rate he was receiving by law at the time of his death, said sum to be considered inclusive of funeral expenses and all other allowances.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 104), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS—CHESTER R. HOPPER

Mr. COPELAND. I ask unanimous consent that the Secretary of the Senate be authorized to return to Chester R. Hopper the affidavits and papers filed by him in connection with the bill for his relief, being the bill (S. 1009) granting a pension to Chester R. Hopper, which failed of passage in the Sixty-ninth Congress.

ARTICLE BY HON. HENRIK SHIPSTEAD

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, there is an article in Current History for September, 1927, written by the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD], entitled "Dollar diplomacy in Latin America," which shows a great deal of research and gives a great deal of valuable information. I ask unanimous consent that it may be printed in the RECORD at this point.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. The article is as follows:

"DOLLAR DIPLOMACY" IN LATIN AMERICA

By HENRIK SHIPSTEAD, member of the Foreign Relations Committee of the United States Senate

The Monroe doctrine is dead, and has been dead for many years. It lived only as long as its original spirit was followed. That spirit was the protection of human liberty. It was departed from by the United States in her policy toward Latin America fully 25 years ago. To-day the Monroe doctrine remains only as a diplomatic subterfuge. Its ideals are being used as a cloak to cover acts subversive of human liberty and contrary to the institutions and traditions of our Nation.

At the beginning of the nineteenth century new political principles were challenging the existing order of society. The thirteen American Colonies had revolted against the European monarchical system; the French Revolution had thrown down a firebrand into the heart of Europe itself; and in Central and South America republicanism was advancing by leaps and bounds. This new confession of political faith which was overturning the world was best expressed in our great Declaration of Independence, wherein it is stated that we dedicate ourselves and the soil of America to the principle that governments receive their powers "only from the consent of the governed."

The treaty of the Holy Alliance had been signed by the leading monarchs of Europe with the main objective of building a barricade against the spread of this new theory of government. President Monroe and other American statesmen of the time looked upon this alliance, with its determination to maintain and extend the European colonial system, as a threat against the freedom of the whole western continent.

Accordingly there was enunciated a policy on behalf of the United States Government to the effect that any attempt on the part of European powers to interfere with the governments of our sister Republics in the western continent would be met with the armed resistance of the United States. In the same message President Monroe stated clearly what was to be the relation of the United States toward these Republics. "It is still the true policy of the United States," he said, "to leave the parties—the sister Republics—to themselves, in the hope that other powers will pursue the same course."

This was the famous Monroe doctrine. No statement of public policy has ever at its inception been more purely and unselfishly dedicated to a political ideal. It has been restated again and again, by successive Presidents and Secretaries of State. For instance, John W. Foster, Secretary of State in Harrison's Cabinet, in an address entitled "Misconceptions and Limitations of the Monroe Doctrine" before the American Society of International Law, said: "If the Monroe doctrine did not contain a high moral principle of ethics and government which commanded the respect of all civilized nations we could not build a Navy vast enough nor create an Army large enough to enforce it against the hostile sentiment of the great powers of Europe."

During the past 25 years, however, much confusion has arisen regarding this historic policy, even in the minds of the statesmen who were conducting it. President Wilson, addressing the Southern Commercial Congress at Mobile on October 27, 1913, said, in speaking of the Latin-American Republics:

"They have had harder bargains driven with them in the matter of loans than any other people in the world. Interest has been exacted of them that was not exacted of anybody else, because the risk was said to be greater; and then securities were taken that destroyed the risk. An admirable arrangement for those who were forcing the terms. I rejoice in nothing so much as in the prospect that they will now be emancipation from these conditions, and we ought to be the first to take part in assisting in that emancipation. * * * We must prove ourselves their friends and champions upon terms of equality and honor. * * * Human rights, national integrity and opportunity as against material interests—that is the issue which we now have to face. * * * We must regard it as one of the duties of friendship to see that from no quarter are material interests made superior to human liberty and national opportunity."

On August 30, 1923, Charles Evans Hughes, then Secretary of State in the Harding Cabinet, in an address before the American Bar Association assembled in convention in Minneapolis, made these high professions:

"The Monroe doctrine does not attempt to establish a protectorate over Latin-American states. * * * I utterly disclaim as unwarranted the observations which occasionally have been made implying a claim on our part to superintend the affairs of our sister Republics, to assert an overlordship, to consider the spread of our authority beyond our own domain as the aim of our policy, and to make our power the test of right in this hemisphere. I oppose all such misconceived and unsound assertions and intimations. They do not express our national purpose; they belie our sincere friendship; they are false to the fundamental principles of our institutions and of our foreign policy, which has sought to reflect, with rare exceptions, the ideals of liberty; they menace us by stimulating a distrust which has no real foundation. They find no sanction whatever in the Monroe doctrine. There is room in this hemisphere, without danger of collision, for complete recognition of that doctrine and the independent sovereignty of the Latin-American Republics."

What was the cause of the last two rather heated restatements of the spirit of the Monroe doctrine? What had been done since the lofty expressions of John W. Foster to call forth the above indictment from President Wilson or the violent protest of Mr. Hughes?

PRESIDENT TAFT'S VIEW

Viallate, in his Economic Imperialism (p. 62), quotes William Howard Taft, who in the meantime had also been President, as stating our Latin-American policy as follows:

"While our policy should not be turned a hairbreadth from the straight path of justice, it may well be made to include intervention to secure for our merchants and our capitalists opportunity for profitable investments which shall inure to the benefit of both countries." (Senate hearings on "Foreign loans," p. 86. The italics are mine.)

It is to Theodore Roosevelt that we must look for a solution of this apparent contradiction of aims and policies. Under President Roosevelt the spirit of the Monroe doctrine suffered a fundamental change. Until his administration the European powers had been left free to collect their own loans and protect their own nationals and property in the Latin-American countries. For over 80 years European governments had from time to time bombarded Latin-American ports and landed troops on Latin-American territory to enforce settlement of disputes; and our diplomacy had always allowed a reasonable time to elapse before the Monroe doctrine was strictly applied. One of the chief results of this was that the enmity of the Latin-American Republics rested on the direct aggressors.

But President Roosevelt initiated the policy of making the United States the "policeman of the Western Continent." The assumption which he raised was that it was our duty to use the military forces of the United States to insure the settlement of all disputes in Latin America and to protect European as well as American life and property there if they were endangered; that if we did not do so the European powers would come in, would stay permanently on the Western Continent, and so would threaten our national safety. The Monroe doctrine was stretched to cover this new policy. At once Latin-American enmity began to rest on the United States alone, since we were the policeman in all difficulties.

Obviously the Roosevelt policy itself was nothing but an indication of a fundamental change in our own attitude toward Latin America. From this it was only a logical step to the policy of President Taft, Roosevelt's successor—"intervention to secure for our merchants and our capitalists opportunity for profitable investments."

At the beginning of President Wilson's first administration we had made such progress in this direction and the Monroe doctrine had been stretched so far that John Callan O'Laughlin, First Assistant Secretary of State under President Roosevelt and at present editor of the Army and Navy Journal, could say in his Imperiled America:

"We are seeking to make and we proudly call the Caribbean Sea an American lake. * * * We are maintaining a financial protectorate over Santo Domingo. We are applying the same system to Haiti and Nicaragua and have arranged for the purchase of the Danish West Indies. We kept a dictator out of Venezuela and drove another out of Nicaragua."

It is interesting to compare these various interpretations of the Monroe doctrine with what our Latin-American policy actually has been at the times they were uttered and under the men who were uttering them. Mr. O'Laughlin states the case correctly for the day in which he was speaking. President Wilson, in spite of his fair words at Mobile, did nothing to arrest and everything to sustain the very policy in Latin America against which he was protesting. Mr. Hughes's policy will be referred to later. In terms of deeds, not words, our course in Latin America has advanced without a single deviation along the channel laid down for it by Presidents Roosevelt and Taft.

At the present time, instead of maintaining "financial protectorates" over our sister Republics in Latin America, it would be more correct to say that we are holding them under a form of military and financial dictatorship. These various military and financial dictatorships have been imposed upon the Latin-American countries under successive administrations and by the force of American arms since 1909 up to and including the present day.

In the case of the Dominican Republic we began by placing over her a military government under United States auspices, supported by the United States marines, with a lieutenant commander of the Navy as the "officer administering the affairs of finance and commerce for the military government." To secure payment of six different American loans, the first in 1907 and the last in 1922 and a seventh loan in 1924, "a specific charge on the customs revenues" was made, these revenues to be "collected during the life of the bonds by an official appointed by the President of the United States." The "agreement" by which the revenues of the Dominican Republic were thus laid under mortgage was made between the United States and the United States controlled military government in Santo Domingo, the bond issue bearing the guaranties of the military government as an "irrevocable obligation of the Dominican Republic." (Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate, hearing before subcommittee on foreign loans, Exhibits 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, et seq.)

MILITARY RULE IN SANTO DOMINGO

A provisional government was established in Santo Domingo by the military governor, United States Admiral Robison, on October 21, 1922, to provide for holding elections and reorganizing the government. On July 12, 1924, Gen. Horacio Vasquez, elected President for four years, was inaugurated. The convention between the United States and the new Vasquez government stipulated that all acts of the United States military for the past 17 years be ratified; all American loans be assumed as public debt, including a sinking-fund issue bearing 9 to 18 per cent interest; and a new refunding loan be accepted running up to $25,000,000. The customs receivership was extended until all loans were paid. Thus liberty in our sister Republic of Santo Domingo has a new birth under a fresh mortgage of her public revenues to American bankers, subject to foreclosure by intervention of the United States marines at any time when the public revenues fall short of bond and interest requirements.

We entered Haiti with our marines in 1915, during a revolution, under Wilson's first administration. The excuse under which we acted was that of restoring order in the country. By 1916 we had advanced so far with this program that the legislative body of the Haitian Government was dissolved and deputies and senators were forcibly expelled by American marines, after which the legislative palace was padlocked. Shortly afterwards an election was held under American auspices and a Senate and Chamber of Deputies more to our liking were elected. The first duty of this new Congress was to adopt a new constitution. The American legation made specific recommendations as to clauses in this new constitution, and these were duly handed to the members of the new Congress by the new Haitian Government.

These "suggestions," however, were not universally adopted by the new Congress; and again, in June of 1917, gendarmes under the command of a United States officer of marines invaded the legislative palace.

The files were looted and all records pertaining to the work already done by the Congress were taken away. Deputies and Senators were expelled, the legislative palace was once more padlocked, and a military guard was sent to prevent the reassembling of the legislators.

Then, in 1918, a constitution for Haiti was drafted in Washington and forwarded to Haiti to be submitted to a vote of the people. A farcical "plebiscite" was held, with United States marine officers in command of gendarmes running the polling; blue ballots were for and red ballots were against, and the Haitian people, now thoroughly intimidated, were told to cast blue ballots. The American-written constitution was adopted by a vote of 99,000 to some scattering few hundreds in opposition.

This constitution, now in force, provides for the election of the President and of the members of Congress by the people. It states that the election shall be called by the President on an even-numbered year, but does not specify what year. The constitution also provides that until an election is called the legislative authority shall be vested in a council of state composed of 21 members, all of whom are appointed by the President. This council of state is given authority to choose a President in case no popular election is held. Up to date no even-numbered year has been found in which to hold an election, although nearly 10 years have elapsed since the constitution went into force. All efforts on the part of patriotic Haitians to obtain a popular election have failed. The same President, Borno, is elected by the council of state year after year, he having himself appointed the council of state which elects him.

This Haitian incident gives an excellent cross-section of what our Latin-American policy has actually become. Under President Wilson, who said "we must prove ourselves their friends and champions upon terms of equality and honor," we entered Haiti by force, twice dissolved her legislative assembly at the point of the gun, wrote a constitution and forced it upon the Haitian people, and set up on Haitian soil a government contrary to all the principles of political freedom. This policy was in turn denounced by President Harding, but was carried on by him without change. It was being actively carried on by the State Department at the moment that Secretary of State Hughes was saying: "I utterly disclaim, as unwarranted, the observations which occasionally have been made implying a claim on our part to superintend the affairs of our sister Republics, to assert an overlordship, to consider the spread of our authority beyond our own domains as the aim of our policy, and to make our power the test of right in this hemisphere."

FINANCIAL DICTATORSHIP

South American Republics have not escaped the net of American financial dictatorship. In Bolivia, on May 31, 1923, an issue of $33,000,000 of 25-year 8 per cent bonds was contracted to New York bankers, secured by a mortgage on all public revenues as well as by stock of the Bolivia National Bank, with this unique redemption feature: "This bond is redeemable * * * on or after May 1, 1937, and not before, at the rate of 105 per cent of its par value and accrued interest." Bolivia's public revenues were, under the contract, placed in the control of a commission of three men, two of whom, including the chairman, were American bankers. A telegram from the United States Secretary of State certified to the execution of the instrument. (Exhibits 4, 5, 6, "Foreign loans" subcommittee, 1925–26.)

The case of the Salvador 1923 loan is only another illustration. The details are reported by the New York Commercial and Financial Chronicle (October 13 and 16, 1923), the Diario Official of El Salvador (February 20, 1923), and in the Senate committee hearings on "Foreign loans" (Exhibits 1, 2, 3, "Foreign loans" subcommittee, 1925–26). In that year Salvador contracted for new bond issues aggregating $18,500,000, at 8 per cent and 7 per cent, respectively, for American loans and 6 per cent for a smaller British sterling loan. Secretary Hughes on October 16, 1923, issued the following statement defining the official relations of the State Department to the loan contract in question:

"The Department of State has no relation to the matter except with respect to facilitating the arbitration and determination of disputes that may arise between the parties and the appointment of a collector of customs in case of default. * * * The Secretary of State has consented to use his good offices in referring such disputes to the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States. * * * Also, at the request of the Government of Salvador and the interested bankers, the Secretary of State has consented to assist in the selection of the collector of customs. * * * The contract also provides that the collector of customs, if appointed, will communicate to the Department of State for its records such regulations relating to the customs administration as may be prescribed, and also a monthly and annual report."

This means in plain terms that the Secretary of State, 60 days after his Minneapolis speech denying any "claim on our part to superintend the affairs of our sister Republics," himself takes over the superintendence of the customs revenues of the Republic of Salvador. Six millions of the above-mentioned bonds were sold to the President of the United Fruit Co. at 88 per cent of par value, according to the contract approved by the State Department. Commenting on the whole transaction the Diario Official of El Salvador states that President Molina at first withheld his approval "because of the clauses robbing Salvador of her financial autonomy." But at length, through public need in Salvador and pressure on the part of the United States, the contract was signed—on the centenary of the signing of the Monroe doctrine.

The situation in Nicaragua, lately much in the public eye, is the same as elsewhere in Latin America, with several flagrant features of its own. The excuse of protecting our canal-route concessions in Nicaragua is made the justification for controlling by force the internal affairs of that country, although no party or individual in Nicaragua has ever proposed to violate those concessions, and no sane man supposes that they could be violated by any Nicaraguan Government. Behind all this is a shadow of financial intrigue and imposition so shameful that American public opinion would instinctively repudiate our Nicaraguan policy if the facts were widely known. These facts are a matter of record in the Senate Hearings on Nicaragua, 1914, and on Foreign Loans, 1927.

Instances could be multiplied indefinitely; any well-informed American citizens is now aware that our present Latin-American policy is frankly one of economic aggression involving political dictatorship. It is still covered by the name of the Monroe doctrine, but it has nothing in common with that doctrine as originally enunciated. In Costa Rica, Honduras, and Guatemala, as well as in the countries already mentioned, the American financial protectorate is based on the same general methods. American banking and bonding interests, trading corporations, public utilities, hemp and timber concessions, represent the principal enterprises for which our Federal Government practices "dollar diplomacy" in Latin America. The State Department acts as commercial agency and diplomatic referee. The Navy Department furnishes and directs the United States marines to enforce the terms of the contract. The customs revenues of the various Republics are the principal securities for American loans and investments, and the levying and collection of these funds are placed in the hands of agents either directly or indirectly responsible to the United States Government.

BENEFITS TO LATIN AMERICA

I am well aware of certain material advantages which we have brought about in Latin America during the past 25 years; I can from personal observation testify to the good roads, the harbor improvements, the sanitary betterment and the great work we have done in the elimination of preventable disease. But this is not the real question. If such things have not been achieved by the Latin-American countries themselves, and if they have been bought at the price of liberty and freedom, they are not worth while and will not endure.

The danger exists not only for Latin America but quite as clearly for our own institutions at home. Since when have we entertained the pernicious theory that we must lift all neighboring countries to our own standards of life by military force and political control if need be? The moment that theory is actually accepted by the United States we shall have lost the cause for which the American Revolution was fought and in whose name our Republic came into being as a Nation. The country that denies freedom abroad has lost freedom at home.

Old-fashioned as it may seem, I still believe in the principles of human liberty. I still believe that the only way for humanity to advance is for the different unit-peoples all over the world to be left to govern themselves. I still believe that right and justice as between nations can not only be professed but can actually be practiced. I still believe in honest diplomacy, in doing what you promise, in calling a spade a spade.

In the case of the Monroe doctrine we must do one of two things. Either we must abandon the idealism of the Monroe doctrine altogether, acknowledging frankly what our acts are in Latin America and accepting the consequences both at home and abroad, or we must revive the idealism of the Monroe doctrine, cleave to it in deeds as in words, and make our acts square with our professions.

It is a moral issue of first proportions. But moral issues work themselves out in practical results.

The question before us is, Can we afford, in dollars and cents, to pursue our present policy in Latin America much longer? Has "dollar diplomacy" really paid, in terms of national gain? It undoubtedly has paid well for a few interests and individuals. But does all this actually pay to the general commercial enterprise of the Nation? The following statistics for 1925 and 1926 are taken from the monthly summary of the Department of Commerce for the year ended December, 1926:

United States exports to—	Calendar year		Change (per cent)
	1925	1926
Mexico	$144,720,323	$134,994,164	−7
Costa Rica	6,800,819	6,312,416	−7
Honduras	9,569,937	7,540,286	−21
Nicaragua	7,434,539	5,264,272	−15
Salvador	9,193,916	9,556,521	+4
Cuba	198,655,032	160,487,680	−19
Dominican Republic	17,763,577	14,572,376	−18
Haitian Republic	13,711,585	10,857,427	−22
Total	407,849,726	350,585,142	−14

Thus, granting that the activities of the State Department and the employment of the United States marines have brought profits to perhaps a score of our leading industrial and financial interests, what is the gain to the general business of the country, to the merchants, manufacturers, and farmers who have to work without the special services of the Federal Government in their behalf? Their lot seems to be to bear in taxation a share of the expense of a policy which benefits only a privileged few, a policy which netted a loss in trade of $57,200,000 to the Nation, or 14 per cent of our total exports to eight of our sister Latin-American Republics in the calendar year just closed. These are serious figures. When an export trade shrinks at the rate of 14 per cent a year, something is radically wrong with the policy which controls it. It is time to face the question in all candor. Are we not "killing the goose that lays the golden egg" in Latin America?

The moral issue can not be evaded. An unconscious boycott of American goods, based on growing enmity, is obviously beginning to operate in Latin America. And every day that our present hypocritical Latin America policy goes on, we are losing prestige in the field of international relations; every day we are gaining the increased enmity of all the American Continent outside our own borders.

The time may come when we shall need friends in the western continent and elsewhere in the world. Before we discovered "dollar diplomacy" we had grown from a wilderness and a strip of seaboard to be the greatest and most respected Nation in the world; we traded with all countries; our flag was welcomed wherever it went; and our trade followed the flag, because it was universally understood that behind our policy lay "a high moral principle of ethics and government." But to-day in Latin America we are rapidly dissipating the proud heritage of our traditions and history.

I said that both the spirit and the letter of the Monroe doctrine were dead. No European power is likely ever again to attempt to colonize the American Continent. If such a move were made, it would immediately call forth the armed opposition of the United States, regardless of the Monroe doctrine or any other policy. Thus to keep the bare name of the Monroe doctrine alive, when its only excuse is as a cover for ulterior acts and motives, is a constant source of irritation on the American Continent. The most statesmanlike policy which the United States could pursue in Latin America to-day would be officially to revive in all their force and integrity, in terms of present-day conditions, the ideals which the Monroe doctrine originally espoused.

A NEGRO'S VIEWS OF SENATOR BLEASE

Mr. BLEASE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial relating to myself appearing in the Pittsburgh Courier, of Pittsburgh, Pa., on December 24 last.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. The editorial is as follows:

A DANGEROUS MAN

Senator COLE BLEASE, Democrat (of course), of South Carolina, is a dangerous man. He is a menace both to the Nation and to the Negro race. Rising from the depths of illiterate South Carolina, he has for years disgraced and sullied the National Capitol by his presence and by his ignorant, insane, anti-Negro propaganda. He loses no opportunity to spew his venom upon the Negro nor does he ever hesitate to fan the flames of race prejudice on every occasion. When the Aiken massacre shocked the intelligent people of his State and of the Nation, and when humanitarians in every part of the country were denouncing the foul crime, it was the unspeakable BLEASE who aligned himself with the forces of lynchocracy and offered them his services. Supposed to be representing the 900,000 negroes of his backward State, he never misses an opportunity to insult them and their brethren in every part of the country. Supposed to be representing the 900,000 white people of South Carolina, he has aligned himself with the forces of reaction in opposing the passage of child labor laws that would emancipate little children from machine slavery in the cotton mills. Sworn to uphold the Federal Constitution, he not only connives in but advocates its violation. Wedded to the enforcement of the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution, he strives for the violation of the manhood rights guaranteed by the preceding ones.

Now he runs true to form by seeking to put a further premium upon bastardy, adultery, fornication, and concubinage in this country. To this end he has introduced a bill in the United States Senate which would prohibit the intermarriage of negroes and Caucasians anywhere in the United States as it is prohibited in his own benighted State of South Carolina. This bill would render any such marriages, of no matter what duration, null and void and would subject the parties to them to imprisonment, along with the officiating clergymen or magistrates. When it is considered that already 29 States in the United States have enacted similar legislation, the possibility of such a pernicious law is by no means as remote as some might think. Another bill he has introduced in the Senate would require separate accommodations for white and black passengers on the street cars in the District of Columbia, where already segregation and discrimination because of color stalks triumphant.

The two hateful bills have been referred to committees where it is probable that they may be buried, but with this man continually urging their passage there is no way to be sure that at some future time they may not actually come up for passage. Like many of his southern white brethren—and many in the North—BLEASE is an indefatigable propagandist for crackerism in all its hated forms. He fails to recognize or ignores the fact that the Negro is a citizen, and the Federal Constitution means little or nothing to him. In his bitter hatred of the Negro he will go to any lengths to insult, hamper, and humiliate him. A power in the principal legislative body of the Nation, he is using his position at every opportunity to undermine the foundations of good government. More than any other Member of the Senate, he is a danger and a menace, and all those who sincerely strive for the better race relations will breathe easier when he is finally returned to the obscurity from which he ought never to have emerged.

INVESTIGATION OF NAVAL OIL RESERVE LEASES

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 101) submitted by Mr. NORRIS on January 4, 1928, was read, as follows:

Whereas in the Sixty-seventh Congress the Senate passed Senate Resolutions 282 and 294, which resolutions directed the Committee on Public Lands to investigate the entire subject of the leases upon naval oil reserves with particular reference to the protection of the rights and equities of the Government of the United States and the preservation of its natural resources; and

Whereas said committee never completed said investigation, the same having been suspended because of the refusal of one Harry F. Sinclair to answer the questions of the committee, and said committee has never made any final report to the Senate; and

Whereas in the case of the United States against Harry F. Sinclair and Albert B. Fall it was disclosed upon the trial that a fraudulent corporation, known as the Continental Trading Co. of Canada, had been organized for the purpose of using the profits of its business in the bribing of public officials of the United States and for other dishonest, dishonorable, and illegal purposes; and

Whereas it was disclosed upon said trial that profits of said corporation were invested in Liberty bonds of the United States and that only a portion of said Liberty bonds so invested had been definitely traced and accounted for and that a large amount of Liberty bonds coming into the hands of said fraudulent corporation had been unaccounted for and unexplained: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the said Committee on Public Lands be, and it is hereby, authorized and directed to renew and to continue the investigation provided for in said Resolutions 282 and 294, and said resolutions are hereby renewed as fully and as completely as though they were herein fully set forth; and be it further

Resolved, That said committee is specifically directed to make an investigation as to the transactions and activities of the said fraudulent corporation, the Continental Trading Co. of Canada, and it is specifically directed to trace all the Government bonds held and dealt in by said corporation with the purpose of ascertaining the beneficiary or beneficiaries of all the illegal transactions connected with the fraudulent and dishonest sale or leasing of the said naval oil reserves.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I wish to submit a parliamentary inquiry to the Chair with respect to the resolution which has just been adopted. The parliamentary inquiry is whether under the law that resolution should be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. I should like to state to the Chair, if he has not followed the reading of the resolution closely, that the original resolution authorizing the investigation did go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate and money was authorized to be used for that purpose. The resolution which has just been adopted merely directs the committee to proceed and continue the investigation. Now the question arises whether it is necessary that the resolution extending the jurisdiction of the committee and directing them to proceed further with the investigation should go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. I myself do not believe that the committee died with the end of the session. I think under the Supreme Court's decision it continues, but in this resolution it is stated that the other resolutions are renewed as fully as though they were set forth in this resolution.

Mr. MOSES. May I suggest to the Senator that in that event further expenditure under the resolution is to be paid out of a new appropriation, a new contingent fund for the Seventieth Congress, and I think, therefore, that the resolution should go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. NORRIS. I myself do not believe in being technical about it, but if the resolution should be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses it will only mean a delay of a day or two, and rather than have any doubt about it or have the question raised, I ask that the vote whereby the resolution was agreed to may be reconsidered and that the resolution may be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the vote whereby the resolution was adopted is reconsidered, and without objection the resolution is referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

HENRY A. BELLOWS

The VICE PRESIDENT. The calendar under Rule VIII is in order and will be proceeded with.

The business on the Calendar of General Orders was the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 55) for the relief of Henry A. Bellows, which proposes to pay him for the period during which he served as a member of the Federal Radio Commission.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I ask that the joint resolution may go over for the reason that we are having hearings tomorrow on the question of the confirmation of the newly nominated members of the Radio Commission, and I think it would be well to have the joint resolution go over until after that hearing.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the joint resolution will go over. That completes the call of the Calendar.

ENFORCEMENT OF PROHIBITION

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD two very interesting editorials from the Charleston (S. C.) News and Courier, one entitled "Lawlessness—and a little Latin" and the other entitled "Demoralizing the elders."

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WATERMAN in the chair). Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

LAWLESSNESS—AND A LITTLE LATIN

The number of inhabitants in South Carolina in Governor Richards's administration is doubtless greater than it has been in any other, and the number of persons who make, sell, or transport intoxicants is certainly as great proportionately as it ever has been. Probably it is greater. That is sufficient to prove that the Richards administration is the most lawless that the State has had. It has more lawbreakers.

Although the Greenville News is unable to follow this argument of the News and Courier, it says that "in violating some of these laws (doubtless referring to those relating to Sunday observance, prize fighting, and others) last year we were not conscious of having turned criminal. We were enjoying the bliss of ignorance in our wholesale career of crime."

The News says too much, however, when it asserts that these laws were being violated last year and the year before. Of that no evidence is available. The News can't prove the violations. Hence it should not allege them. Governor Richards this year has produced the evidence of the lawlessness, and his administration is entitled to the credit. We bestow it. Having discovered the existence of great numbers of lawbreakers, who were not at large so far as the records disclose, in McLeod's time or Cooper's, the incumbent administration must accept them as its characteristic.

No one could go to court and swear out warrants against golf players and druggists of Aiken and Camden for violations in 1926, and until that is done they are entitled, under the Constitution, to the presumption of innocence—indeed, until they are convicted.

One of our friends, returning from the State fair, reports that he saw more people together than he has ever seen before in South Carolina, and that he saw more "drunks." It is astonishing that anyone drinks whisky in Columbia. How did the stuff get there? Have we not prohibition, both Federal and State, and a State administration holily resolved to enforce it? Yet it seems to persons with long memories that the energies of the State are not so fiercely directed against the violators of prohibition now as they were against the "blind tigers" between 1903 and 1900. Those were the days. The chasing of lawbreakers was incessant, and nothing was left undone to protect the traffic of the dispensers.

"It is difficult to blame all this on the Richards administration," the News observes. Who said anything about "blaming" it? Governor Richards is a fine old fellow, honestly intent on doing good. It would be ridiculous to "blame" any human creature for failing to chew as much as he has bitten off. He has passed 60.

How can the dear old gentleman control the thousands of wild young bucks under 30? His generation has passed, and no one expects him to be aware of what us youngsters are about.

Besides, as the News and Courier has said, our generation is demoralizing most of the elders. The governor is one of the few, the noble few, Pikes Peaks of nineteenth century virtue left standing. We, the wicked and perverse, admire and extol him.

"O temopora! O mores!" Governor Richards made neither the tempora nor the mores. Despite the lawlessness of his administration he is doing much good by precepts and example. He may continue to bite off more than he can chew, and there will be much to amuse, but the Commonwealth of South Carolina will not be disgraced or seriously damaged while Richards is governor. "Clarum et venerabile nomen gentibus."

DEMORALIZING THE ELDERS

Without disagreeing with the Bamberg Herald that gambling games at fairs should be forbidden and prevented, these expressions of its editorial article excite our interest: "It is the moral effect on our young people, however, that especially interests us. If our Government authorities permit open gambling at fairs, our boys may well argue to themselves, Why is it wrong to gamble elsewhere?"

What is of more concern, we mildly hint to the Herald, is the "moral effect" on our old people of the behavior of the young.

Does not the Herald suspect that the young people are leading their elders astray?

If all the girls smoke cigarettes, how is "mother" to resist the temptation?

If the young man takes a flask to a dance, will not "daddy" succumb?

If the sophomore, girl or boy, bet $2 on the Carolina-Citadel game, how are the "old grads" to escape the contagion?

In old times the example of old people contaminated the young, but that was before the young got loose. Should not something be done to rescue the middle-aged and the venerable from the insidious influence of their children and grandchildren?

A generation ago, when the elders were in control, they forbade their young wrongful indulgences because they were wrong, not because there was a law against them. In some way or other these elders absorbed the idea of the wrong of betting from teaching.

One can think of the possibility of teaching young people what is wrong now by appealing to their good sense.

"SENATOR WALSH'S PART"—ARTICLE BY FRANK R. KENT

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, in a recent issue of the Baltimore Sun there appeared a very excellent and able article by Mr. Frank R. Kent discussing the part played by the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] in the recent Teapot Dome scandal. I ask that I may have the article inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE GREAT GAME OF POLITICS—SENATOR WALSH'S PART

Though it is true, as the sly Mr. Slemp with a satisfied smile so astutely says in accounting for Republican strength and the futility of Democrat attack, that "prosperity absorbs all criticism," it does seem that to the reflecting few there would come occasionally as they consider certain facts a feeling that this would be a pretty sad sort of country if it were not for the Democrats, regardless of their dissensions, stupidity and shortcomings. To those who think that uncovering corruption in politics and government is a real public service, who consider the moral welfare of a people as important as their material welfare, unless their memories are bad, it must seem that, out of power though it is, the Democratic Party has not been without its uses in the last four years.

It was pointed out here the other day that if it had not been for Senator REED of Missouri, a Democrat, the two most outrageous political scandals that have occurred in a generation—those connected with the election of Mr. VARE in Pennsylvania and Mr. SMITH in Illinois—would have totally escaped national notice, and these gentlemen would in a few days take their Senate seats without so much as a critical or unkind word.

The present ugly—it's a mild word—situation in Washington, where the grand jury is investigating charges of jury tampering in the interests of Mr. Sinclair, who, along with Mr. Fall, has been denounced by the Supreme Court for "fraud, conspiracy, and corruption," ought to call attention to the public service of another Democrat—Senator THOMAS J. WALSH of Montana—even greater than that of Senator REED.

It ought to recall that, if it had not been for Senator WALSH, Mr. Fall and Mr. Doheny and Mr. Fall and Mr. Sinclair would have succeeded in stealing the naval oil reserves of the Nation at Elk Hills and Teapot Dome and would—all three of them—to-day be living among us as honorable and respectable men, utterly free of that indelible Supreme Court brand that marks them. It was Senator WALSH, blocked and thwarted at every turn by the Republican organiaztion and without sympathy or help from the Republican administration, and in the face of a barrage of newspaper criticism that he was "playing politics," seeking publicity, making a mountain out of a molehill, who kept at his job until he brought the amazing facts to light.

When the results of his work are considered it does seem that, even in such a material age as this, something more of national appreciation and gratitude should go to him. The Nation has recovered its great oil reserves. The men who had conspired to take them away have been compelled to pay back to the Government more than $10,000,000. The Supreme Court in two burning decisions has unanimously upheld the WALSH contentions, and in denouncing the defendants employed words that in the last campaign when used in the Democratic platform and by Democratic spokesmen were called partisan and demagogic.

One criminal case ended in a jury acquittal of Mr. Fall and Mr. Doheny, but in the other jury case it has resulted in a mistrial, due to the espionage established over the jury by a detective agency employed by Sinclair interests. There will be a new trial in January.

Since the Supreme Court decisions and the Sinclair trial a great many newspapers that in the 1924 campaign minimized the whole Fall-Doheny-Sinclair business scoring the Democratic charges as hysteria and political claptrap, have teemed with denunciatory editorials. Some are in a high state of indignation. Some seem to favor burning Mr. Sinclair at the stake. Very few, however, ever mention the name of the quiet, determined, resourceful, able, and modest man whose dogged fight against great odds prevented the complete success of one of the greatest frauds ever attempted against the Government of the United States.

It does seem that it would occur that Senator WALSH has done something worth even now a word of praise; that glorious as it is to be prosperous, magnificent though it may be to reduce taxes when revenues are vastly in excess of expenditures, splendid though it is to preach economy and advocate happiness, the single-handed uncovering of so vast a governmental conspiracy, with such complete vindication of the effort, ought to entitle Senator WALSH to a little more credit than he gets. It ought, in fact, to make him more or less of a national hero. Prosperity seems not only to absorb all criticism but, so far as the public is concerned, about every other mental faculty there is.

THE MERCHANT MARINE

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I understand the Senator from Florida wishes to address the Senate.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I desire to make some observations on the subject of the American merchant marine, and I ask unanimous consent to proceed with those remarks at this time, although there is now no measure pending before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the Senator from Florida proceeding? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from Florida is recognized.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, James Freeman Clarke, as I remember, made at one time a statement which very much impressed me. It was to the effect that the difference between a politician and a statesman is that a politician thinks of the next election and the statesman thinks of the next generation.

We have reached a very critical stage in respect of our merchant marine, and I wish to appeal to the talents and abilities in both this body and the other—and there are in both bodies men so equipped as to be classed as statesmen—to consider this subject from the standpoint of statesmanship, from the standpoint of the next generation.

Our merchant marine has reached a stage where, in all probability, we will lose our position on the high seas in a very few years. Our ships are vanishing now, and it is absolutely necessary that Congress take a positive position with reference to establishing and maintaining an adequate American merchant marine.

We are without much guidance or leadership at present with respect to that great subject. With the utmost respect for the President, and without any purpose of criticizing or finding fault, I feel that it is proper now to analyze briefly his message to Congress delivered at the beginning of this session, on December 6, 1927.

Under the heading of "Merchant marine" the President said:

> The United States Government fleet is transporting a large amount of freight and reducing its drain on the Treasury.

That is a condensed statement, very clearly put, and covering a great deal of ground. I fully agree with every word of it.

He further said:

> The Shipping Board is constantly under pressure, to which it too often yields, to protect private interests, rather than serve the public welfare.

If I understand the English language, that is a severe indictment of the Shipping Board, somewhat more remarkable in view of the fact that six members of that board have been appointed by the President, and one of them has been reappointed. No doubt the President had before him facts which justified this severe arraignment of the Shipping Board. I should say, however, without being authorized to make any defense of the Shipping Board, that in my judgment this yielding to private interests rather than serving the public has been largely due to the policy insisted upon by the White House.

Undoubtedly the Shipping Board has served private interests without regard to public interests in pursuing a policy directed, it would seem, from the White House to get speedily out of business, and to transfer promptly and without delay the ships owned by the Government into private hands. In pursuance of that policy ships have been sacrificed. They have been practically given away. Private interests have been served, the public interest has been ignored, in following that course, resulting from emphasis being placed on the secondary purpose as expressed in the merchant marine act of 1920, rather than upon the primary purpose as emphasized in that act over and over again. In the very beginning of the act and throughout the act, when powers were given to the Shipping Board to sell the ships, it was provided that always they must keep in view the primary purpose of establishing and maintaining an adequate merchant marine.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. Does the Senator mean to imply by his remarks that the ships as now operated are not carrying out the purpose of the law and helping to maintain an effective merchant marine?

Mr. FLETCHER. I think the present plan of operation is succeeding fairly well. I find no fault with that. It is the policy of getting out of business and getting rid of the ships that has been insisted upon which, in my judgment, has resulted in serving private interests rather than the public interests.

Mr. COPELAND. Will the Senator yield further?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. COPELAND. Of course, the shipping act does provide that at the earliest moment these ships shall be turned over to private operation. Is it not a fact, however, that the ships which the Senator has in mind, having been turned over to private operation, are being operated effectively to maintain for us an American merchant marine?

Mr. FLETCHER. I will show to the Senator before I get through that, notwithstanding these sacrifices, and notwithstanding the pursuit of this policy day in and day out for eight or nine years, there is to-day less tonnage privately owned under the American flag in foreign commerce than there was in 1914—excluding, I mean, the tankers, which everyone knows are owned by oil companies and other concerns using them in carrying their own products and not engaged in general commerce.

The Senator, however, is in error with reference to the language of the act of 1920. That act does not say that the purpose is to pass these ships into private hands as speedily as possible. It says that the purpose and policy of Congress is to establish and maintain an adequate American merchant marine to serve our commerce in times of peace and as auxiliaries to the Navy in times of war, ultimately to be passed into private hands. The secondary thing is passing into private hands not the primary thing at all; and the emphasis has been laid by the administration upon the secondary purpose ultimately to pass into private hands. "Ultimately" means finally, not speedily, not at once; but finally the idea of Congress was that these ships might pass into private hands.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator has spoken about the decline in the tonnage. Of course the decline of which he speaks has no relationship to the lines which have been sold by the Shipping Board, because those lines are operated effectively in maintaining an adequate American merchant marine. I refer specifically, for instance, to the President ships. They were sold cheaply; they are now in private hands; but they are being operated—effectively operated, as I view it—and so the American merchant marine in toto has not suffered by reason of the sale and disposal of those particular ships to private parties.

Mr. FLETCHER. I understand the Senator's proposition. With reference to the President ships, there were seven magnificent passenger and cargo carriers, costing the Government over $30,000,000, sold for $4,500,000 payable during a period of five years, with a guaranty only that they would be operated in that service for five years. That time has nearly expired. What will become of the ships after that guaranty terminates no one can tell. They may go into the coastwise trade. They may abandon that service entirely. They have a perfect right to do it. But though they were the finest ships afloat on any ocean, they were sold for something like 10 per cent of their cost, and they were new ships.

I can give other illustrations. It would take me all day to cite these instances, but one I recall particularly:

A German ship was seized by this Government. She was used in the transport service. She cost to build $1,600,000. After the war the Shipping Board concluded to recondition that ship and make her a passenger ship and put her in the service from Los Angeles to the west coast of South America. They spent $2,000,000 on the ship. They spent, within a month of her sale, $43,000 on hotel supplies placed in the ship; and they sold that ship, with the furnishings and hotel supplies and all equipment, for $100,000. That ship was the City of Los Angeles. Is not that a clear illustration of taking care of private interests rather than regarding the public interest?

Other instances of a similar kind can be pointed out; and it seems to me that they must have arisen under the policy dictated by the administration to get out of business and pass these ships into private hands.

Says the President:

> More attention should be given to merchant ships as an auxiliary of the Navy.

Precisely; I quite agree with that. That is a most important thing to consider in this connection. If Great Britain had not owned the enormous merchant fleet that she did own at the beginning of the submarine policy on the part of Germany, she would have been out of the war within eight weeks after the submarines began sinking merchant ships on the sea. It was her merchant marine rather than her floating batteries, her navy, her battleships and cruisers, that saved the situation for Great Britain in that time of trouble.

Is not that a lesson for the United States? Can we afford to sink our ships, give them away, and have them pass out of existence? As a great Nation, can we take such a position as that? I say to the Senate now that the question is now, to-day, not whether we shall have private ownership or private operation of a merchant marine, or Government ownership and Government operation, but whether we shall have any merchant marine at all or not. That is the question. So the President is entirely right in emphasizing the importance of merchant ships as auxiliaries of the Navy.

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WATERMAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. ODDIE. I would like to ask the Senator if he has investigated a supposed lobby that is representing a powerful interest on the Pacific coast, that has been exerting a great deal of influence to secure these ships from the Shipping Board for speculative purposes, rather than as a service to the country?

Mr. FLETCHER. I have no particular knowledge of that lobby, and I have made no study or investigation respecting it. I will be very glad, indeed, to have the information which the Senator suggests.

I do say this, that to guarantee the operation of a particular service for a period of only five years is practically no guaranty at all. Five years is but an hour in the life of a nation, and that has been heretofore the extent of the guaranties in the sale of these ships, guaranteeing to maintain the service for a period of five years, without any guaranty at all with reference to replacements, without any guaranty that other ships will be substituted for those that may go down or be lost or wear out. In a five-year period a whole line may go to pieces, and of course eventually the ships must disappear. They wear out. There has never been in any contract in any sale any guaranty for replacing the ships.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Senator has quoted from the President where he urged that our merchant marine be developed along the line of an auxiliary to the Navy. Have not that thought and idea been suggested again and again on the floor of this Chamber? That has been urged again and again, and I now ask the Senator what concrete act or step has been taken by anybody to develop the merchant marine along that line?

Mr. FLETCHER. I will say to the Senator that he is quite correct; that is one of the purposes set out in the merchant marine act of 1920. That act provides that in case of reconstruction regard shall be had for placing guns and that sort of thing on ships. That has been the idea running in the minds of Congress throughout all the legislation on this subject, and we have sought to emphasize that, and the merchant marine act does emphasize it. But what sort of auxiliary to the Navy do we have when we are told that we must get out of the business and pass these ships into private hands?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Practically nothing has been done.

Mr. FLETCHER. Nothing has been done.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Just vain words.

Mr. FLETCHER. The suggestion has been made—and I have no doubt that will be attended to—that Congress decide, as I think they ought to decide, definitely, positively, and clearly, that we propose to have an American merchant marine; and the only certain way of having it, the only known way, the only possible way at the present moment is for the Government to construct the ships and operate the ships. That being true, the Government will see to it that in all reconstruction and in all new construction this thought of serving the Navy will be provided for.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator will concede, will he not, that in order to accomplish the thing he has in mind it is necessary to change the law? The law, as it is at the present, as I recall to his attention section 5 of the merchant marine act of 1920, states specifically—

> That in order to accomplish the declared purposes of this act, and to carry out the policy declared in section 1 hereof—which is to have an effective merchant marine and prepare for the national defense—> the board is authorized and directed to sell, as soon as practicable, consistent with good business methods and the objects and purposes to be attained by this act, at public or private competitive sale after appraisement and due advertisement—

And so forth.

In other words, the Shipping Board is acting under this act, and the act specifically provides that these ships must be sold as soon as possible.

Mr. FLETCHER. It does not say they must be sold.

Mr. COPELAND. It says "authorized and directed to sell." That is the language.

Mr. FLETCHER. As soon as practicable, and on a business basis; not as a bankrupt concern, not as a concern forced to sell, not as the primary purpose of the act at all, but in pursuance of the expressed purpose to establish and maintain an American merchant marine.

Mr. COPELAND. I do not think there is any difference between the Senator from Florida and myself, but I am convinced that if these ships are to be operated as the Senator suggests it is necessary to change this law, because, as I read the law, the Shipping Board is under obligation to dispose of these lines—is directed to dispose of these lines as soon as possible.

Mr. FLETCHER. Not as soon as possible, but as soon as practicable, only when they can accomplish the primary purpose, the establishment and maintenance of an American merchant marine. Otherwise, they have no business to sell.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FLETCHER. The merchant marine act of 1920 really does not need any tampering with or amendment or modification, in my judgment. It is plain and clear, if it is interpreted as it should be interpreted. The fault has been a misconstruction of the act, and an interpretation placed upon it which is not authorized or justified. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. In that connection, I want to call the attention of the Senator from Florida and the Senator from New York to a proviso in section 7 of the act, near the middle of the page:

> Provided further, That where steamship lines and regular service have been established and are being maintained by ships of the board at the time of the enactment of this act, such lines and service shall be maintained by the board until, in the opinion of the board, the maintenance thereof is unbusinesslike and against the public interests.

My information is that, without regard to that provision of the law, the Shipping Board has sold a number of these services without declaring them unbusinesslike, without declaring that the service was against the public interests. In my judgment, in so acting the Shipping Board has not only misconstrued the law, but it has deliberately violated the law.

Mr. FLETCHER. There is ample foundation for the Senator's thought on that subject, and I quite agree with him, the merchant marine act has not only been misinterpreted and misconstrued, but actually violated in the administration of the act. In doing that, this board, and not merely this present board, but whatever board was in office at the time these transactions took place, has served private interests and ignored the public interests.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. I seriously question the statement that the Shipping Board has violated the provision to which attention has been called by the Senator from Tennessee. These services are maintained, and it was specifically provided that when the ships were sold, the service should be maintained. I want to say further that this act contemplates a geographic distribution of the service. I doubt exceedingly if the Senator can point to the sale of any service which violates in any sense whatever the provision which he has read.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator from Florida will permit me to reply——

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I recall that there was a hearing in Memphis, Tenn., in reference to shipping matters some years ago, and members of the board who were there were very much surprised to find that there was any such provision as that in the law. Evidently it had not been called to their attention, or they had not noticed it before. To be accurate about the language of an inquiry I made at that time I would have to have it before me, and I have not it before me; but as I recall, I asked when they had declared the operation of certain lines unbusinesslike, or against the public interests. They said that they had not declared the operation of any lines unbusinesslike, or against the public interests. Therefore it seemed to me that in not having first declared, as required by this law, that the lines that were sold were either operated in an unbusinesslike manner or against the public interests, the board was without authority of any kind to sell such lines.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, if the Senator from Florida will yield to me a moment—I dislike to cut in on him, but it is not quite fair to let the comment of the Senator from Tennessee pass unnoticed. As a matter of fact, whether the Government operates these ships or whether they are operated by private individuals, if it is an unbusinesslike procedure and a useless procedure, why should anybody operate them?

As a matter of fact, whether the board knew it or not at the time of the conference spoken of by the Senator, when these services were sold on the Pacific coast there was no service interrupted, there was no port which was no longer served. Attention was given by the Shipping Board to the needs of that particular district. So, although it is not for me to defend them, and I desire to do it merely as a matter of simple justice, I do not believe the Shipping Board has violated the shipping act in any sense.

Mr. McKELLAR. I can easily understand why the Senator takes that view, because evidently he has not yet read the proviso. If the Senator will listen to the proviso again he will see how they violated it. It provides:

That where steamship lines and regular service have been established and are being maintained by ships of the board at the time of the enactment of this act, such lines and service shall be maintained by the board—until, in the opinion of the board, the maintenance thereof is unbusinesslike and against the public interests.

Not by private interests—

Of course it referred to the operation of the ships of the board. There can not be any question about it.

Mr. COPELAND. Does the Senator take that proviso entirely separate and apart from the context?

Mr. McKELLAR. Not at all. It was just giving the board the right to sell under certain circumstances and denying it the right to sell under other circumstances.

Mr. COPELAND. If the Senator will bear with me just a moment, if the board could dispose of these ships in such a way that there would be no interference with service, and that no section of the country should be interfered with, and that an effective American merchant marine might be carried out, according to the general purposes of the act, it would seem to me that the board acted very wisely.

Mr. McKELLAR. But at the same time they disregarded the law.

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. ODDIE. I would like to ask the Senator from New York if he thinks it is a wise thing for our ships to be turned over to the dictation, practically, of one international banker on the Pacific coast who is trying, through his influence, to obtain a monopoly of the shipping interests of our western coast section?

Mr. COPELAND. If the Senator from Florida will allow me to answer, I do not know that the statement made by the Senator from Nevada is the case. It would take more than one session of the Senate to convince the Senate that the statement or the implication is correct.

Mr. ODDIE. I think when the time comes there will be no question of convincing the Senate that this banker I have referred to on the Pacific coast, whose name I will not mention now, is exerting influence in obtaining these ships and that it will result in a practical monopoly if he has his will.

Mr. FLETCHER. A Senator sitting near me suggests that that is probably true of other coasts than the Pacific coast.

Mr. ODDIE. It goes farther than the Pacific coast.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, referring again to the matter under discussion, if a line is being conducted and proves to be unbusinesslike, and is losing money, hopelessly losing money, it does not help the establishment and maintenance of an American merchant marine, even to sell or give away that line to private parties. That does not help the situation any. The private concern, if it is a losing proposition, is going to break, too, and it is not fair to them to make such a sale.

On the other hand, it was expected all along that some of the lines established by the Shipping Board would at the beginning prove unprofitable. The idea was to extend our trade. The idea was to expand our commerce and open up new markets and develop trade, and the Shipping Board was expected to lose money in the beginning. But it was believed that eventually the public would get the benefit of these enlarged markets and this extension of our trade, and eventually the lines would become profitable.

Then, in my judgment, would be the time to sell, not when the line is nearly bankrupt and losing money every day. What sort of condition is it in to-day? Here is an enterprise of mine, we will say, in which I am losing money by the millions, day after day. Who will come and relieve me by buying this failing enterprise? Of course, that is an absurd thing to expect to take place, and yet that is the basis on which we have been proceeding. It is not fair. We can not get the price for such an enterprise that we ought to get for it. It is not the time to offer it for sale. The time to offer it for sale is after we have developed the routes and built up the trade and opened up the markets. Then we can say, "This line is a profitable enterprise. If private individuals want to acquire it, we are ready and willing to sell it."

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me again?

Mr. FLETCHER. Certainly; I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. Does the Senator believe that any American line can be made to pay in competition with foreign ships without some sort of subvention?

Mr. FLETCHER. I think it absolutely can be made to pay.

Mr. COPELAND. Has it been done as yet by the Shipping Board?

Mr. FLETCHER. The Shipping Board is now making a profit on the United States lines.

Mr. COPELAND. Is it making a profit if we count interest and depreciation?

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes; counting all factors entering into it. According to the statement made to me they made $330,000 last year.

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator, I am sure, will not take offense if I say I do not agree with him. I think there are many items left out of those figures. I doubt exceedingly if the United States Line has ever made a profit.

Mr. FLETCHER. I refuse to admit and I have always refused to admit that the American people can not operate ships just as well as any other people anywhere at any time. They have not been encouraged to do it. There has been an enormous amount of money made in shipping in this country by American citizens.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. EDGE. I am sure, while no one wants for a moment to minimize the ability of the American business man in any connection to compete favorably with the business man of any nation in the world, the Senator must admit that our shipowners are to-day compelled to compete with shipowners of other nations of the world on an entirely different financial basis.

Mr. COPELAND. And an impossible basis.

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not know about that. We have in New York, I think, perhaps the world's financial center. I think centers of trade have moved across the ocean. Centers of finance have moved across the ocean. Why we in this country can not finance the operations as well as the people of any other country on earth I can not comprehend. We can do it, but of course if people hold back and say "We are not going into this business until we are offered a subsidy, we are not going into this business until the Government in some way comes to our support and guarantees us a big profit," there will be some delay about it, because this Congress will not, and I do not believe any future Congress will, be hasty about granting subsidies to the shipping interests.

Mr. EDGE. Speaking of subsidies, the Senator is admitting, as I followed his discussion, that the American merchant marine is, and necessarily will be for some time to come, operated at a loss. Does the Senator believe as a clear business proposition that it is more defensible to pay a deficit, an admitted deficit, a known deficit, through appropriations by Congress, than to pay a businesslike subsidy for service? In either event the taxpayers pay.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think there is a vast difference. In the case of a subsidy, which we have tried in this country, there are apt to grow up, as there did grow up, tremendous scandals, and that is the situation in the case of subsidies of all varieties in other countries so far as I have been able to learn—favoritism, special interests, various reasons cause scandals to arise, and eventually all benefit intended by the subsidy disappears.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President——

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. BRUCE. Is it not true, however, that the English Government subsidizes English vessels and that no scandal or scandalous results have ever followed from that practice?

Mr. FLETCHER. No; it is not true. All that England ever did was to loan money at a low rate of interest to shipowners to build ships——

Mr. COPELAND. O Mr. President!

Mr. FLETCHER. And specified that they should be equipped as auxiliaries of the navy, and for that reason they helped build the ships.

Mr. BRUCE. I was under the impression that the English Government also subsidized the operation of the ships.

Mr. FLETCHER. No. No country in the world does it.

Mr. BRUCE. I am glad to be corrected.

Mr. COPELAND. O Mr. President, England does more than is suggested by the Senator from Florida. England not only pays a part of the construction cost of all vessels which are built in conference with the navy but England also pays the salaries of certain of the officers. Also she permits the crew to serve as naval auxiliary members, and then, in addition, she pays very liberal mail subventions.

I want to say further, if the Senator from Florida will permit me, that we have to choose, in my judgment, between the position taken by the Senator from Florida—and if there is no other way to do it I am with him, because I want to see an American merchant marine—between Government ownership and Government operation on the one hand and facing the fact that there must be some sort of subvention paid by the Government. For my part I favor the idea of a postal subvention. The times when we have had prosperity in our Navy can be readily shown by drawing a graphic chart showing the high tonnage when we have paid these postal subventions and when we have given no aid to the American merchant marine, showing how it has become depressed, its tonnage has been reduced, and we have practically been wiped off the seven seas. We must face that situation.

Mr. EDGE. Adverting to the statement I made a moment ago, it is my impression that it certainly was the situation a few years ago, though I have not followed it closely in recent years, that practically every country in the world administering a successful merchant marine has some form of subsidy, call it what we may, but some form of direct government aid.

Mr. FLETCHER. If the Senator will look carefully into the laws of the various countries, he will find himself in error. I have endeavored to trace that matter down, and I have been unable to find any instance of direct government aid. In Germany, for instance, where they operate the railroads they give special rates, perhaps, to some freight which is moved by their ships. As to subventions, we have been pretty liberal ourselves. Our mail contracts are quite liberal, and if it is thought wise to increase the pay for carrying the mail, perhaps I might agree with the Senator on that point. That is not exactly a subsidy, because we do not lose money by that operation. The Government receives quite as much as it pays for the carrying of the mail, as I understand it, and therefore there is no loss, there is not out-of-pocket expense, but it is a help to the ships.

Mr. BRUCE. I will ask the Senator whether it is not a fact that the cost of operating ships in foreign countries is much less than the cost in this country with respect to wages and cost of materials of every sort?

Mr. FLETCHER. I think, to be perfectly fair about it, that perhaps it does cost a little more to operate the ships under our flag than the foreign operators are required to meet.

Mr. BRUCE. For information I will ask the Senator how far are ships operated in other countries by the government? In Norway, for instance, do they not operate the ships?

Mr. FLETCHER. I think Canada is the only Government directly operating its merchant marine.

Mr. BRUCE. May not our inability to run a merchant marine successfully be due to the weaknesses that are inherent in the matter of Government operation itself?

Mr. FLETCHER. No; the Shipping Board has not operated in competition with private operators at all. They have avoided it. They have been supplementing rather than competing with the private operation of ships.

But with reference further to the comparative cost of operation, we had numerous hearings extending over months and months of time on that subject. The chairman of the Committee on Commerce, the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], will recall when we had up the ship subsidy bill. It finally came out, and I think this was the ultimate conclusion reached by the experts, including Mr. Lasker himself, who was then chairman of the Shipping Board, that what is known as the La Follette Seamen's Act really cut no figure so far as our American ownership of ships and operation of them was concerned; that there was, perhaps, a difference in wages and some other expenses because of better conditions on board ship, better food, better accommodations required by our laws than many foreign countries required. But the total difference in cost between operating an American ship and operating a foreign ship, even considering those most economically operated abroad, was about 2 per cent of the cost of operation.

The cost of operation is not the total cost involved when it comes to shipping, but the difference between the total cost of the operation of foreign ships and American ships would be only about 2 per cent as against the American owner. That is a very small item when it comes to an investment of millions of dollars in ships. A difference of 2 per cent in the cost of operation in favor of the foreign shipowner does not eliminate the American from the seas at all. It would not be considered, other things being equal. Besides, we have other advantages; I might point them out, but I shall not now go into a discussion of that question.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I am sure the Senator from Florida also would wish to say this about the La Follette Act: We would not want our American workmen, whether they be on land or on sea, to be treated as serfs, would we?

Mr. FLETCHER. Of course not.

Mr. COPELAND. And the humanitarian purpose of the La Follette Act coincides, I am sure, with the wish of the American people. The crews on American ships are treated in a humane way; they have air space, toilet facilities, and a very good quality of food, so that they are treated as decent human beings. So far as I am concerned, if Government ownership were necessary in order to have our crews treated in that way, I should be in favor of Government ownership against everything else, because we would not want to make serfs of our people. However, there are other matters in reference to our merchant marine which have been pointed out by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. BRUCE] which are more fundamental. I do not think the treatment of crews is the important consideration in the increase in the cost of operation, but there are other matters which I am sure the Senator from Florida will point out in the course of his remarks.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I think the Senator from New York is correct with reference to the La Follette Seamen's Act and its operation. It makes it possible to attract the American lad to the seas. Of course, there are foreign countries which employ the cheapest possible labor and give their sailors the most economical accommodations and treat them more or less as serfs. We can not compete with those. I will admit that the American competing with a ship line operated in that way would be operating at a disadvantage, so far as competition is concerned in that instance, but we have got to build up sea power and we can not build up sea power without building up seamen and making it worth while for the American lad again to find his place on the seas.

To do that we must provide means for safety and decent accommodations on board the ships. We can do all that, and at the same time get better results out of the crews, and out of the officers. We get better results in other directions than does the foreigner. One capable, able seaman thus accommodated on board a ship, assured of safety appliances and all that sort of thing, and decent living accommodations, is worth a dozen Lascars or other people whom I might mention. So there are equalizing conditions.

Pursuing the subject further, the President said:

> The possibility of including their masters and crews in the Naval Reserve with some reasonable compensation should be thoroughly explored as a method of encouraging private operation of shipping.

I am not in disagreement with that; that is along the line suggested by the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND]. If we could work that out, we might accomplish something in that connection.

> Public operation—
> Says the President—
> is not a success.

With reference to that, I wish to say that we never really have had bona fide, genuine Government operation in the United States. The operation has been conducted through contracts with private operators of those ships. One of those contracts, known as the M. O. 4 contract, was, as came out in our investigation and as was admitted on all sides, a most infamous contract. It is utterly incredible that intelligent men would enter into such a contract, for under it the Government bore all the losses of the operation, and the greater the losses the more profit the operator made. The idea of operating through private operators was that there might be developed purchasers for the ships; that such operators would build up the trade, increase the commerce, open up new markets, and that after awhile they would be in position to buy the line. That was one idea—the main idea, I think—of continuing the operation through private operators; that we would thereby develop buyers for the ships. However, what interest is it to an operator ever to put himself in condition to own the line when he can make more money as an operator under Government contract, under the terms of which the more money the Government lost the more money he made. Of course, that contract has been changed and modified in many respects, and it is a much better contract now. There ought to be contracts made with private operators whereby they would share in the losses and which would make it to their interest to have the lines succeed. That, however, has not been done. Could one ever expect any business to make a pronounced success when it was being conducted in that kind of way?

Of all the shipping services under the Shipping Board the only line which is operated by the Government is the United States Lines, consisting of seven passenger ships and conducting a trans-Atlantic service from New York. It is a most important and essential line for this country. There is some cargo space in those passenger ships.

It is important also that that line should be strengthened and built up. There ought to be two good 20-knot ships added to the Leviathan. A proposition has been made, and is being considered by the Shipping Board, to recondition the Agamemnon and the Mount Vernon and put them alongside the Leviathan in that service. That would make a magnificent fleet, and the earnings of the United States Lines would be increased by over a million dollars a year if we add to it the Mount Vernon and the Agamemnon.

Mr. COPELAND. And they would be net earnings?

Mr. FLETCHER. They would be net earnings. That can be done at the expense of some $12,000,000. The Shipping Board recommend it, and the Budget Director, after a very thorough examination and consideration of the subject, agreed to it and reported in favor of it, but the President struck it out. So the Budget comes to Congress with that provision stricken out. I can not understand why, for if those two ships shall be added to the United States Lines that line will become one of the strongest in the world. It will earn a net profit in season and out of season to an enormous extent, and away will go the claim that we are losing money operating the ships, and, therefore, we must get out of the business and pass these ships to private hands.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. COPELAND. I am sure the Senator will wish to add this fact, that if those two ships were added to the United States Lines we could then carry the great bulk of our trans-Atlantic mail, which we do not do now.

Mr. FLETCHER. Precisely.

Mr. COPELAND. We are paying to-day to British ships a million and a half dollars for carrying our mails because we have no effective service to do the carrying.

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes.

Mr. COPELAND. So if the two ships were added, as the Senator suggests, we could then have the additional revenue for our ships instead of paying it to British ships.

Mr. FLETCHER. Precisely; the Senator is entirely correct. The schedules could then be so arranged that we could carry the mails in our own ships and receive that benefit.

But, of course, the President does not say that public operation is a failure; he does say that it is not a success. Mr. President, how could we ever expect any business to be a success when we are declaring from the housetops day after day that the business is losing money faster than we want to insure the loss; and when we are saying that, in spite of everything, we are going to quit this business and get out of it? What shipper is willing to make contracts, what shipper is able to make long-term contracts with a shipping line that tells him "To-morrow we may be out of business"? We can not expect a business to be successfully conducted on any such basis as that.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President——

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES. In connection with what the Senator has said I wish to make this suggestion: I had the pleasure of visiting South American ports two or three years ago and I was told by Americans that one of the most effective arguments used against the building up of an American merchant marine was this, that when a merchant contemplated turning the carrying of his goods over to an American line shipping competitors came to him and said, "You had better not do this; you know in the past the Americans have not maintained a merchant marine; we have been giving you good service all the time and now if you turn your business over to the American line the chances are that it will not be running in a few years and then you will have to come back to us"; and they practically intimated what they might expect if that condition came about. Now, apparently we are doing nothing to controvert any argument of that kind, and our action in the past and our failure to make any provision for replacement of these ships for the future does not make it very difficult for our foreign competitors to convince shippers that under the present conditions they had better not transfer their business.

Mr. FLETCHER. That is a natural condition; there is no question about that, and it interferes with our success.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator for just a moment?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. BRUCE. Is not that very inconstancy of policy one of the inseparable concomitants of Government ownership? Inconstancy, incertitude of policy, fluctuations in appropriations from time to time, the existence of conditions which make it impossible to calculate proper adjustments of means to ends are but the ordinary shortcomings and limitations of Government ownership. The managers of private business know exactly what they can count on from year to year, what their revenues are, what their assets are, what the demands for expenditures are, and they frame their policy, and their policy is not subject to congressional vicissitudes of any kind or legislative caprice or whim. That is one of the very reasons why private operation is always incomparably more successful so far as pecuniary results are concerned than is Government ownership and operation. The Government is attempting to grow orchids in maintaining these shipping lines; it is in a business for which it is unfit, just as it has proved itself to be unfit for every form of industrial enterprise. That is the way it strikes me.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I see the Senator's point. That has been urged, and there is a good deal in it. I would a great deal rather see private enterprise take hold of the shipping in a business way, run and replace and reconstruct and rebuild, and go on with this business as it should be done in this country. We ought to have some 8,000,000 tons of merchant ships to carry about 60 per cent of our overseas trade; but they will not do it.

Mr. BRUCE. I shrink from subsidies. I, of course, am too good a Democrat not to do that to begin with. I shrink from subsidies; and yet, at the same time, in view of the indispensability of a merchant marine in time of war, I may say, or merchant vessels that can be converted into war vessels, I think I am prepared to vote reasonable subsidies for the maintenance of these lines, provided they are turned over by the Government to private enterprise.

Mr. FLETCHER. I suggest to the Senator that that will not solve the problem; but, with further reference to his observations about the Government being in position to operate ships, what about our Navy? What about our Army? What about our Post Office Department? The same sort of argument would apply to those.

Mr. BRUCE. When you come to the Post Office Department you have to think of other things besides pecuniary profit. There are all sorts of most peremptory reasons why the mails of the country should not be turned over to private handling; but I recall the fact that Mr. Burleson, the former Postmaster General, testified before a congressional committee that if the rural-mail delivery of this country were turned over to private contractors there would be a saving to the Government of no less than $18,000,000 a year.

Mr. FLETCHER. But, again, the Government is successfully operating the Panama Steamship Line and has been ever since it took over the line. It lowered rates to all South and Central American ports from ports of the United States. It has been a success, although it carries all supplies for the use of the Government on the Canal Zone at less than commercial rates. It is a profitable enterprise.

Mr. BRUCE. I was reading something on that subject the other day, and the writer—I know not how correctly—reached just exactly the opposite conclusion from that which the Senator reached. He said that notwithstanding the enormous tonnage of freight which passes through the Panama Canal, it has been running at a loss—that is to say, when interest is calculated on the cost of the original investment and due allowance made for depreciation, and due allowance made for all the other things that private enterprise has to make allowance for unless it is prepared to pass into bankruptcy.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator from Maryland has reference to the Panama Canal. I was not talking about the Panama Canal at all. I was talking about the Panama Steamship Line.

Mr. BRUCE. I did not catch that.

Mr. FLETCHER. That is a different proposition.

Mr. BRUCE. Yes; it is.

Mr. FLETCHER. But in addition to the Panama Steamship Line, the Government is successfully operating the Black Warrior-Mississippi Line. Canada considers her merchant marine one of her chief assets and is making a complete success of its operation.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. I desire to speak by the book now with reference to the bounties paid by Great Britain.

Great Britain pays about a million dollars a year to merchant seamen enlisted in her naval reserve. She pays about $300,000 in the form of annual retainers to seamen who drill one week every year with the navy. Great Britain pays about $100,000 a year to seamen who are known as Royal Naval Volunteers; but this is not all. She pays naval subventions to something like 20 fast steamers so built as to be readily converted into auxiliary naval cruisers. These subventions amount to about half a million dollars every year. Nor is this all. The Cunard Line receives an annual subvention of three-quarters of a million dollars in return for the obligation which I have already mentioned, of selling or of leasing any vessel of the line to the Government in case of need. Besides all this, the British Government pays liberally for the carriage of the mails. In the case of France, according to the last report I have France paid in construction bounties $3,441,000 in one year and in operating bounties $466,000; and Italy rivals France in the extent to which government aid is given. In other words, outside of the United States there is no maritime power operating a merchant marine without very liberal governmental subvention of some sort.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, the United States pays liberally for the carrying of the mails. That is one thing. The United States has exempted from taxation all material entering into the construction of ships or the furnishing of ships. It comes in free of duty. We have provided in our legislation various means of encouraging capital. Then we have also provided a fund which we loan at 4 per cent interest for the building of ships. That is taken care of in our legislation. So that we are not so far behind in these indirect benefits and encouragements to shipping.

Germany came out of the war with about 500,000 tons of ships. She now has nearly 2,000,000 tons. She had over 6,000,000 tons at the beginning of the war, and she is building ships day after day. All these maritime nations are building ships. Great Britain built something over 3,000,000 tons—and I will refer to that a little later—last year; and there were less than 300,000 tons built in the United States.

Mr. COPELAND. Not a ton for the transoceanic trade.

Mr. FLETCHER. No; not a ton for overseas trade.

Then the President said—and I must hurry on, because I am taking up too much time, and I want to get through with this:

> No investigation, of which I have caused several to be made, has failed to report that it could not succeed or to recommend speedy transfer to private ownership.

I may say in that connection, that generally speaking, throughout the country, I think, a majority of the people of the United States would rather see these ships in private hands and privately operated; but after eight or nine years of delay and effort to get rid of the ships we have offered them at $5 a ton, where they cost over $200 a ton; we have advertised everywhere and by every means that "price makes no difference; come and take the ships," and they are not taking them. Private enterprise stays out. American money is invested in foreign-flag shipping and is making money. The interest of the foreign shipowners is against an American merchant marine, and especially against the Government's owning and operating a merchant marine, because they know they can not run the Government's ships off the seas.

There are difficulties in connection with Government ownership and operation. I concede that; but we are face to face with the proposition, Shall we have any merchant marine or shall we abandon the seas? That is the whole question; and the only certain way that we now know of for having any kind of a merchant marine carrying even 30 per cent of foreign trade is for the Government to own and operate and for the Government to construct and replace and balance the fleet.

> Our exporters and importers—
> Says the President—
> are both indifferent about using American ships.

No wonder, if that be true—and I am not disposed to question it—I would qualify it, because I think in many instances they are anxious to patronize American ships—but how can they count upon the service when they are told every day that next month this ship may be sold to somebody else and pass into other hands and the service be abandoned?

> It should be our policy to keep our present vessels in repair and dispose of them as rapidly as possible rather than undertake any new construction.

I suppose that is the reason why the President struck out this provision for $12,000,000, recommended by the Shipping Board and passed by the Budget, for reconditioning the Mount Vernon and the Agamemnon.

> Their operation is a burden on the National Treasury, for which we are not receiving sufficient benefits.

I seriously question that proposition. I think there are losses which will have to be met out of the National Treasury and that may continue for some time, but I feel absolutely convinced that the benefits to the American people far exceed these losses; and why talk about losses to the Government out of the Treasury if the people are benefited?

Why, Mr. President, speedily get rid of the ships? We might just as well abolish entirely the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce. We might save ourselves the hundreds of thousands of dollars that we appropriate annually to establish new offices and new agencies and endeavor to extend our foreign trade. We might just as well abandon all that effort—and I have been a strong supporter of proper appropriations to maintain the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce—if we abandon Government ownership and operation of the ships.

What is the use of building up trade, what is the use of making an effort to find new markets, if you must depend upon your competitors to carry your goods to those markets?

For instance, just as an illustration, here is Russia—a country very rich in natural resources. They have an abundance of raw material, but Russia is not manufacturing much now. On account of communism, lack of machinery and facilities, lack of skilled labor, and all that sort of thing, she is not increasing her manufacturing power. The American people are increasing their industrial strength, and encouraging manufacturing. What chance have our manufacturers to get our goods into Russia in exchange for her raw materials if we are to depend upon Germany to carry our products over there?

There is Germany, a great manufacturing country, right next to Russia. Germany has the ships. If the United States has not any, what possible chance has the American manufacturer to get rid of any of his surplus in that country?

That is one illustration, but it applies all over the world. The Senator from Washington spoke about the information he obtained in South America. I was once down there as a member of the joint international high commission, which was holding a session in Buenos Aires. I was told this story, which I have no reason to doubt: Brazil wanted an enormous quantity of cement for building walls, roads, and other structures, and she advertised for bids. Certain tests had to be submitted to, and the bids came in. The American manufacturers of cement stood the highest tests. The price of the American cement f. o. b. here was the lowest, and America was about to walk away with the contract for millions of tons of cement when Brazil said, "What will you deliver it for in Rio?" Then the manufacturers here began to look around, and they found that there was not an American merchant vessel plying between any port of the United States and Brazil. They had to look to the Lamport and Holt line, a British line, and when they applied to them for rates on that cement, they found the rates so high that Belgium and Great Britain got the contract for the cement and the American manufacturers were cut out.

That can happen with steel rails, with agricultural implements, with everything that we have to go to foreign markets to sell. We have an enormous surplus in this country of farm products, and a surplus of manufactured products. Are we going to say that we will rely upon foreign countries to deliver those products to the markets abroad? Are we to be abjectly dependent upon foreign countries to carry our goods to the waiting markets overseas? If we are, we are helpless, and we will find it impossible to maintain living conditions in the United States, and we will find it not worth while to consider expanding or extending our foreign markets.

A correspondent of mine has submitted some questions to me. I have not the liberty to use his name, but the questions are quite pertinent in this connection.

> If Congress should attempt to abandon Government ownership of vessels in foreign trade at this time, what position would it leave the country in?
> Would it result in private interests coming forward to take over the Government lines now engaged in foreign trade? Or would it mean just the complete abandonment of existing Government ownership lines, or most of them?

Private interests are not now disposed, or even able, to take over Government-owned lines. What, in such case, would become of them?

Is the taking over of Government lines now a thoroughgoing success?

Or are those who have taken over the ships, at nominal prices for the ships, able to say that with Government ownership abandoned they would be better able to maintain the lines, build new tonnage as required, and bring the lines measurably up to a parity with the foreign lines with which they compete?

Would immediate abandonment of Government-owned lines cause foreign lines to be more considerate of existing lines of American ships in foreign trade? Or would it, on the contrary, cause foreign lines to focus upon the few American privately owned lines and drive them from the seas? And that accomplished, would not American importers and exporters find themselves called upon to pay ocean freight rates so much higher than now are charged as to make the losses of the Shipping Board trivial, in comparison with the greater cost of ocean transportation almost wholly in foreign ships?

Would the inevitable increase in ocean freight rates that would follow Government abandonment of shipping lines have a tendency to increase or decrease our foreign trade, now in such a healthy state of growth? In other words, has not the gratifying growth of our foreign commerce of recent years been due in large degree to the low freight rates that have prevailed, owing to the presence of so many American ships in foreign carrying?

Are any of the existing privately owned American lines engaged in foreign trade now in a position to build more efficient and swifter ships to supplant the comparatively inefficient slower ships now being operated?

What chance is there of new construction except by the Government?

How much would the chance of new construction be increased by abandonment by our Government of its shipping lines?

Would such new construction as might be undertaken, if at all, inure to the benefit of American shipbuilders, if dependent upon privately owned lines? Or would the new ships be built in foreign countries at greatly reduced cost?

Would the United States, if it engaged in new construction, replacement of semiobsolete, inefficient, slow ships, have them built abroad or at home?

In short, would not immediate abandonment of Government ownership of ship lines in foreign trade cause a rapid lapse back into the condition American ships in foreign trade were in at the outbreak of the World War? Would it not mean the destruction of American shipping in foreign trade, instead of its reconstruction now so greatly needed, and sure to be more than ever needed as time goes on?

Opponents of Government ownership all say, "Get rid of the ships." How can they be got rid of? Who will buy them? If bought, can they be maintained in foreign trade at present or in the near future with private provision for replacement as needed?

If not replaced, how long can existing lines of ships continue?

If replaced with more modern, swifter ships, who will replace them?

Who has suffered because of the Government-owned lines? Not the American people, who never enjoyed so long a period of low freight rates as they have enjoyed since the Government began operating ships in foreign trade. The Government? Is a great saving to the people a loss to the Government?

Are foreign ships suffering because of our Government-owned lines? If ocean freight rates are unremunerative, as we are told they are, and foreign ships carry two-thirds of our foreign trade, as now they do, do they not lose two dollars for every dollar lost by the Government-owned lines? And do not the people enjoy the advantage of the low freight rates?

What shipowners would rejoice more or benefit more than foreign shipowners through the immediate abandonment of Government-owned lines?

There is but one answer to that question.

If Americans who advocate the abandonment of Government ownership of ship lines in foreign trade until private American ownership of the lines is assured are not serving the ends of foreign ship lines, whose ends are they serving?

The Shipping Board is now losing through the spigot and American importers and exporters are saving at the bung. But the abandonment of Government-owned lines would cause the importers and exporters to lose through the bung, while the Government would save through the spigot. Whom would that benefit?

Besides desiring an American merchant marine privately owned, the people desire a real American merchant marine. Would they get it more surely under present conditions from private than from Government ownership?

Do the reports of the Shipping Board indicate that its lines in foreign trade could better succeed under private ownership, bearing the board's losses, than they now do, the Government bearing the losses? That is to say, does not the present operation of American ships in foreign trade prove conclusively that they can succeed only through Government ownership for some time longer?

Should not the Government make the lines more secure, more intrenched in foreign carrying, with shippers having greater dependence upon their permanency and more ready to employ them by continuing them until, beyond a peradventure, they could be maintained permanently, than to risk utter loss by selling or "getting rid" of them now?

Is not Government ownership a bulwark against the loss of lines of American ships? Would not the danger of the loss of the existing American lines be infinitely greater at present under private than under Government ownership? Why take such a risk? Who would benefit by the risk being taken? The people? Private American shipowners? The importers and exporters? No; the competing foreign ships.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield right there?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. The President speaks of the burden upon the Treasury of $12,000,000 a year for maintenance of our merchant marine. Is not that sum saved manyfold over, perhaps a hundredfold over, to the shippers of America?

Mr. FLETCHER. Unquestionably. In 1924 more than that was saved to the wheat growers of this country when the Shipping Board pulled out of the reserve fleet 105 ships and put them into the carrying of wheat to Europe. It was saved again to the cotton growers of the South in 1926, when the Shipping Board pulled out of its reserve fleet 95 ships and put them into the service, because the British ships, upon which we had been depending, were engaged in carrying coal from Norfolk to England on account of the coal strike in England.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator will allow me to interrupt him again, in this connection I recall very distinctly that in the fall of 1926 we had almost an embargo on cotton because we could not get ships. The Senator knows we had a tremendous crop that year, and it was necessary for us to have ships to transport the cotton to Europe. It was for what it did at that time that I want to commend the Shipping Board for the splendid way in which they came forward and furnished the ships so that cotton could go abroad during the fall of 1926.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator is entirely correct, and I feel like joining him in that commendation. They are in position to serve the American people as no private enterprise could ever serve them, because no private enterprise will ever have a reserve fleet tied up idle.

The Shipping Board has, and as our trade needs it, and as our farmers need it, and as our manufacturers need it, as any of our people who have a surplus to go abroad need it, they can call upon that reserve fleet for service and save themselves.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. KING. The Senator will recall that prior to the Civil War American genius produced a merchant marine which carried from 83 to 87 per cent, and some historians say 93 per cent, of our foreign commerce. Does not the Senator think that if we should repeal some of the archaic laws that are upon the statute books; if we would permit Americans to buy ships in foreign countries and place them under American registry; if we would permit American shipowners to have their ships repaired in foreign ports without being penalized for so doing; if we would permit American shipbuilders to bring into the United States materials necessary for the construction of ships without the payment of extortionate tariff rates, an American marine would soon be established sufficient to care for our foreign commerce?

Mr. FLETCHER. I think many of the things the Senator mentions we have now. For instance, we admit free of duty all materials entering into the construction and even the furnishing of ships.

Mr. KING. I think the Senator is in error there, if he will pardon me.

Mr. FLETCHER. That is my recollection of the law. I agree with the Senator that it was a mistake to require that when repairs are made on our ships in foreign yards, 50 per cent of the cost of the repairs shall be added as a penalty. I think that is a mistake. I would like to see that law repealed.

Mr. KING. May I say to the Senator that I have a bill pending touching that subject, and I hope he will see that it is reported out of the committee.

Mr. FLETCHER. I will be very glad to give attention to it.

The Senator has spoken of our shipping in earlier days. I have a chart before me which shows that in 1830 vessels flying the American flag were carrying 89.9 per cent of our overseas trade, in 1840 they were carrying 82.9 per cent, in 1850 they were carrying 72.5 per cent, in 1860 they were carrying 66.5 per cent. Then came the Civil War, then the building of ships out of steel, and new kinds of carriers and various causes resulted in a decline, so that in 1870 we carried only 35.6 per cent of our commerce overseas in American vessels. In 1880 we carried 17.4 per cent, in 1890 we carried 12.9 per cent, in 1900 we carried 9.3 per cent, and in 1910 we carried 8.7 per cent. In 1920, after spending $3,000,000,000 to build these ships, we carried 42.7 per cent of our foreign commerce in American bottoms. In 1924 we carried 36.3 per cent. Mind you, we begin this policy of getting out of business and getting the ships into private hands, and this is the result: In 1924 we carried 36.3 per cent, in 1925 we carried 34.1 per cent, and in 1926 we carried 32.2 per cent. Probably in 1930, unless Congress takes some positive stand in this connection, we will be getting back to where we were in 1910.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I think the Senator will agree with me that if we will repeal some of the restrictive measures now on the statute books, we will go a long way toward the rehabilitation of our merchant marine. The Senator knows that our coastwise trade is in the hands of Americans, who have a complete monopoly, and their boats carry millions of tons of freight annually. If we will adopt rational measures with respect to vessels that are engaged in foreign trade and permit such vessels to engage in coastwise trade, we will build up our merchant marine without subsidies or pursuing the policy which is so eloquently advocated by the distinguished Senator from Florida.

It is the opinion of those best acquainted with the handling of our Government-owned ships that inefficiency and extravagance have been largely responsible for the losses which have resulted. Certainly the policies pursued can not be commended by any business organization. If we placed the ships owned by the Government in the hands of competent men, undoubtedly the results would be far better.

I want to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that some of our ships are obsolescent and of types that will soon make them obsolete. They were built under high pressure during the war, and to meet a situation entirely different from that now obtaining. As we have made progress in aerial navigation, we have made progress in shipbuilding. Shippers are demanding faster and better ships, in order that their commodities may quickly reach their destined markets. Germany is building ships which are faster than most of ours, and this will result in their capturing markets in South America and elsewhere which the United States should dominate. England is constructing better ships for commercial purposes and our war-built vessels will not be able to compete with them. Diesel engines and other improved machinery are being employed in German boats, as well as those built in other countries. If we would compete with the ocean carriers of other nations, we must change our present policy. That America can operate at a profit vessels to engage in foreign commerce, and can successfully compete with the other countries, I have no doubt. But we must abandon the present policy and adopt a rational one.

Mr. FLETCHER. I am much obliged to the Senator for his interruption. Every maritime nation in the world is building merchant ships just as fast as they can lay the keels, except the United States.

As the Senator suggests, we have got to improve our ships. We have to build faster ships; we have to construct them upon the latest improved lines. But what private American citizen is going to do it? Where are the individuals or the concerns that are going to do it? There is but one way to do it, and that is for the Government to do it.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FLETCHER. Certainly.

Mr. BRUCE. May I ask the Senator from Florida why it is that private individuals will not go into this business? Our people are very avid for gain. They never lose a point when it comes to providing the efforts of a business enterprise in one direction or another. Why is it that private enterprise in this country will not take the form of building and operating ships as it once did, as the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] has pointed out?

Mr. FLETCHER. I think one reason is that we have been talking about doing something for private shipowners. At every session of Congress there is some suggestion that we are going to subsidize the undertaking and there is hope of a subsidy. That is one thing that holds them up. To my mind there is perhaps another reason more controlling. For instance, if the Senator and I should form a corporation and make up our minds that we were going to establish a line between Baltimore and Rio and we would go to the Shipping Board and make them a proposition for ships, we could get them for a song. We could start our line. But before investing much money in that line we would want to consider what the prospects are of a foreign ship line running us off the seas by the reduction of rates in a few months.

Mr. BRUCE. In other words, we would be uncertain as to whether we could successfully compete with foreign lines, and that would be because the cost of operation as respects foreign lines is much lower than the cost of operation of American lines.

Mr. FLETCHER. There might be various other reasons. At one time foreign lines organized what they called "fighting" ships. The purpose of those ships was to lower rates as against independent undertakings, to run those undertakings out of business, and then immediately the rates would go up again.

Mr. BRUCE. If there is any real profit in it the American people would also build and operate fighting lines and fighting ships. Is not the real reason after all that we do not take to the sea because it is not profitable for us to take to the sea and because it is profitable for us to adhere to the land?

Mr. FLETCHER. I think that is not quite the case. There is a profit in the business. Seven hundred million dollars is the freight bill paid by our people.

Mr. BRUCE. That is a tremendous prize for the spirit of American competition to struggle for. It is worth struggling for but for the fact that there are economic reasons which render it inexpedient for our people to embark on that particular form of enterprise unless some artificial lure is held out to them in the shape of a subsidy or what not that would tend to equalize the disparity between the cost of operating foreign ships and the cost of operating American ships.

Mr. COPELAND. Is there not another thing, that unless the American shipowner is put on the same plane of equality with the foreign shipowner, he can not compete?

Mr. BRUCE. That is to say, put on the same footing of competitive equality?

Mr. COPELAND. Exactly. The cost of building a ship is an item. Suppose he could not get one from the Shipping Board? If he were to go into the American shipyards to-day, he would find that the cost of building a ship here is tremendously greater than it is abroad.

Mr. BRUCE. Precisely. My attention has been called to that fact.

Mr. COPELAND. There is no question about it. For that reason there is now a bill before the Commerce Committee proposing to equalize the difference actually existing and to pay a subsidy of that sort and give that kind of assistance in order that the American shipowner may build and own a ship at the same price that it may be done abroad.

Mr. BRUCE. That is the only thing to be done as I see it. As long as we have the merchant marine that we have now, I am most heartily in favor of keeping it in repair and making whatever necessary replacement the circumstances require. Until we do turn over these ships to private enterprise I think that should be done. I do not think we should begrudge the necessary appropriation for that purpose, and I am free to say I am inclined to question the wisdom of the President in taking the position he did in regard to the appropriation of which the Senator was just speaking. I had the pleasure last spring of going over on one of our boats, the Leviathan, and coming back on the Leviathan, and as far as I could see a more superbly operated ship never was built. I was highly gratified, indeed my national pride was elated, by what seemed to me to be the splendid management of that ship in every respect.

But I do believe the Government is unfit in the long run, in the long reckoning, for any form of industrial enterprise, whether the operation of ships or otherwise. If we look carefully into the figures, we will find that not one solitary industrial enterprise ever conducted by the Government has been conducted except at a loss. I have repeatedly challenged Senators to state one single, solitary instance in which, over any considerable period of time, the Government ever conducted anything in the nature of an industrial enterprise except at a deficit, and that challenge has never in one instance been successfully met.

I think, so far as carrying on the shipping business or any other business in the nature of business that is ordinarily conducted by individuals, the Government is simply growing orchids. It is not engaged in the raising of potatoes or corn or wheat, but in the growing of orchids. That is what it is doing now in attempting to operate these ships. At the same time I do hope the Senator will not misunderstand me. I have listened to his most instructive and admirable address, and I confess some of my presuppositions in regard to the subject have been very considerably shaken by what he has said. I do feel that the situation should be met by the Government. As long as we have the fleet, we should maintain it in the proper way for the purpose of saving the lives of our people, not to go any further. Then I do hope at some time that our policy will be to look ultimately to the transfer of this great industry to private hands even if we have to pay a price for it, like the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] suggested, in the nature of some kind of a governmental subsidy or subvention.

Mr. FLETCHER. I am much obliged to the Senator for his interruption, but I must hurry on and finish; otherwise I would like to take time to discuss to some extent the points which he has raised. I mentioned three instances a while ago to which I might refer again as evidencing the possibilities of the Government conducting this enterprise. I mentioned the Panama Steamship Line and the Black Warrior-Mississippi Line; also the Canadian Steamship Line operated by the Canadian Government.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for an inquiry?

Mr. FLETCHER. Certainly.

Mr. FESS. I have listened to what the Senator from Maryland stated and I have great sympathy with his feeling in regard to Government operation, and I rather think the Senator from Florida himself has some sympathy with it. I am very much opposed to it as a principle, but I have looked into the possibility of an American merchant marine both from the standpoint of what we have been and from the standpoint of what we are now and ought to be. I am convinced that there is no possibility of an American merchant marine under our present range of cost in production and operation unless we will in some way subsidize to make up the difference, which now seems to be out of the question. It seems to me that we are now facing the alternative whether we will abandon the merchant marine or permit the Government to go ahead with it. From the standpoint of commerce it might be better to let it go, but from the standpoint of national defense it would seem to me an indefensible position to take. For that reason, being very strongly opposed to Government operation, I can not see that there is any other assured way, and I have come to that conclusion very reluctantly.

Mr. FLETCHER. I am obliged to the Senator for his remarks. I think he is absolutely sound in his position. I only disagree with him in that I believe that for the sake of our commerce, for the sake of our trade, for the sake of our producers, the farmers and the manufacturers, we must have a merchant marine in overseas trade and, of course, as a means of national defense. We can not escape that position.

Mr. FESS. I think I may have been misunderstood. I meant for the sake of argument to omit the commerce. The commerce feature is an important one.

Mr. FLETCHER. It is very important. It is vital, it seems to me, to the welfare of the country.

I may say now, generally speaking, with reference to an adequate American merchant marine, that there appear to be two distinct policies advanced. First, that favored by the present administration, to the effect that the Government should speedily get out of the shipping business; second, that the Government should continue permanently to own and operate merchant ships in overseas trade.

In the merchant marine act of 1920 the fixed policy of the Government was announced to be to establish and maintain an adequate American merchant marine. It was declared that the intention was to have this merchant marine "ultimately pass to private hands." It was unfortunate, perhaps, to announce such intention, although it is distinctly a secondary consideration. The prime purpose was to establish and maintain a merchant marine under our flag in foreign commerce adequate to serve our needs in time of peace as well as in times of emergencies.

MISTAKEN CONSTRUCTION

The policy announced was all right if properly construed, but those who have had the administration of the act in charge have seemed to largely ignore the prime purpose and lay emphasis upon the second thought. They have appeared to construe the language of the act as meaning the goal to be attained was to get the ships into private hands speedily and get the Government out of the shipping business. In pursuance of this idea those in authority supported primarily plans and schemes for disposing of the ships. They went so far as to sell the City of Los Angeles for $100,000, she being a German-built vessel seized by us during the war, costing approximately $1,600,000, on which the Shipping Board spent $2,000,000 to recondition, and also some $47,000 for hotel supplies within a month of her sale. In pursuance of this policy also the combination cargo and passenger ships—some of the finest afloat on any ocean, having cost the Government over $30,000,000—were sold to the Dollar Line for $4,500,000, payable in five years, with the guarantee that they continue the service and fly the American flag during that period of time. A five-year guarantee of service when sales are made is ridiculous when we consider that time is not more than a minute in the life of a nation. It is not necessary to recite numerous sales at terrible sacrifices in pursuance of this idea of getting rid of ships and getting out of the shipping business. One argument in support of this idea was that the Government was losing some forty to fifty million dollars a year and it was desirable to save this loss.

NO EARNEST, SINCERE EFFORT TO SUCCEED

No notice was taken of the fact that no serious, businesslike effort was being put forth to make the business a success, but everything was done to discourage the building up and establishment and maintenance of a merchant marine. Those in authority put themselves in the absurd position of offering the property for sale, which was worse than worthless, according to their claims, inasmuch, as alleged, those who acquired them were bound to lose money. American merchants were admonished of the futility of making contracts for the movement of exports and imports with Government-owned ships because any day, practically without notice, those ships were likely to pass into other hands and under different management and control. No business could succeed on any such basis. Those engaged in it were apparently determined to make it a failure.

FAILURE TURNED INTO SUCCESS

Public sentiment reacted to this situation and finally there came a time when more serious attention was given to the problem of operation, with the result that the alleged and exaggerated losses have gradually disappeared and the business is being conducted in a more intelligent, energetic, and efficient manner. It is gratifying to note that the direct operating profit of the United States Lines, embracing five trans-Atlantic passenger ships, for the fiscal year 1927 was $635,842.97; the loss for the fiscal year 1926, using the same factors, was $650,000; the net result shows an improvement in 1927 over 1926 of $1,285,842.97. I am assured that the United States Lines's vessels are in very good condition; that the item of repairs carries several hundreds of thousands of dollars in betterments that could probably be considered as a capital charge. The merchant line of freight ships operated by the Government is also showing a decided improvement, with gratifying results. Those lines, owned by the Government and operated by private operators, are being conducted on a more businesslike basis without very great loss—the losses in nowise approach the saving in freight to our shippers.

ATTITUDE OF BUSINESS MEN

I have noted with no little concern the position taken by those who favor the first-mentioned policy, including the resolutions adopted May 4, 1927, by the Chamber of Commerce of the United States and the comment thereon by newspapers to the general effect that the—protest is as strong as any protest ever made and has the weight of millions of thinking men behind it.

In supporting this resolution Mr. Gadsden said:

I make no pretensions to any special knowledge of shipping matters.

And further:

As I understand the temper of the business men of this country, we are opposed to Government entering into any phase of business, and we are looking hopefully to the time in the near future when the Government will retire from the shipping business and turn back this great field of American business into the hands of American business.

SHIPPING BOARD'S POSITION

During the discussion Chairman O'Connor of the Shipping Board said:

We absolutely want to get out of business, and we are willing to sell to any man, any American, who will come and buy the ships at any time, at any place, and the price does not make much difference. I believe that is a fairly good offer to anybody here who has the idea that the Shipping Board does not want to sell ships. Come down to us; we will sell the ships if you will pick the route out, or we will tell you what the routes are, we will furnish you with the figures as to how the ships are running, how they are running at the present time, whether they are making money or losing money. We will give you all the information, and then you can make up your minds which one of the 23 routes you want to buy and we will sell the ships.

He further said:

We want to get out of business just as soon as we can, and we are trying to do that very thing. I make this statement to you: There is no man that can come to you and state to you publicly, so that it will be heard, that he has tried to buy ships from the Shipping Board and was refused, unless he wanted the Shipping Board to hand them over to him for nothing. That we can not do. They are Government property, and we are going to try to get just as much money for them as we can, especially in individual sales. In route sales, as I said before, gentlemen, the price does not make the least bit of difference to the Shipping Board. Come and make us an offer, anybody here. We have 23 routes now for sale. Come and make us an offer, if it is $5 a ton, $10 a ton, or $7 a ton. Those vessels cost the good old Government of the United States $200 a ton. There is a vast difference between a $5.50 capital investment and a $200 capital investment. We are giving you a big subsidy to buy the vessels; so if you know anybody who wants to buy, come on and buy. We are ready to sell.

What is the use of talking about getting out of business and delivering the ships into private hands in the face of this offer, which has been repeated over and over again? What is the use of talking about the handicap of American owners when they are offered ships at $5 a ton that cost $200 a ton and still refuse to get into the business.

CORRECT POLICY

In my judgment, and if I had the authority, I should not say another word about selling ships; I should not insert another advertisement or permit any talk about the Government going out of business. On the contrary, I should announce to the world that private enterprise having failed utterly to take the proper interest in ships and the building up of an American merchant marine, the Government is in the shipping business to stay, and the policy shall be from now on to eliminate the words in the merchant marine act, "ultimately to pass to private hands," and shall be to aggressively carry out the prime purpose of the merchant marine act—to establish and maintain an adequate American merchant marine, and to that end the Government shall continue permanently to own and operate vessels in overseas trade. I should make this issue in the next campaign; I should put this pledge in the Democratic platform and go to the country on it, announcing clearly and unequivocally the policy of this Government to permanently own and operate merchant ships in foreign trade, to serve American commerce, protect American business abroad, and meet our competitors on common ground abroad, and serve our country in time of need.

NATIONAL DEFENSE

Merchant ships are just as necessary in time of war, or when extraordinary conditions arise, as are cruisers, destroyers, and floating batteries. This was demonstrated clearly, so that any man with any sense at all could understand it, during the World War. After the German submarines became active England would have been forced out of the war within eight weeks but for her merchant marine. Our allies had lost 6,000,000 deadweight tons to December, 1916, and after that they were losing 650,000 tons a month, making their total losses 8,000,000 deadweight tons for 1917. No wonder the Allies sent forth their urgent appeal to us for ships, ships, and more ships if the war were to be won. Each appeal was warranted by the acute necessity. Mr. Hurley says in his book, The Bridge to France:

Germany never would have begun her ruthless submarine warfare on February 1, 1917, if the United States had possessed a substantial merchant marine.

Chairman O'Connor further said during the discussion of this resolution:

It comes rather hard to me to look out of that window and look at the Washington Monument and then sit here in this room and hear a resolution trying to put the American business men in the hole. They will realize that they are going in the hole, gentlemen, the minute you get the ships off the ocean that the Government is operating at the present time.

There is not a shadow of doubt if all the Government-owned ships were given away to private parties within six months they would, in the main, pass into foreign hands or come under the control of foreign interests.

In 1914 not more than 10 per cent of American commerce was being moved in American bottoms. The United States had only 9.4 per cent of the world tonnage. Great Britain had 41.6 per cent. Now we have 21.6 per cent and are carrying about 30 per cent of our foreign commerce. Does the American manufacturer and producer wish to go back to that situation? Does he not remember that when the German ships were out of commission, the British ships commandeered for war uses to a great extent, freight rates went up on wheat from New York to Liverpool from 3 cents to 50 cents a bushel and from $2.50 to $50 on cotton per bale from Galveston to Liverpool? Does he not remember when contracts for cement and for steel were offered the United States producers in South America, they were unable to obtain the contracts—not because their products were not superior, not because their prices were not lower, but because foreign competitors were able to control freight rates, and the cost of delivering the goods was made such that foreign competitors could make deliveries at a better figure?

SOME ACTUAL ACCOMPLISHMENTS

Chairman O'Connor further said in the discussion of this resolution of protest:

Ask your farmers out in the Middle West, ask your cotton planters in the South what the Shipping Board did for them last fall. Ask them what it did for them in 1924. We saved the day for them. We saved the day last fall for them by putting ships in. Private owners did not have an American ship to carry a cargo of grain out of the southern ports last fall—not an American ship. They did not have any British ships; they did not have any other kinds of ships, because they all left our grain piled in our elevators, they left the grain piled in cars, they left your cotton stored on the docks—for the reason that foreign ships that were carrying that freight could get more money for carrying coal to England.

At the time of the coal strike in England 90 ships were drawn from this Government-owned reserve fleet and put into service by the Shipping Board, and in that way our surplus products of grain, cotton, and the like were able to reach the markets overseas. Private owners were not and could not be in position to render that service. I call attention to further statements by Chairman O'Connor:

Take your locomotive works: How many locomotives did they ever ship to the southern ports from this country direct until the United Shipping Board put vessels on to carry locomotives there? Ask some of them. Ask the Baldwin locomotive people or some of the rest of them how many they shipped and why they did not ship them? Because the American locomotive manufacturer was up against a proposition of a $4-a-ton transhipment charge before we put our vessels in there. We cut that charge away, and they are now able to compete with the world. The General Electric Co. and the Western Electric Co. are in the same position. There is no transshipment charge on their goods now. They are going right where the people want them in the southern ports, right direct from New York, with weekly sailings.

FOREIGN INTERESTS

There is no doubt but that every foreign competitor desires above all things that the Government shall go out of the shipping business and all ships be turned over to private hands. In looking out for the interests of the United States, I am not given to taking the advice of other countries. It is claimed we are violating a great principle by continuing the Government in the shipping business. I deny it. I am perfectly willing that private enterprise should undertake this business; I would greatly desire that—but for 50 years private enterprise has failed, although we did what we could to encourage it. We were in a helpless condition when the war came on in 1914—in an unnecessary, humiliating, indefensible, foolish position of absolute dependency upon foreign ships to move our products to market and bring to us the things we needed. Now, for 10 years past we have spent time and money trying to prove that the Government could not handle this business successfully and trying to persuade private enterprise to get into it. We have been willing to sacrifice the ships, although the people of this country paid some $4,000,000,000 for this enterprise; the authorities have made every effort to throw that away, and yet with all these inducements private enterprise holds back and refuses to establish and maintain an American merchant marine worth while. We are in very much the same position that we were in during the war when the German submarines became active. Marine insurance companies came to Washington and appealed to the Government to go into the insurance business; they declined to write marine insurance—they said the hazard was too great. Responding to their appeal, the Government established a Bureau of War Risk Insurance and protected shipping during those trying days. The rates were reasonable, nowise exorbitant—in fact, if there was any increase it was very nominal. After the war these insurance companies wanted the Government to get out of the business. All right, it did; showing a profit of some $17,000,000 made while engaged in it.

GOVERNMENT OWNERSHIP AND OPERATION

It is all nonsense and an unwarranted reflection upon every honest man connected with the Government to claim that men can not be found with sufficient honesty, intelligence, and patriotism to conduct this business. Canada's Government owned and operated ships constitute one of the most valuable assets of that country; Australia has been successfully operating her ships; the Panama Canal Line is a great success, showing satisfactory earnings, notwithstanding they carry all Government supplies at much less than commercial rates. The Government owns and operates the Mississippi & Black Warrior Line, moving a tremendous commerce, keeping down rates, and serving as an additional facility of transportation for great areas of the country. The Government transport lines in the Army and Navy are efficiently and economically conducted. I am thoroughly convinced that the one certain way and, so far as we sell, the only possible way for us to have an adequate merchant marine is for the Government to own and operate merchant ships in overseas trade. We must maintain the routes we now have, although the Shipping Board seems willing to practically give them away if private enterprise would keep them up. I would stop this talk, absolutely, about the sale of routes and the sale of ships; I would not even sell the hulls of our so-called obsolete ships for the purpose of being destroyed or scrapped, as per notices in the New York Journal of Commerce of May 16. On the other hand, I would lay them up in fresh water, possibly in the James River, and keep them there without any expense, even for paint, so that they could be drawn upon for use in emergencies—just as supposedly useless hulls were resurrected and pressed into service during the World War.

REPLACEMENTS AND RECONSTRUCTION

I do not favor appropriating large amounts of money for the purpose of building new ships in order to replace others that may, in the course of years, be out of commission, if power is to remain in the Shipping Board to sell these new ships at any price they may consider reasonable. I would favor appropriating money to add to the United States Lines such ships as will strengthen and make more profitable that line; I would appropriate money for the purpose of building new ships in order to balance our fleets where needed, but with the understanding and the emphatic declaration that such ships are to be owned and operated permanently by the Government. I would favor a definite program of replacement to supply the facilities our country needs whenever individual Americans fail to provide them.

MIDDLE WEST CLAIMS

The Middle West properly demands that steamship routes by way of the Gulf and South Atlantic ports should insure a permanency of service at ocean rates on a parity with the North Atlantic. They justly insist that the ships the United States Government is now operating should be continued in operation.

They are outspoken in the view that in the interest of commerce and national security the Shipping Board should continue to operate through private companies all present lines and services now established and make such additions to lines and services from time to time as may be required.

They very reasonably urge, too, a definite policy of replacement, reconstruction, and modernization of vessels, as our foreign competitors are doing, in order to meet the competition presented by the best of foreign ships. I am in full accord with this position. It is sound and patriotic and vitally important to the whole country.

THE SOLUTION

In all candor, having been with this problem since 1909, studied it, read and heard everything put forth on the subject that I could reach, I must say to our Middle West friends and to all others interested—and that embraces all our people—that in order to insure the things you want you must go one step further and insist that the fixed policy of the Government shall be that the Government must own and operate these ships in foreign trade, not interfering with private ownership and operation under our flag, but to adequately supply this country's needs.

The wealth of this Nation is estimated at $400,000,000,000. We have a foreign trade estimated at $10,000,000,000 anuually. Our freight bill for the transportation of this commerce is estimated at $600,000,000 annually. What folly it is for the United States to be abjectly dependent upon other countries to carry our goods! Can we expect any fair show in foreign markets, can we ever hope for any expansion of our trade if we must rely upon our competitors to deliver our goods? "Retire from the shipping business"; turn back this great field of "American business into the hands of American business" is fine talk. I can imagine the hearty applause of every foreign shipping interest. If the American business man is not more stupid than I can think of his being, he would raise his voice in protest. He would ask, What then? Who is ready to take over the 24 routes now operated by the Shipping Board or its agents? Who is prepared to operate the 300 ships now engaged by the Government, or any considerable number of them, even if they are given away? What American business men are prepared or ever expect to be prepared to render the service to American commerce evidenced by the figures of the Shipping Board for 1926, when they covered 11,270,341 miles and carried exports and imports valued at approximately $850,000,000 at a cost to American shippers of 2.2 cents for each dollar's worth of goods carried? Can we afford to have less part in our foreign trade than we are now taking, when—even now—70 per cent of our international trade is carried in foreign-flag ships?

We scrapped 850,000 tons of naval vessels, many of them the most modern types of fighting ships, at a cost of $400,000,000, lost our naval position, and now these "business men" want us to scrap our merchant fleets in order not to interfere with private business. We might as well scrap the remainder of our Navy if and when this Government ceases to own and operate merchant ships.

If the Shipping Board goes out of business and the Government ships in foreign trade pass into private hands, within a year thereafter they will be in control of foreign shipping interests. In any case, whether that follows or not, the world routes of trade will be focused in New York and use of the ports of the South Atlantic and Gulf, so far as overseas trade is concerned, will be greatly curtailed, if not abandoned.

Every maritime nation in the world is doing its best to build ships and put them into foreign trade service except the United States.

From 1921 to 1926, for transoceanic service—vessels of 2,000 gross tons and over—

Great Britain built 600 vessels, totaling 3,500,000 gross tons;
Germany built 172 vessels, totaling 650,000 gross tons;
Italy built 83 vessels, totaling 506,000 gross tons;
France built 72 vessels, totaling 450,000 gross tons;
Japan built 52 vessels, totaling 250,000 gross tons; and United States built 14 vessels, totaling 137,000 gross tons.

In 1921 the United States had in foreign trade, privately owned, 843 vessels of 2,964,113 gross tons; Shipping Board, 1,716 vessels of 7,656,604 gross tons.

June 30, 1927, the situation was—in foreign trade:

Privately owned, 525 vessels of 2,197,507 gross tons; and Shipping Board, 780 vessels of 4,093,950 gross tons.

In other words, from 1921 to 1927 our shipping in foreign trade has gone from 2,559 vessels of 10,620,717 gross tons to 1,305 vessels of 6,291,457 gross tons. This while we have been supposedly making every effort to create and maintain an adequate American merchant marine and especially to get it into private hands.

Apparently private ownership has increased since 1914, but under the head of "Privately owned" there are tankers, totaling 1,011,000 gross tons, owned and operated by oil companies for the transportation of their own products. Deducting these, it will be noted no progress has been made toward interesting private capital in the enterprise and we can not rely upon that method of establishing and maintaining an adequate American merchant marine.

Mr. President, I wish to have printed as a part of my remarks a letter from the Bureau of Navigation of the Department of Commerce, dated August 11, 1927, which gives the figures respecting our tonnage; also a letter from the Bureau of Navigation of the Department of Commerce of October 1, 1927.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the letters will be printed in the RECORD.

The letters are as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE,
BUREAU OF NAVIGATION,
Washington, August 11, 1927.

Hon. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have your letter of the 2d instant requesting a statement showing—

1. American tonnage in overseas foreign trade—
(a) Owned by the Government.
(b) Privately owned.

Divided into—
(a) Passenger ships.
(b) Cargo ships.
(c) Passenger and cargo.
(d) Tankers.
(e) All others, e. g. Tramps.

On June 30, 1927, the total registered (foreign trade) tonnage of the United States included 1,305 vessels of 6,291,457 gross tons, as follows:

Vessel	(a) U. S. Shipping Board 1,000 gross and over		(b) Privately owned
			1,000 gross and over		500 to 999 gross
	Number	Gross tons	Number	Gross tons	Number	Gross tons
Passenger	13	214,351	95	638,391	3	1,938
Cargo	745	3,756,367	261	538,036	9	6,481
Tankers	8	48,055	156	1,011,829	1	832
Refrigerators	14	75,177
Total	780	4,093,950	512	2,188,256	13	9,251

Under "passenger ships" are included passenger and cargo ships, as they are not stated separately in the records, and I have given the refrigerator ships, as these are separated. I regret that the number and tonnage of tramp vessels can not be given, as they are not shown in the records, but they are included in the totals of "privately owned."

The Panama Railroad Co. has four vessels of 24,445 gross tons documented. It has several other vessels which are not documented and consequently are not of record in this office.

The Mississippi-Warrior service has 11 vessels of 9,788 gross tons, the Inland Waterway Corporation 1 vessel of 1,411 gross tons, and the Engineer Corps 2 vessels of 2,822 gross tons, all of which are documented. The Engineer Corps has many other vessels which are not documented.

You will understand that many of the vessels included in the above figures of registered vessels were laid up on June 30. Of the Shipping Board vessels, only 283 of 1,745,529 gross tons were active on that date.

Respectfully,

A. J. TYRER, Commissioner.

A. J. TYRER, Commissioner.

Mr. FLETCHER. I also ask to have printed in the RECORD a letter written to me from Mr. Fred Brenckman, Washington representative of the National Grange, dated December 14, 1927; and also a communication from the Military Order of the World War dated October 26, 1927, all sustaining the position which I have taken.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The communications referred to are as follows:

THE NATIONAL GRANGE,
Washington, D. C., December 14, 1927.

Hon. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: In a recent letter you asked me to give you the exact wording of resolutions adopted by the National Grange at its recent annual session held in Cleveland, Ohio, November 16–25, regarding the merchant marine and the Federal Farm Loan Board.

Following is resolution with reference to merchant marine:

"Whereas an adequate American merchant marine is vital to our prosperity and security as a nation; and

"Whereas private enterprise, under prevailing conditions, can not fully supply the need in transoceanic service: Therefore, be it

"Resolved, That the National Grange favors continued ownership and operation of merchant ships by the Government through the agency of the United States Shipping Board, as necessity demands; and be it further

"Resolved, That we favor appropriations by Congress to keep our merchant fleet modern and efficient."

The grange formally indorsed Worthy Master L. J. Taber's utterance on the question of the Federal farm-loan system, in which he said:

"We do not need a Federal farm-loan system adjusted to suit the desires of the Nation's financial institutions, or its business interests. With such adjustment it would simply be an adjunct to the Federal reserve act. We do need, and must maintain, a Federal farm-loan system sound in its financial operation, guided and controlled by men competent to handle this huge undertaking, yet who are in sympathy with and understand the problems of rural life."

A resolution adopted by the grange included the following expression of sentiment regarding the farm-loan system:

"Resolved, That we are opposed to any legislation looking to further concentrated control of the farm loan system."

Trusting that this may give you the information desired, I am

Yours very truly,

FRED BRENCKMAN,
Washington Representative.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA CHAPTER,
MILITARY ORDER OF THE WORLD WAR,
Washington, D. C., October 26, 1927.

Senator DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: We appreciate the clear presentation of the situation surrounding the United States merchant marine which you pictured to us at the luncheon last week.

I am pleased to advise you that at a recent meeting the chapter has indorsed your views on the subject of Government operation.

Yours very sincerely,

EDWIN S. BETTELHEIM, Jr., Adjutant.

Mr. FLETCHER. I also wish to have inserted in the RECORD an article published in American Farming, in October, 1927, written by Alfred H. Haag, which is entitled "Why we need a merchant marine."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, it is so ordered.

The article is as follows:

WHY WE NEED A MERCHANT MARINE—INDISPENSABLE TO EXTEND OUR FOREIGN TRADE AND GUARD NATIONAL SAFETY

By Alfred H. Haag, director department of international shipping, Georgetown University

Probably the most vital issue confronting the American people to-day is the much-discussed shipping problem.

The apparent lack of appreciation on the part of the American people of this issue is primarily due to the insidious propaganda that is and has been waged against any move toward the establishment of a permanent and adequate merchant marine owned, controlled, and operated by the American people. It is high time that they realize that most articles which have been published opposing the upbuilding of our merchant marine are nothing more or less than artful foreign propaganda.

American ships of commerce are an economic necessity and an indispensable factor as an auxiliary to our Navy in times of national emergency.

It is inconceivable that the richest nation in the world, with a wealth of $400,000,000,000 and an international trade of almost $10,000,000,000 annually, with freight revenues for transporting this trade amounting to $600,000,000 per annum, can not support a merchant marine of the best-equipped and most suitable types of vessels sufficient to carry the greater portion of its commerce. The fact is that to-day 70 per cent of our international trade is carried in foreign-flag ships.

Flag-waving arguments have no effect in influencing American shippers to use American-flag ships, and will have none until such time as our flag waves from the ensign staff of a ship offering the same advantages in speed, regularity, and frequency of sailings as that offered by our competitors. Not until that time can we be assured of the full support of American shippers; nor is it fair or reasonable for us to expect them to accept inferior commercial service under the guise of patriotism.

The postwar trend has been toward cargo-liner service—that is, a port to port service, in contradistinction to tramp service—and this service now represents 75 per cent of the world's merchant tonnage. Our competitors were quick to recognize this trend and have either built or acquired modern tonnage with increased speeds and other economic advantages, so that to-day we are far behind in this respect.

During the period from 1921 to 1926 the principal maritime nations built for transoceanic service vessels of 2,000 gross tons and over, totaling approximately as follows:

Country	Number of vessels	Gross tons
Great Britain	600	3,500,000
Germany	172	950,000
Italy	63	506,000
France	72	450,000
Japan	52	250,000
United States	14	137,000
Total	973	5,793,000

Or for every 1 ship of this class that the United States has built Great Britain has built approximately 42, Germany 12, France 5, Italy 4, and Japan 4.

Of ships building or contracted for at the present time, of the same class and service, the records disclose that for every 1 ship of this class that the United States is building or has contracted for at the present time Great Britain is building or has contracted for 35, Germany 12, Italy 7, Japan 5, and France 2.

Another striking comparison is in the number and speed of vessels, suitable for transoceanic service, registered under the flag of the principal maritime nations.

Ships of 12 knots and over: Great Britain 1,280, France 277, United States 235, Japan 206, Italy 186, Germany 153.

In this class we rank third, being outclassed by our principal competitor, Great Britain, 5 to 1. Of ships 20 knots and over, Great Britain attains an advantage of 6 to 1.

The foregoing illustrates very definitely our weakness in efficient ocean carriers compared with our principal competitor nations. Even Germany has been able to establish herself as a formidable competitor in the world's trade routes. In her fleet of to-day over 60 per cent of her total tonnage is less than five years old with the economic supremacy that that implies.

We seem to be content to operate ships which were constructed to meet a war emergency and unless a policy of replacement is adopted immediately we shall soon fade from the picture and again have to rely on our active competitors to carry our commerce to and from the ports of the world.

American shipping costs more, due to higher construction and operating costs, and we are adding to that handicap by operating obsolete types of vessels in competition with the faster and more modern types of our competitors. It is vitally necessary to embark immediately on a new construction program to provide our Nation with competitive types of commerce carrier.

It seems rather inconsistent for this Nation to have scrapped 850,000 tons of naval vessels (many of them the most modern types of fighting ships), and with it world naval supremacy, at a cost of almost $400,000,000 and then hold on like grim death to obsolete types of merchant ships while other nations have disposed of their inefficient ships without delay.

At the Washington Arms Conference in 1922 the United States made a sincere effort to assist other nations to curtail their expenditures by acquiescing in the apparent desire for world disarmament; and we proved our absolute sincerity in agreeing to and complying with the scrapping program. We even consented to one of the Washington treaty nations constructing capital ships after the Washington conference. In addition to this, when we glance over the world's shipbuilding activities for the past five years, we find all the nations who participated in the treaty have far outbuilt this country in combatant types of vessels. And to-day we are considerably below the naval strength agreed to at the Washington Arms Conference, which in spirit and principle was intended to cover all types of fighting ships. The American people most certainly felt that the strength of their Navy should be at least the equal of that of any of the Washington treaty nations. But after five years we find that we are trailing far behind.

It is astounding the progress our competitor nations have made in the upbuilding of their merchant and naval fleets, particularly since the signing of the Washington treaty; and it would be rather interesting to know how far American dollars have aided other nations in the strengthening of their sea power.

Of the $12,000,000,000 in private American loans, it is reasonable to assume that American dollars have aided these nations considerably in furnishing their shipyards with work in the construction of modern commerce carriers and naval vessels with which American ships must compete. It would seem that after all "Uncle Shylock" is a most liberal individual in assisting his friends across the seas, and it is high time that some consideration be given to our problems at home, particularly that of our sea power, which vitally affects the welfare of the entire Nation, both from an economic standpoint as well as that of national security.

If our Nation is to continue to prosper, it is highly essential that the American people awaken to the fact that American ships of commerce are an absolute necessity, not only to insure American industries uninterrupted ocean transportation in carrying their surplus products to the markets of the world, but to insure the continuous flow of our inbound commerce essential to industry.

In the matter of national defense it is obviously necessary that we have an adequate fleet of commerce carriers to support our Navy, as it is the combined strength of both the naval and merchant fleet that reflects the sea power. They are one and inseparable, and if we are to live up to American traditions and ideals our sea power must be second to none.

Mr. FLETCHER. I also ask to have printed in the RECORD a short letter from Mr. Malcom M. Stewart, chairman of the Middle West Foreign Trade Committee, inclosing a bulletin which is entitled "A middle-west view of present shipping situation."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the papers will be inserted in the RECORD.

The communications are as follows:

MIDDLE WEST FOREIGN TRADE COMMITTEE,
Cincinnati, Ohio, December 19, 1927.

Hon. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR FLETCHER: The advance copy of our December bulletin will be interesting to you, and I would appreciate it very much if you have any comments to make you would give me the benefit of your reaction.

Very truly yours,

MALCOM M. STEWART, Chairman.

MIDDLE WEST FOREIGN TRADE COMMITTEE,
Cincinnati, Ohio, December 22, 1927.

A MIDDLE WEST VIEW OF PRESENT SHIPPING SITUATION

To the members of the Middle West Foreign Trade Committee and others interested:

I attach copy of the resolutions adopted by the Middle West Foreign Trade and Merchant Marine Conference, held under the auspices of our committee at St. Louis on November 16, 1927. The action taken by the conference is in accord with the policies adopted and advocated by our committee during the past several years.

TO MAKE EFFORTS EFFECTIVE

In order to make effective the work of our organization it is essential that our members do everything they can to further the policies we are constantly and consistently supporting. Your Senators and Representatives want your views on these questions, particularly at this time when the Congress must take some action on the merchant-marine question. I urge therefore that you immediately request your Senators and Representatives to support the policies advocated by our recent conference.

I desire also to call to your particular attention statements made recently by the President on the merchant marine. We were hopeful the President would at this time come out for some definite aid for the merchant marine and would recommend that in the meantime the Congress do whatever might be necessary to keep our shipping services efficiently maintained and on a par with those operated under foreign flags.

ONE VIEW BY THE PRESIDENT

In his message to the Congress on December 6 the President has this, and only this, to say on the vital merchant-marine question:

"The United States Government fleet is transporting a large amount of freight and reducing its drain on the Treasury. The Shipping Board is constantly under pressure, to which it too often yields, to protect private interests rather than serve the public welfare. More attention should be given to merchant ships as an auxiliary to the Navy. The possibility of including their masters and crews in the Naval Reserve, with some reasonable compensation, should be thoroughly explored as a method of encouraging private operation of shipping. Public operation is not a success. No investigation, of which I have caused several to be made, has failed to report that it could not succeed or to recommend speedy transfer to private ownership. Our exporters and importers are both indifferent about using American ships. It should be our policy to keep our present vessels in repair and dispose of them as rapidly as possible rather than undertake any new construction. Their operation is a burden on the National Treasury, for which we are not receiving sufficient benefits."

ANOTHER VIEW BY THE PRESIDENT

On the same day in an address to the members of the Republican National Committee the President is quoted as follows:

"Waterways and harbors, however, are useless without ships. Our Government operation of our merchant marine has been helpful in many ways, but it is far lacking of complete success. It would be much cheaper and far more beneficial to get it into private hands under some system of Government support which would enable it to meet the lower costs of building and lower rates of wages of foreign shipping."

PRESIDENT'S VIEWS UNDEFINED

We do not know what the President had in mind when he stated the Shipping Board too often yields to pressure to protect private interests. We do know that very recently a majority of the Shipping Board refused to yield to private interests who wanted certain lines on terms that would be contrary to the direct mandate of the merchant marine act, 1920, and for which action the members of the Shipping Board are being severely criticized by those interested.

IMPORTERS AND EXPORTERS NOT INDIFFERENT

We do not believe our exporters and importers are indifferent about using American ships, but we do think constant agitation to get the Government out of the shipping business, before sufficient aids are given private enterprises to take over the lines, is not hleping the patronage of our lines.

UNDUE PRESSURE ON SHIPPING BOARD

Constant efforts are made by people who want to get the Government out of the shipping business to make it appear that the law directs the Shipping Board to sell all vessels, regardless of the consequences. The law clearly directs the Shipping Board first to establish and maintain the merchant marine and, second, to sell the lines to private companies if by such sales the primary purpose of the law can be attained.

NECESSARY TO FOREIGN TRADE

With all due respect to the President, we maintain that the operation of the American merchant marine, either by private enterprise or by the Government, is of vital necessity to the proper growth of our foreign trade and for our national defense, and that the benefits derived from this operation even by the Government far exceed the burden on the Treasury. The expenditures for our shipping services are comparable to the appropriations made for our Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce of the Department of Commerce for the promotion of our foreign trade. And we find a vast majority of our people support this view.

NO BURDEN ON TREASURY OR TAXPAYERS

Until some form of aid is given by the Government to enable private enterprise to permanently maintain all of our essential shipping services, we strongly urge that the Government continue the operation of the services through private American companies who have the support of the communities served, and that the Congress from time to time authorize whatever new construction may be necessary to efficiently maintain the lines, the cost of such new construction to come from the construction loan fund of the Shipping Board, and with no call on either the Treasury or the taxpayers.

This is no commitment to permanent Government ownership and operation, but it is a most definite commitment to a permanent, efficient American merchant marine.

And as long as the Government remains in the shipping business we favor the retention of the regional United States Shipping Board to maintain the services. This board was created by the Congress as an independent body to manage our merchant marine and it was never contemplated that the President should direct the policies of the board any more than he would the decisions of the Interstate Commerce Commission. The Shipping Board represents the views of all sections of our country, not alone one section, on this all-important question.

Your Senators and Representatives will appreciate your views. I would be pleased to hear from you on this question.

MALCOLM M. STEWART, Chairman.

Mr. FLETCHER. I should like also to have inserted in the RECORD an article by Mr. H. B. Arledge, special representative of the Middle West Foreign Trade Committee, dated November 26, 1927, written to Mr. C. A. Swope, secretary, Traffic Club of New York, in reply to some questions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

MERCHANT MARINE—VIEWS OF MIDDLE WEST AND SOUTHERN INTERESTS IN CONNECTION WITH ADDRESS BEFORE TRAFFIC CLUB OF NEW YORK BY IRA A. CAMPBELL, OF AMERICAN STEAMSHIP OWNERS' ASSOCIATION

MIDDLE WEST FOREIGN TRADE COMMITTEE,
Washington, D. C., November 26, 1927.

Mr. C. A. SWOPE,
Secretary of Traffic Club of New York,
Waldorf Astoria, New York City.

MY DEAR MR. SWOPE: As a member of the Traffic Club of New York, who is greatly interested in the development of our foreign trade and the maintenance of the American merchant marine, I desire to make a few comments on these subjects in connection with the address of Mr. Ira A. Campbell, general counsel of the American Steamship Owners' Association, before the club on October 25, and which address has recently been distributed to the members in pamphlet form.

I am writing particularly from the viewpoint of Middle Western and Southern commercial people with whom I am actively associated. I spent a number of years in the North Atlantic with the Pennsylvania Railroad System. The Middle West and South want nothing more than an equality of opportunity with our other sections and ports, and we have usually found most of our New York friends in accord with our efforts.

It has been clearly demonstrated on many occasions that the majority of the American people are in complete accord with the declaration in the preamble of the merchant marine act 1920 that "for the national defense and for the proper growth of its foreign and domestic commerce the United States shall have a merchant marine of the best equipped and most suitable types of vessels." A majority of the people heard on this question have stated that they prefer the merchant marine to be under private ownership and operation, but until it is possible for private enterprise to take over for permanent maintenance the essential lines they desire the Government to continue the present policy of having the Shipping Board operate the services through private American companies.

It is generally admitted, and it was quite conclusively shown during the subsidy campaign of 1922, in which campaign I took an active part in an effort to secure aids for private owners, that American ships can not compete on equal terms in foreign trade with vessels operating under foreign flags. In view of this fact, why should any of the essential cargo lines that are now being maintained by the Shipping Board—lines that carry no mail and which could not benefit from any mail subsidy such as referred to by Mr. Campbell—be sold with only a stipulation that the purchaser must continue the service for a mere five years. If a purchaser did maintain the service for five years and during that time Congress granted no substantial aid to private American shipping companies, it is a hundred-to-one shot that upon the expiration of the five years the purchaser would discontinue the service and place the vessels in some profitable trade, probably our protected coastwise trade. Then the Shipping Board would likely be without suitable vessels with which to reestablish the service and the American merchant marine in foreign trade would soon be only a memory. It is a fairly safe guess that most of the Shipping Board services that have been sold under five-year guaranties of operation to which Mr. Campbell referred will be discontinued upon the expiration of the guaranty periods.

Why is it not best to continue the present method of operation until the Congress does grant the necessary aid and then turn the lines over to private enterprise, instead of trying to force sales at this time that are not sound. In the interim we can continue under the merchant marine act, 1920, urging Congress to make good the declaration in that act by the appropriation of sufficient funds for operations, reconditioning of some of the present vessels and construction of new vessels that are urgently needed to place our lines on a parity with our foreign competitors. We can not expect our producers and receivers to patronize lines that are inferior to those used by their competitors. Funds for this construction could be taken from the construction loan fund of the board, with no call on the taxpayers. This fund was created and still exists for the purpose of making loans to private American shipping companies, but no such companies are seeking loans to construct vessels for foreign service.

Surely this is no commitment to permanent Government ownership and operation, but it is a very definite commitment to a permanent American merchant marine.

The Shipping Board lines are not competing with any private American lines, regardless of statements that are sometimes made to the contrary, and these lines are necessary for the proper growth of our commerce. Constant improvement is being made by the Shipping Board and its private American managing agents in the operation of these lines, and instead of attempting to belittle their efforts and suggest arguments for foreign lines to use against us we should solidly support the board and its agents. The public deals with these private companies, and the relations between the public and these private American operating companies can and should be the same as if the lines were privately owned.

Mr. Campbell quoted from section 7 of the merchant marine act, 1920, to the effect that the board should not continue to operate the lines unless it appears that within a reasonable time they can be made self-sustaining. He apparently overlooked further down in this section the provision that lines being then maintained by the board shall be maintained until in the opinion of the board the maintenance thereof is against the public interests. It is also an error to assume that the primary purpose of the merchant marine act, 1920, is to sell the vessels. The primary purpose is clearly stated to be the establishment and maintenance of the American merchant marine and the secondary purpose is to sell the vessels if the primary purpose can be attained by such sales.

The funds spent on our merchant marine are comparable to the expenditures made by our excellent Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, of the Department of Commerce, all for the purpose of developing our foreign trade. We do not believe in giving up something we have for something we may have for only five years or less.

We supported the merchant marine act, 1920, and the subsidy bill of 1922, and we will support any proper measure that will enable private American shipping companies to compete on equal terms with their foreign competitors. And in the meantime we will continue to urge the proper and efficient maintenance of our present lines and services and close cooperation with the Shipping Board and its private managing agents in carrying out the mandate of the Congress in the merchant marine act, 1920.

I earnestly urge the members of our club to stand by and support the board and its agents until it is possible to turn our lines over to private enterprise for permanent maintenance. I am sure none of us is impressed by Mr. Campbell's comparison of our Government-owned shipping to a Russian-owned shoe-manufacturing business. It is not even comparable to our late-lamented Railroad Administration. The Government owns the ships and operates them through private American companies who have the support of the local communities served, and under present conditions we can not hope to retain these essential services under any other plan.

I commend the subject to the careful consideration of the members of our club.

Very truly yours,

H. B. ARLEDGE.

Mr. FLETCHER. I also ask to have printed in the RECORD an editorial appearing in the Southern Ruralist of April 1, 1927. Mr. C. A. Cobb, the editor of that paper, has written quite a number of editorials on this subject, and has a vision and a far-sightedness that is quite refreshing. What he says is to the point, and is so clearly and admirably expressed that it shows he has a full comprehension of the importance of an American merchant marine.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the editorial will be printed in the RECORD.

The editorial is as follows:

SHIPPING BOARD RIGHT

The United States Shipping Board has very properly turned down the ridiculously low bids for our great passenger ships—the Leviathan, the best ship in the world, among them—and for the freight ships of the American merchant lines. It took great courage to successfully beat off the concerted attacks of foreign owning and operating interests and those private interests here in our own country who would preempt the seas for themselves and who have gone so far as to urge the Government to sink our ships if necessary to get the Government out of the "shipping business." There hasn't been a bid they have not urged the Government with all their power to accept, however inadequate, however irresponsible, or however much money it would lose the American people. What they have wanted above all else has been to get the Government out of their way. As to consequences, they seem not to care a whit.

We are not the United States we were back in 1914. We are the great creditor Nation now and the whole world is in debt to us. Industrially, through war pressure and demand born of the war, we moved into first place among the nations of the world and the whole world is our competitor. Agriculturally, we for a long time have been the greatest export Nation in the world. The world is our agricultural market. Without our own transportation facilities we would be at the mercy of those nations that are fighting for the business we feel that we must have. Handling the commerce of the world, they would divide the business of the world among themselves.

Every nation in Europe is struggling mightily for industrial as well as agricultural independence. These are the same nations that hauled the ocean-borne freight of the world before the war. Can we trust them to handle ours and theirs now? Would they haul our goods to their markets to compete with products of their own industries and own farms? It is different with cotton, to a degree. The world must come to us for that. But what price would we pay were we off the seas and at the mercy of foreign shipping interests? Fortunately, we have a little light on that matter that is surpassingly important.

Back in the fall of 1926 practically all available tonnage was withdrawn from general service in order to haul coal to Great Britain. You will recall that the miners of that country had at the time been on a strike for a long time and that the nation's coal supplies had been completely exhausted and that she had to come to the United States for relief. The demand for coal-carrying space sent carrying charges soaring. Not only that, except for the fact that we had our own boats there would have been none for cotton or wheat or the other products of agriculture which are more difficult to handle and more expensive to handle than coal, and which in large quantities must be moved in the fall of the year.

To show how attractive the coal cargo is, take the case of a ship of 8,800 dead-weight ton capacity. Such a ship carrying coal from Norfolk to the British Isles in October and November, the season of peak cotton movement, brought the operator $67,500. That same ship hauling cotton from Savannah or Charleston would have returned the operator a gross of only $41,000. And while the boat carrying coal would have delivered its cargo "free in and out," the vessel loaded with cotton would have had to bear cost of stevedoring here and abroad, and the loss of time in loading and unloading. These extra costs would run to around $7,000, leaving only $34,000 to go to the operator of the vessel carrying cotton. Take this $34,000 from the $67,500 earned by the vessel carrying coal and the difference is $33,500 in favor of coal. No private concern in the world could have been expected to turn down any such sum as that in order to save the cotton grower or the wheat grower from whatever calamity might befall him.

And yet our Government did that very thing, and in so doing rendered the Nation a service the value of which defies calculation in dollars and cents. With the prospects of a tremendous oversupply of cotton, the situation was bad enough. We shudder at the thought of what it would have been had there been no boats to haul that cotton. We have only to recall the distress of 1914 to get a fairly clear picture of the situation we would have had to face. We don't want 1914 any more!

During the period from July to October, Shipping Board boats moved 16,000,000 bushels of wheat and flour from Gulf ports, chiefly to points in Europe. During September and October Shipping Board vessels moved approximately a million bales of cotton from Gulf ports. From July to late fall the Shipping Board made available and assigned a total of 92 vessels for use in moving agricultural products to foreign countries.

Doesn't this justify us in opposing with all vigor the junking of our ships? Hasn't the fact been convincingly demonstrated that this Nation must have its own carrier service? Isn't the farmer's interest as great or even greater than that of anybody else? And aren't we right in rejoicing that the Shipping Board has at last turned a deaf ear to those selfish souls—principally a little group in the East—who seem utterly oblivious to the fact that there are others than themselves? Aren't the facts so overwhelmingly favorable as to put to shame those who unwittingly have attempted to discredit the work of the Shipping Board and the handling of our merchant fleet?

We must have an efficient merchant marine. If private capital won't give it to us—and private capital seems utterly unwilling to make a move in that direction without huge Government subsidy—then we must have Government operation, operation in the interest of safety and service to all.

Here's hoping that the wishy-washy policy of the administration toward this great problem is at an end, and that courage, definiteness, firmness, and a sense of broad national service will characterize the attitude from now on. We need that above all things else.

Mr. FLETCHER. I also ask that an editorial appearing in the Southern Ruralist of June 15, 1927, and entitled "More ships and better service," be inserted in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The editorial is as follows:

MORE SHIPS, BETTER SERVICE

It has gradually been driven home to the administration at Washington that the American public is thoroughly sold to the firm establishment of an American merchant marine that will meet the needs of the American shipping public. The dillydallying attitude that has characterized the administration of our merchant marine from the executive end will be tolerated no longer, and neither will our people stand complacently by and see ships that cost millions given away to private enterprises or junked. These ships are just as precious to the American public now during peace times as they were during the war, and they can do just as much to solve the problems of the producing public of America as they did to win the war. In no uncertain terms those who staged the investigation sponsored by the Shipping Board throughout the country last summer were told that we must have ships and ships a plenty.

Our first preference was for private ownership, but if there were no private concerns who could step in and do the job in a thoroughgoing manner with justice to every section, then the public would look to the Government itself to move forward with shipbuilding and ship operation without delay. It is interesting to see that public opinion, which is all but unanimous throughout the country now as to the value of our own shipping service, is about to bring forth a definite plan and establish a definite policy. The mean things that have been said about the inability of the Government to profitably operate ships have definitely been discredited. Government ships have not only established new lines but are actually showing a profit in the midst of the keenest competition the world has even seen and rendering a type of service that could not and would not have been possible had the merchant ships of the Nation been in other hands. It has taken the unlimited ability of the Nation itself to do what has been done.

In spite, however, of the fact that our ships have made good as carriers of the products of commerce and in spite of the fact that they have saved this Nation countless millions of dollars that would have been sacrificed had we had no merchant marine, there are those who still insist that the Government must get out of the shipping business even if the ships have to be taken out to the deep sea and sunk. Realizing that a definite policy is going to be worked out during the next session of Congress, enemies of our merchant marine, chiefly private ship-operating concerns of the East, are already seeking every opportunity to do injury to our merchant marine however slight the pretext.

Nothing more clearly demonstrates this fact than the recent utterances of J. A. Campbell, president of the Youngstown Sheet Metal Co., Youngstown, Pa. A little while ago at the annual meeting of the stockholders of his company he took occasion, according to published accounts of his address, to denounce the Shipping Board for hauling steel products from Antwerp, Belgium, to New York at $2.85 per ton when the North Atlantic conference freight rate was $4 per ton for the same service. It has developed since his statement was made, which was given very wide publicity and which was pointed out by eastern papers as reflecting the inefficiency and impotency of our American merchant marine service, that the actual rates charged were not as Mr. Campbell had said they were, but that no steel had been hauled from Antwerp to North American ports below rates ranging from $4.50 to $6.75 per ton. Had Mr. Campbell taken the trouble to get the facts from the records he would not have been guilty of the gross injustice with which he has been credited. The fact is, the Shipping Board is scrupulously meeting its responsibilities and deserves to be presented to the American public in the true light.

It is doubtless true that Mr. Campbell was sincerely at fault. He undoubtedly was retailing what he had heard, and doubtless heard from a source more directly interested than himself. In this connection we are told by authoritative sources in the Capital City of the Nation itself that the forces of opposition will visit Washington in all their power during the next session of Congress to see to it that our ships are junked if necessary to accomplish their purpose. We can not conceive of our Government being misled into agreeing to a policy that can be characterized accurately as nothing less than wholesale vandalism. The American people will not stand for it.

Mr. FLETCHER. I also should like to have inserted in the RECORD an editorial from the Southern Ruralist of September 1, 1927, entitled "Without ships we lose," and an editorial from the same publication of the issue of October 15, 1927, entitled "The public not to blame."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, it is so ordered.

The editorials are as follows:

WITHOUT SHIPS WE LOSE

As the success of our merchant marine disperses the smoke screen of opposition it is clearer than ever that one of the most urgent needs of the farmer is ample ships flying the American flag to carry his wares to customers abroad. Having had no ships for generations, our people, especially those of the interior, have had little opportunity to know about the value of a merchant fleet. Not knowing of its value, more often than not they were opposed to any attempts by the Government to establish a merchant fleet capable of demonstrating the value of such an institution to our people.

The World War taught us a lesson, one certainly that we should not soon forget. When it broke upon us it found our country without boats, and without boats we found ourselves unable to move those products of the Nation that enter into international trade. The merchant ships of other nations had been called in off the seas to haul soldiers and war supplies. Without ships, cotton, wheat, and tobacco dropped to the lowest price levels for many years, and brought disaster to agriculture throughout the country. Our farmers and others who had export commodities for shipment abroad were not the only losers. The Nation itself, on account of the need for the immediate construction of a merchant fleet, was forced under the pressure of war-time prices and labor conditions to spend countless millions of dollars in constructing boats that could have been built for a fraction of the war-time costs before war was declared. We had to have the ships, however, and could not stand back on expenses.

When the war was over the Government still owned these ships. It still owns a good many hundred, many of which have contributed immeasurably to the stability of agriculture, particularly here in the South. Except for the fact that the Government was able to place ninety-odd ships in the ports of the South last fall when the coal strike in England brought on another crisis similar to that of 1914, the price of cotton would have gone down to 5 or 6 cents again. Wheat and tobacco would have dropped, too. We of the South should always keep the important fact before us that the exports of cotton and tobacco represent more than one-third of the total exports of the whole country. Ships can make us, and lack of ships can break us.

Going back again to 1914, it cost the cotton farmer that year some three-quarters of a billion dollars more to grow the crop than he got for it. This enormous loss was wholly due to the fact that we had no ships. On two or three occasions President Coolidge has called upon the other great powers to join in a program of disarmament. Up to the present these conferences have been largely without desirable results. The most recent, the one held in Geneva a few weeks ago, was tragic in its ending, leaving the way open for competitive building of great navies. Already Congressmen and Senators are talking about the battleships that must be constructed to bring the American fleet up to an equality with the British fleet. All of this may be necessary. We do not know. Certainly the people of the Nation and their interests must be adequately protected. But to the naval expert and the armament builder protection is one thing and to the statesman it is another. The unfortunate thing is that naval experts instead of statesmen dominated the Geneva meeting. The call in 1914 was not for more battleships but for merchantmen. It was that call that gave us our great merchant fleet, of which we still have a remnant sufficiently large for foundation purposes and that must be preserved. In another emergency of similar character the call would undoubtedly again be for a merchant fleet. Again we urge that we strive by all reasonable means at our command to preserve the merchant fleet we have.

A merchant fleet will function 365 days in every year in the interest of the agriculture, commerce, and industry of the Nation, war or no war. Money spent on a merchant marine will be money that will bring a definite return every year whether there is war or peace. That can not be said, certainly to the same degree, of a battle fleet. A merchant fleet is clearly a constructive force, a building force, serving not only to protect the people in an emergency such as we had in 1914 and again in the fall of the past year, but to make us absolutely free at all times to carry our commerce where and when we will. Such a fleet is imperative if we are to build up all the ports and efficiently serve all the sections of the entire Nation. In spite of this very obvious fact, we had no merchant-fleet policy when the war was over, and what is even more tragic, we still have none, and the Stars and Stripes will be forced off the seas and the whole Nation placed back in its former helpless condition unless the people themselves rise up and demand that something definite be done toward establishing our fleet on a permanent basis once and for all. When the war was over there was an enormous hue and cry for the junking of our boats, and many actually went to the scrap heap. Those same forces are bringing every possible influence to bear upon Congress and upon the administration to force the Shipping Board and all its interests out of business. Private interests at home and merchant fleet owners abroad have joined hands to this end. In spite of all opposition, however, our merchant fleet, though greatly depleted in the number of ships, is making good—making good under conditions that might normally be expected to hopelessly destroy any sort of commercial enterprise. In spite of that fact, however, we have moved forward, and as stated already, our merchant fleet has made and is making its rich contribution to agriculture and all other industries alike.

So, again, war or no war, we must have a merchant fleet. War or no war, a merchant marine is one of the most pressing needs, not only of agriculture but of the entire industry of the Nation. Money that goes into the building and upkeep of battleships might be wasted, but money that goes into merchant ships will bring a rich return.

THE PUBLIC NOT TO BLAME

President Coolidge, according to recent White House news dispatches, is greatly disappointed at the lack of public interest in our merchant marine. He can not understand the indifference, and feels that lack of keener public interest has been and is now the greatest handicap to the successful operation of our merchant fleet.

A little while ago officials of the United States Shipping Board spent a month or so in the field holding public hearings. These hearings were held for the specific purpose of determining definitely the attitude of the public toward our fleet of merchant vessels—what the public wanted the Government to do. These meetings called out the thinking leaders in all phases of our agricultural and industrial life. They were held in every section of the country. Out of these hearings came the overwhelming and unqualified demand: Give us an adequate merchant marine. Let us have it under private operation if possible, but if that is not possible, then let the Government give us an adequate merchant marine—that was the public answer.

The opinion was emphatically voiced at these meetings that the shifting indefiniteness of the administration was the one great difficulty, and that until the negative, positionless policy of the powers that be in Washington was changed to one of positive action and definite policy the public would have little basis upon which to build confidence. For a long time it has very clearly been a case of lack of leadership at Washington and not public apathy that is to blame for the alleged indifference of the people. Had the President and his associates in power realized the need of the hour and had he and they taken a definite stand and laid down a definite policy, a different story would be to tell to-day. If the President's statement is a forerunner to the adoption of a definite and vigorous policy, he need not worry about the response of the public, for the public is convinced as never before in history of the vital need of an adequate tonnage of merchant vessels.

In this connection it is deeply gratifying to those who have realized the vital importance of a merchant marine and who have helped the Shipping Board fight its battles through these years of greatest trials that our boats are making good. It is remarkable that our fleet has been kept afloat and efficiently functioning in the interest of our international trade in spite of an antagonistic administration, and while in the hands of officers chosen for the purpose of scrapping the whole outfit. But it has made good in spite of all of these.

Administration leaders who have fought the building of a merchant marine are returning from investigations abroad. They left this country with the feeling that the fight they had made in the Halls of Congress to scrap our boats was in line with the best interests of the people. Back from Europe, however, where they had opportunity to study our country in the light of its relationship to other countries of the world, where they have seen our commerce in international trade, and where they have witnessed first-hand the reshaping processes of competitors, they tell us that if the United States is to hold a respectable position in international trade that we have got to have our own boats. They tell us that the life of our international trade, because of developments overseas and because of the negative policy at Washington, hangs by a thread, and that if for any reason official Washington is unable to reverse its attitude and proceed promptly to build up an adequate fleet of merchant vessels that serious economic reverses are ahead of us.

Senator WESLEY L. JONES, of Washington, puts it this way: "No merchant marine means the destruction of our commerce by the ruthlessness of foreign competitors, and we have learned by sad and expensive experience the necessity of having a fleet in time of war." The foregoing is about in line with what other responsible students of the problem are saying. As a matter of fact, it is so nearly what they all say that it would serve as a sort of unanimous quotation.

One of our most widely read New York business writers has swung around to the position where he believes "that the greatest opportunity for the capture of world trade since the war now is opening before the Shipping Board." Such a statement coming from that quarter—the stronghold of the opposition—would have been regarded as rank heresy had it been made three or four years ago, when we knew less than we know now about the position this country occupies in world affairs.

All of which brings us back to the point that we made in the beginning. The trouble with the building of an adequate fleet of vessels lies at the doors of the White House and not at the doors of the public. The White House has not even thrown the poor dog a bone, to say nothing of giving it the attention and support it deserves. In spite of his protestations, Mr. Coolidge has no alibis. And in spite of all opposition we are going to have our own boats. The people will see to that.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, 12 years ago, on November 12, 1915, I delivered an address at a dinner of the Academy of Political Science in New York. The closing portion of that address I would repeat now. In my judgment it is applicable to the situation in which we find ourselves to-day. Without reading it, I ask to have the last page of the address inserted in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Thought, however mature, conviction, however deep, get us nowhere until they begin to operate in will and act. Merely recounting with reiteration the deplorable situation, and nothing more, evidences a species of cynicism, an unhealthy state of mind—lays no keels.

There never was a time when a change in shipping conditions would be less disturbing and more advantageous than right now. Now is the best possible time to inaugurate such changes. Nothing will be gained by delay. We have all the information upon which to act. Satisfaction with present conditions means a sacrifice of golden opportunities and an inexcusable lack of proper conception of our responsibilities.

Monetary and trade supremacy had its inception on the banks of the Nile. It moved westward to the shores of the Mediterranean and thence further westward out into the open sea of commercial activity. It passed from Portugal to Spain, then to Holland, then to France, and then to England. Venice, Lisbon, Amsterdam, Antwerp succeeded each other as centers; then London, the frontier town of the Middle Ages, at last supplanted them all.

The earlier struggles were directed to the attainment of some particular national supremacy, and that was to be founded on monopoly. That meant trouble. But the distinctive feature of commerce to-day is its international character. It is not a question of monopoly or particular supremacy; it is a question in large measure of leadership, and in this the factors are natural advantages, better methods, better facilities of exchange, efficient and economical service, a sound currency and financial influence, and the freest markets. I have seen it averred that in all the world's history nothing has had lasting importance like trade. Pitt declared, "British rule is British trade." Chamberlain expressed the same thought in the statement, "The empire is commerce."

The marvelous resources of the United States, her financial strength and facilities, the awakening of the East and the promising outlook in Latin America, the Isthmian Canal, the opportunities for forming new commercial ties, the relations founded on a better understanding, and mutual good will toward all the world mean, if we but discharge our responsibilities, the establishment of commanding centers of trade in the United States and drawing westward again commercial leadership.

The great English poet and dramatist gives us this picture:

Antonio is sad. Salarino says to him:

> "Your mind is tossing on the ocean,
> There, where your argosies with portly sail,
> Like signiors and rich burghers on the flood,
> Or, as it were, the pageants of the sea,
> Do overpeer the petty traffickers,
> That curtsy to them, do them reverence,
> As they fly by them with their woven wings."

To which Antonio replies:

> "Believe me, no; I thank my fortune for it,
> My ventures are not in one bottom trusted,
> Nor to one place; nor is my whole estate
> Upon the fortune of this present year,
> Therefore, my merchandise makes me not sad."

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I merely wish to say that I think the Senator from Florida is to be congratulated upon the very interesting and able address which he has just concluded. I hope it will engage the attention of Senators. We have many problems which need to be solved, as the Senator from Florida has pointed out. There will be legislation proposed, and if we are to have a merchant marine to carry on our commerce and also as a means of national defense, there must be early action. Whether we agree or not with the Senator from Florida in his definite conclusions, we can not, as patriots and as citizens of this great country, disagree with the conclusion that it is vital to the national welfare to preserve and maintain an effective merchant marine.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, announced that the House had disagreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 483) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to acquire certain lands within the District of Columbia to be used as sites for public buildings; requested a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon; and that Mr. ELLIOTT, Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee, and Mr. LANHAM were appointed managers on the part of the House at the conference.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WATERMAN in the chair) laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representativs disagreeing to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 483) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to acquire lands within the District of Columbia to be used as sites for public buildings, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. KEYES. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendment to the bill and agree to the conference requested by the House, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. KEYES, Mr. WARREN, Mr. FESS, Mr. REED of Missouri, and Mr. ASHURST conferees on the part of the Senate.

AFFAIRS IN NICARAGUA

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I understand the Senate is soon to adjourn until Monday. I am very sorry that this step is to be taken, for there is a tremendously grave and unfortunate situation confronting our country at this hour. American boys are now being killed in Nicaragua. We have no right, moral or legal, to use an armed force in Nicaragua; no just cause or lawful excuse. We are violating the constitution of Nicaragua and we are violating the Constitution of the United States by the presence and activities of our armed forces in our neighboring Republic of Nicaragua.

A most remarkable situation confronts the American people. The President is conducting a war down there, and has been conducting it for months, without ever consulting Congress. Congress met on the 5th of December last, but the war proceeds through Executive orders without the lawmaking body of the Nation ever being consulted. I am not willing to permit the Senate to adjourn until Monday without giving some Senators an opportunity to protest against this unlawful and un-American conduct. I do not want to see another American boy killed in this war in Nicaragua. L. C. Russell, a fine American boy from my State, has been killed down there. He was forced to go out against natives of Nicaragua who were fighting for self-government; forced to fight against natives who were seeking to drive out of their statehouse an impostor and usurper; forced to fight against natives who were seeking to remove from the office of President the man who with armed bandits drove the President of Nicaragua out of office.

Mr. President, it looks as if this Government is entering very fast upon the road to imperialism. It looks like our Army is now being used to collect the debts of Wall Street financiers. I wonder if Washington and his ragged Continentals, who left their bloody foot tracks in the snow at Valley Forge ever thought that they were fighting to establish a government that would one day become the handy instrument of predatory wealth and a collecting agency for men who put their filthy lucre above the welfare of their country and the lives of its soldiers?

Nicaragua is a sovereign nation, separate and apart from our own. We have no right to go there with an army and force our will upon the people of Nicaragua. We have already incurred the ill will and hostility of nearly all of the Central and South American nations by our foolish and unwarranted war upon the people of Nicaragua. And we are digging up snakes perhaps that we will be unable to kill for years to come. Think of it! Peaceful, liberty-loving America butchering her men on Nicaraguan soil in a war with the patriotic natives who are fighting for self-government, for the same principles that our fathers fought for in the War of the Revolution. And what is the sentiment of Nicaragua with regard to this situation?

The sentiment of the masses of Nicaragua is overwhelmingly against Diaz and his fostered government.

They have recently had elections in the various municipalities of Nicaragua. I hold in my hand a copy of a splendid magazine published here in Washington, entitled "The New Age." It contains an article written by Dr. Albert H. Putney, director of the school of political science of the American University, Washington, D. C. It is the December number of the magazine, and in the article to which I have referred Mr. Putney tells us:

Recent municipal elections in Nicaragua resulted in an overwhelming victory for the Liberal Party.

And yet, in spite of that, Mr. President, we are down there with our troops fighting to sustain and keep in power the minority party—a bastard régime—holding an impostor in the office of President by the armed forces of this great liberty-loving Government of the western world. It is simply outrageous. The fathers and mothers of this Nation have a right to protest against such irregular, outrageous, and inexcusable conduct.

In the face of this grave and serious national situation why are we going to adjourn until Monday? Is it for the purpose of giving the administration a chance with the Senate adjourned to rush more American boys down there to be killed in one big effort to overpower with overwhelming numbers the natives who are fighting for home rule and self-government? They are working fast. The newspapers tell us this morning that the Diaz government has applied for a loan from Wall Street. So Wall Street is to furnish the money to help buy the presidential election in Nicaragua, and American soldiers with guns and bayonets are to patrol the streets about the ballot boxes, intimidate the Liberals, and do their bit to help Diaz control the election.

It is worse than the force bill which a Republican Congress undertook to put upon the South in reconstruction days—our Government sending armed forces to hold elections in foreign republics, to keep one faction from voting and aiding the other faction to remain in power. My God, what are we coming to?

Mr. President, I have here a letter from an American father who has just lost a son in the war in Nicaragua. My heart goes out in tender sympathy to him; God bless him and his good wife in their sorrow; their son has been butchered in Nicaragua—let me read the letter?

ST. LOUIS, January 4.

John S. Hemphill, of Ferguson, Mo., a suburb, whose son, Sergt. John F. Hemphill, was killed last Saturday in action between the United States marines and the troops of General Sandino, Nicaraguan rebel, to-day made public an open letter to President Coolidge protesting against what he termed the "disgraceful war" in Nicaragua.

He said:

What we are doing is no less than murder for the sole purpose of keeping in power a puppet President and acting as a collector for Wall Street.

Mr. President, that is the way an American patriot and father feels about this terrible thing. His son has been killed down there in this outrageous, unauthorized, and awful war. Congress has not authorized war in Nicaragua, and yet we are in war down there. We are sending more troops down there now, and instead of doing something to stop it, the Republican Senate has adjourned over to Monday. We should withdraw the marines and bring them out and wash the hands of this Government of it all. That is what we ought to do. We are fast becoming an imperialistic power. We are not going any further on that road without my vigorous protest.

Indeed, I have protested before, but this Nicaraguan affair is the most daring and far-reaching step that we have taken. But let me finish this letter:

My son survived honorable service through the World War against Germany only to be officially murdered in a disgraceful war against this little nation.

I hope enough Senators will join me in this movement to stop this effort to adjourn, that we will stay here and debate this question to-morrow, and let the fathers and mothers whose sons are yet to be killed in a long-drawn-out war in South American countries if this war continues—that some of us were here doing what we could to stop this thing.

Is this strange and unauthorized warfare going on much longer, this war inaugurated by the President and Secretary Kellogg? Are we going to sit here and remain silent while we are in session and permit it to continue? If so, we ought to resign and go home. There are men in the States at home who would protest if they were here. Certain big Wall Street interests who have bought bonds in Nicaragua do not want this question discussed in the Senate. They want to keep the people ignorant as to what is going on in Nicaragua. Be quiet, they whisper, certain financial interests have joined hands with the Roman Catholic Church power in Nicaragua.

Let me give you the facts to back that statement.

Mr. Putney, in this same December article in The New Age, says:

The Liberal newspapers in Nicaragua have recently acquired courage to renew attacks upon the control of the schools of their country by Roman Catholic priests, and the great degree of control which the hierarchy exercises over the present Conservative government. A newspaper at Managua (La Noticia) has been publishing a series of detailed statements showing the sums of money which the Government has been giving to the Roman Catholics for educational purposes.

This same paper has also published many letters from its subscribers showing the bitter feeling in the minds of the mass of the citizens of Nicaragua against the present union of church and state, with the church as the controlling influence in that country.

Senators, are we going to remain silent and permit these American boys to continue to be butchered in such a cause—an unholy alliance between the money changers of Wall Street and the Roman Catholic hierarchy of Nicaragua? Diaz is a Roman Catholic. He does not represent a majority of the Catholics of Nicaragua. There has been a revolt against this man and his party among many Catholics, and all the other elements are against him. Two-thirds of the people of Nicaragua condemn this bastard government; and yet we, of this great Nation, have our soldiers down there, spending the money of the taxpayers of the Nation, spilling the blood of the best boys in the Republic, and murdering soldiers under the flag for such a cause!

Mr. President, it is time that this country was waking up. I call on other Senators here to express their opposition to this course. I have a resolution pending now in the Foreign Relations Committee calling on the President to withdraw our troops. If we could stay in session, we could get action on it by Monday, and maybe save the lives of many American boys. But if we adjourn, this forum will be closed and no action can be taken. And the devilish work will continue in Nicaragua.

One hundred and fifty-odd years ago this Government was struggling for its liberty. Patrick Henry loved it so well that he said he was willing to die for it. He said, "Give me liberty or give me death." To-day the patriots in Nicaragua who are going up against this great, strong Government love their own land and self-government so well that they are willing to die for it. It is claimed that we have killed hundreds of them, mowed them down like cutting wheat at the harvest time—for what? To protect American rights and interests? No. But what are we doing? Two influences are at work—certain financial interests in Wall Street and the Roman Catholic hierarchy.

I know it will offend some people for me or anyone else to talk that way, but I am going to tell the truth about every question that affects my country. I am not going to be mealy-mouthed about any of these questions when the welfare of my country is involved and the lives of American boys are at stake. I am going to lay my finger on the facts, cost what it may to me personally.

Now, I am going to ask the Committee on Foreign Relations to act at once on my resolution. I know that the great chairman of that committee will do what he can—I believe he will—and I hope the other members will join him. I am going to insist upon action on that resolution. I am going to continue, as best I can, to give the facts to the people of the country.

Thank God, it is still their country, although many of its instrumentalities are becoming paralyzed. Insidious, predatory influences are moving slowly but steadily upon many of the instrumentalities of the Government; and I want to say that I am astounded that we have not had more protests against this bloody, outrageous war that is going on without authority in Nicaragua. The time was when almost every Senator would have been on his feet denouncing it.

What is the trouble? Are we losing our courage, seeking to move along the lines of least resistance, afraid of the frown of some big influence? Mr. President, no man who puts his political fortunes against the lives of American boys at a time like this is worthy of being in either branch of Congress. We ought to stand here and fight for the rights and the lives of these boys. They can not speak for themselves here. Here is a broken-hearted American father, with crape on the doorpost of his American home, bowed in grief over his dead boy, butchered in Nicaragua, writing the President that this is a disgraceful war, and that the Army has become a collecting agency for Wall Street.

God help the Republican Party if it will not rise to the occasion and help us to deliver this Government out of the clutches of this unholy alliance—out of this miserable and indefensible war in Nicaragua!

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, in 1914 there was a landing of the marines at Vera Cruz, Mexico. The landing was without any authority from Congress, but by the order of the President of the United States, Woodrow Wilson. The matter was taken up in the other House by resolution similar in character to the resolution offered by the Senator from Alabama at this time. Some considerable criticism was made against President Wilson for what was charged at that time to be a step that might lead to war without any authority from Congress.

I was a Member of that body at the time. I very distinctly remember the eloquent address of the Senator from Alabama in denouncing the persons who had taken the position that he is taking to-day; and, to refresh the memory of the country, I want to read from that address of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN].

In referring to the matter of landing the marines, which was charged by a certain group in the House with which I did not have sympathy at the time, to be an effort to drive from power in Mexico a President, namely, Huerta, a statement to that effect was made by a Republican Member; and the Senator from Alabama used the language I am about to read on the 20th of April, 1914. The World War broke out on the 1st of August, 1914. This has nothing whatever to do with the World War, because no one ever dreamed of a world war in April, 1914.

The eloquent Senator made this statement:

> This is a solemn occasion—too solemn for partisan politics—and yet some gentlemen on the Republican side have lugged into this discussion the claptrap rubbish of political desperadoes, so thirsty for the fountains of political power, so hungry for a return of the emoluments of Republican control, and so dead to the demands of patriotic duty that they are willing to embarrass the administration, slander the President, brook indignities upon our soldiers, and insults upon our flag in order to make political capital, to gain partisan advantage.

Further on:

> The gentleman now seeks to shackle the feet and manacle the hands of a Democratic President when our dignity and honor are at stake, when our soldiers are humiliated, and our flag insulted by the ungodly and brutal tyrant of Mexico. [Applause.] The gentleman now makes mean insinuations about the motives that prompt this peace-loving, patriotic, Democratic President to uphold the dignity and honor of the American Union.

Further on:

> They have denounced his policy of watchful waiting and urged that he should put an end to the terrible conditions in Mexico; and now, when our country, without any fault on her part, is insulted by the self-constituted authority of a murderous and drunken tyrant, the President is criticized and abused by men who, in their desire to serve their party, prove faithless to their country.

Further on:

> Mr. Speaker, now that the President of the United States—the Commander in Chief of our Army and Navy—has found conditions serious enough to send battleships to Mexican waters, it is the duty of every Member of Congress and of every patriotic American citizen to stand faithfully by him as he goes to uphold the dignity and the honor of this, the greatest Government on the globe.

I commend these words to the Senator at this time.

Mr. HEFLIN. The case cited by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS] is in no sense on all fours with the present one. At the time to which he refers the President of Mexico had just been murdered. Huerta, his trusted military chief, had butchered him, had killed him in the statehouse, and the outlaws and bandits had taken charge. The Government of Mexico had been overthrown and bandits had attacked American citizens and seized property of the American Government. It was then that the President landed those troops temporarily. Be it said to his credit, he gave prompt attention to America's rights and interests and then brought the armed forces home. He did not stay there long.

But in the case of Nicaragua the situation is entirely different. No American property had been seized, no American citizen had been attacked. The truth compels us to admit that our soldiers have been used to protect a bastard government over the will of two-thirds of the people of Nicaragua who are seeking to return to national control the officers duly elected by the people of Nicaragua. It is their right and duty to do that. The President started this war in Nicaragua when Congress was not in session, and he continues to carry it on when Congress is in session. He has never obtained the consent of Congress to involve the United States in war in Nicaragua.

No, Mr. President, there is nothing at all in the suggestion the Senator from Ohio has made about the speech I delivered in the House in 1914. I want to repeat now, in the time of my good friend, the able and distinguished Senator from Tennessee, that I am going to ask the Senate to remain in session to-morrow and discuss this Nicaraguan question, and to have a session Saturday for the purpose of acting on my resolution which requests the President to withdraw our armed forces from Nicaragua. I ask unanimous consent that we may have a session of the Senate to-morrow and Saturday for the purpose of discussing and taking action upon my resolution providing for the immediate withdrawal of our soldiers from Nicaragua.

Mr. JONES. The Senator probably is not aware of the fact that the Senate has already entered into a unanimous consent agreement that when we adjourn to-day, we will adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. HEFLIN. I am sorry that has been done; it must have happened when most of us were at lunch, and there were but few Senators here.

Mr. JONES. Oh, no, Mr. President; it happened immediately after the convening of the Senate to-day.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I do not think the Senator from Alabama ought to make a statement of that nature without being sure of his facts. As a matter of fact, the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] at the beginning of the session this morning asked unanimous consent that when the Senate adjourns to-day, it adjourn to meet on Monday. He stated reasons for making the request, and I, in the open session of the Senate, with rather a large attendance, said that I had no objection to the request of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. HEFLIN. I did not know that, Mr. President.

Mr. JONES. The request was made right after the call of the roll, when a quorum was present.

Mr. HEFLIN. I did not know that. I happened to be called out of the Chamber temporarily. I regret that I was not present. There is no Senator in this body who has a better record for attendance here than I have. I do not mean to boast about that; it is my duty to be here. But I was unfortunately out when this thing happened. But that does not change the seriousness of the situation. It will not affect the other purposes for which we did adjourn to come back in session to-morrow and discuss the Nicaraguan question. I wish it could be done. I ask it in the names of the boys who are yet living, who may have to die in a useless and cruel war in Nicaragua, and in the names of those dead boys who have been sacrificed to the outrageous, unholy purposes that I have mentioned.

AGRICULTURAL RELIEF

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I am going to detain the Senate for only a few minutes.

I see the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY], the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, in the Chamber, and I am wondering if I can not interrupt his silence, and ask him to state when he expects to have a farm relief bill reported out from his committee?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, answering the inquiry of the able Senator from Tennessee, I think the committee is in a position to take up consideration of that important subject matter about the 1st of February. I hope to pass it some time between the middle of February and the 1st of March, and have it promptly signed by the President.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY] has recently introduced in the Senate what is now known everywhere as the famous McNary-Haugen farm relief bill. It is substantially the same bill that Congress passed at the last session, but which the President vetoed. I trust that the Committee on Agriculture will, at the earliest possible moment, report that very excellent measure favorably.

The sooner the better. I regret that it is to be put off until February.

Mr. President, the President recently reported that 70 per cent of the population of America were exceedingly prosperous. He admitted that the other 30 per cent, the farmers of the country, were not in a prosperous condition. Surely, under circumstances like that, it is necessary for the Congress to do something for the benefit of so large a part of our population. I trust that the committee, therefore, will report as soon as possible this bill, and report it favorably. I think it would be well to report it without change.

Mr. President, the purpose of this bill is to provide for the control and disposition of the surpluses of agricultural products so as to prevent such surpluses from controlling the prices of all the crops. It also has for its purpose to prevent undue and excessive fluctuations in the markets for such commodities, to minimize waste and speculation, and to further the organization of the producers of such products into cooperative associations. The bill sets up the governmental machinery to carry these various purposes into effect. That it is a workable, feasible, practicable, and constitutional measure I have not the slightest doubt.

Mr. President, the average condition of the average farmer in this country since 1920 has, indeed, been deplorable. This particular season, it is true, prices of farm products have been even measurably adequate. During all this time the prices of nearly everything the farmer had to buy have been continuously and steadily rising. The cost of their labor, of their farming implements, of their transportation, and of their taxes has constantly increased. For the most part their farms, their homes, their stock and cattle, and even their growing crops are mortgaged. This condition is known to everyone. Newspapers publish it. Farmers' magazines aver it. Bankers and business men admit it. Farmers' organizations state it. All politicians and statesmen agree to it. Even President Coolidge declares it and deplores it.

President Coolidge in recent addresses has dwelt upon what he calls the prosperity of this country. He went so far as to say that the only problem is whether this country desires continued prosperity.

Mr. President, it is true that the prosperity of certain classes of our people exists. The net earnings of General Motors, Standard Oil, and United States Steel, for instance, have exceeded anything in the history of industry. The railroads and other transportation companies are more prosperous than they have ever been. The banks are in a better condition than they have ever been before. Public utilities are prosperous. Those who labor in industrial plants, in banks, or for transportation and utility companies are, no doubt, by reason of Federal laws, drawing the biggest wages in their history. So, if President Coolidge had limited his remarks to these businesses favored by Federal laws and to those who work for them, his views as to our prosperous condition would be correct. However, he did admit a fact which is apparent to every individual person in this country—that the farmers were not included in this prosperity.

The farmers comprise 30 per cent of our population, and they are in the worst plight of their history, and any prosperity that does not affect 30 per cent of our people is not a real prosperity and can not last. Inasmuch as agriculture is the basis of the greater portion of our wealth, unless agriculture is in a prosperous condition, it is just a question of time when all must suffer. Prosperity for all classes except the farmers is like a marriage celebration without the bridegroom—a very unsatisfactory and hopeless business.

Mr. President, the energies of our people may be divided into five classes—capital (banking), industry, transportation, labor, and farming. The first four divisions comprise 70 per cent of our population and the last one, agriculture, 30 per cent. The Federal Government has legislated its most beneficent bounties on the first three, namely, capital (banking), industry, and transportation. In the Wilson administration it included labor in the favored classes, and very properly so. But, substantially speaking, the Federal Government has not yet done anything for the farmers.

The entire wealth of this country was estimated by the Federal Trade Commission in 1922 to be three hundred and fifty-three billions of dollars. The farm wealth for that year was estimated to be sixty-three billions of dollars.

That commission later estimated the entire income of this country to be approximately ninety billions. Of this amount, those engaged in agriculture only receive twelve billions, or 12½ per cent of the total.

In other words, 30 per cent of our population—the farmers—have only about 17 per cent of the national wealth and only 12½ per cent of the national income. According to Government statistics which I have recently examined, it has been found that the average income of the average farmer in America, including all that he uses from the farm, is the pitiful sum of $730 a year, while the average income for all groups engaged in occupations other than farming is $1,445, just $45 less than double the income of the farmers. When you take away from the income what he uses from his own farm, his cash income is but a little more than $313.

Some assert that this lack of prosperity of the farmer is due to laziness, inefficiency, and lack of attention to his business. An eastern industrialist said to me a while back: "The farmers do not need any legislation. Just as soon as they quit riding around in automobiles and get down to business they will be all right. What they need is more alarm clocks and fewer automobiles." Incidentally, this man, who spoke of farmers riding in automobiles, owned three cars himself. He, of course, did not know what he was talking about. The enormous surplus crops that the farmer produces disproves the statement. It is his very energy, efficiency, and attention to his business that causes the surplus crops. If he were lazier and less efficient, he would produce no surplus, and, accordingly, get higher prices for his products.

I was reared on the farm. I know that in no occupation does a man work harder, longer, under a greater strain to his physical system, or under such trying conditions as does the farmer. He works in all kinds of weather and more hours than those engaged in any other occupation.

That the farmers' troubles are due to Federal legislation favoring all other classes, to whom the farmers must pay tribute, I now propose to show.

Mr. President, we have passed banking laws which provide for an adequate return to those engaged in the banking business and to all those who invest in public-service corporations and for all those who have money to lend. To these, by various Federal laws, we virtually guarantee a reasonable income.

Next, we have built up a protective tariff wall, the highest in history, for those engaged in industry. While this tariff was originally intended to bring revenue for the Government, that purpose is now but incidental. The real purpose of the tariff is to shut out competition with foreign-made goods and to enable those engaged in industry to impose a tax upon the consuming public. It has been estimated that the tariff enables industry to increase its income probably three billions of dollars annually. This tax which industry is permitted to levy upon the rest of the country is paid quite largely by the farmers. It might well be gradually eradicated.

Under the Esch-Cummins law and recent Supreme Court decisions the railroads and other public utilities have been guaranteed not only a fair, but a generous return upon their investments, and even sometimes where they have not made investments.

Under our income tax laws most corporations simply add their taxes to the cost of their productions and the public, which includes the farmers, pay these taxes.

Then through the creation of monopolies and by trade agreements often secretly made without regard to the Sherman antitrust law, industry virtually fixes its own prices and, of course, these prices are always made as high as traffic will bear; and the farmer has to bear his portion of this burden.

These special benefits and grants have all been made by Congress to the favored 70 per cent of our population and have made them very prosperous, while they have impoverished the farmers.

Indeed, not only does the farmer have no beneficial part in this legislation, but he has to pay substantially one-third of these benefits going to other favored classes.

In other words, under present conditions the farmer has to buy everything that he has to buy in a protected market, or in a stabilized market, or in a market in which prices are fixed by agreement, and sell everything he has to sell in the open markets of the world. He is caught coming and going. Speaking generally, he is the only producer in the world who has nothing whatsoever to do in fixing the price of the thing he produces. When any member of the favored classes has anything to sell the purchaser must pay his price. When the farmer has anything to sell he must take what is offered by the purchaser.

So, Mr. President, with all this favoritism to industry and to transportation and to capital and all this unfairness to agriculture, is it any wonder that to-day we find big business fairly rolling in wealth and paying enormous dividends and, on the other hand, we find the farmers in debt and impoverished, their rent and taxes tremendously high, their livestock and farming implements, their farms and their homes mortgaged, and in many cases being foreclosed and sold at public outcry?

When an industrial organization finds that its surplus will be too large it closes down a factory, and the result is that there is no surplus. The farmer can not do that. When he starts a crop growing nature alone can stop it, and, if there appears to be a surplus, it falls back on him and destroys him financially. Surely under these circumstances the Government ought to step in and prevent the surplus from controlling the price of the whole crop.

Some of my Democratic friends say that they are opposed to this bill because of the Jeffersonian doctrine of "Equal rights to all and special privileges to none." They say that if we were to pass this bill it would be a special privilege to the farmers and, therefore, contrary to that doctrine. They lose sight of the first part of the slogan, "Equal rights to all." It is apparent from what I have heretofore said that it does not violate that doctrine. In this bill we give no special privileges to the farmer. All we do is to put the farmer on the same economic basis with the other 70 per cent of our population. It is directly in accord with the teachings of Mr. Jefferson. All we do is to give him "equal rights." Not only that, but it is in direct accord with the express provision contained in the last Democratic platform.

To my Democratic friends I say that if there had never been any special privileges granted to other classes, then I admit that the Government ought not to give a special benefit to the farmers, but, inasmuch as the Government has already granted privileges to the 70 per cent, as above set out, I contend that it is in exact line with the Jeffersonian doctrine to grant the same equal rights to the farmers that we have already granted to the other 70 per cent, so as to put all classes of our people on an equality.

Again, some say that we ought to repeal the tariff laws, the transportation laws, the banking laws, and the immigration laws.

Mr. President, we all know that we are not going to do that. When we Democrats get into power, we do not repeal the tariff laws. We simply reduce them on certain articles and apparently there is no intention on the part of anyone to do away with the tariff laws. Nor is it likely that we will repeal the banking laws, or the immigration laws, or any other laws conferring favors upon the favored 70 per cent. Under these circumstances, what is our manifest duty?

Why, Mr. President, the only way that we can carry out the doctrine of Mr. Jefferson is to put the farmer on the same economic basis with the other 70 per cent of our population that are now deriving special benefits from the Government.

Again, it is objected that the bill will not work. Let me give you an illustration of how it will work.

Suppose the McNary-Haugen bill had been in effect in 1926 when the enormous cotton crop, amounting to nearly 20,000,000 bales, was produced. Suppose the commission dealing with cotton under that bill had, after an examination into every fact, found that the average cost of producing cotton that year was 12 cents a pound, that a reasonable profit to the farmer was 3 cents a pound, and that the commission, acting under the bill, had given notice that if cotton went below 15 cents the commission would buy the surplus crop and take it off the market to be sold when cotton went above that price.

Remembering our experience with wheat in 1920 when Congress fixed a minimum price of $1.50 a bushel, which was never reached, and when the Government did not have to buy any wheat, my judgment is that, if the commission had had to buy even 5,000,000 bales surplus last year, still there would have been no loss this year, because cotton went above 15 cents. So, in the cited case, instead of losing, there would have been a substantial gain for the farmers and the Government, and the farmers would have received a reasonable price for their cotton last year and would thus have avoided a bankrupt condition. It would have meant the difference between prosperity and the lack of prosperity in the cotton-producing business. We all know that there has never been a surplus of cotton carried over a period of three years in our history.

What could have been done for cotton could be done in the case of all staple agricultural products.

Again, it is objected that if the farmers are allowed to stabilize the price of their products, it will cause an increase production. This does not at all follow. The fear of an equalization tax will prevent any abnormal production; but even without this tax there need not be any fear.

The Government subsidizes the steel industry and there is not an overproduction of steel.

The Government through tariff laws and other laws subsidizes the shoe industry, but there is no overproduction of shoes. The copper industry, the iron industry, the public-utilities industry, and practically every industry are subsidized, and yet there is no overproduction. The price of transportation is absolutely fixed, and instead of there being more railroads the building of railroads has almost ceased.

Again, it is claimed that this bill involves price fixing. And so it does. But we have price fixing in every other industry, so why not permit the farmer to have something to do with fixing his prices?

Of course, no lawyer who ever read the Head Money Cases decided by our Supreme Court believes the bill is unconstitutional.

Mr. President, there is no question of greater importance in this country than the equitable distribution of wealth and income. It is so regarded by the foremost economists from Adam Smith on down. There can be no such thing as prosperity when wealth and income become centralized in one small group or groups of our population. It was claimed by the experts a few years ago that one-tenth of our population owned 90 per cent of the wealth. And this must be substantially true. It is not a good condition. It is a dangerous condition. When the wealth of Rome became centralized in a few landowners, with the rest of the nation serfs and slaves, without property and with scant incomes, Rome fell. When the king, nobility, and priesthood of France, comprising less than a million people, owned three-fifths of the entire land, leaving only two-fifths for the peasantry, comprising 25,000,000 people, we had the French Revolution. And the revolution in Russia was due to the same fundamental cause—the impoverishment of the masses. We must not permit our national wealth to be centralized to so great an extent. We must be fair and just to all classes of our people. If we confer rights upon one class, we must confer them equally upon all classes of our population. If we confer benefits upon one class of our people, we must confer them equally upon all classes of our population. It is the rankest kind of class legislation to confer untold benefits upon 70 per cent of our population and to deny equal benefits to the other 30 per cent, and especially when the other 30 per cent of our population are engaged in the most fundamental of all industries, namely, the production of food and clothing from the ground. We must not legislate in favor of one class at the expense of another.

Under the present conditions the farmer catches the rough end of the equation both ways. He is taxed enormously for the benefit of the other 70 per cent of our population. And when he sells his products he is often forced to sell at less than the cost of production, so that he can not make a living wage. The farmer, being the producer of those things which sustain life, should have the equal protection of the laws.

Mr. President, we want no serfs of any kind, nature, or description in this country. We want every man to be an upstanding citizen, entitled to equal rights and equal benefits under the law. This is what we seek for the farmers of this country. This is what this bill proposes to do. This bill may not be perfect. It may not give the farmer all to which he is entitled. It may not put him on equality with other industries. But it is a step in the right direction.

Agriculture is our basic industry. There are three things without which modern life can not exist—food, clothing, and shelter. Two of these—food and clothing—are produced by the farmer. That this is an important service, none can deny. That it is the most important, many will affirm. If the farmers should suddenly stop work and go on a strike, even for one short season, the wheels of industry would admittedly cease to turn, business of all kinds would stop, and famine, earth's greatest scourge, would stalk across the earth, casting its sinister shadows from coast to coast and carrying death and destruction in its wake, and humanity would perish. Such, my friends, is the great importance of the work done by farmers. Simple justice demands that those performing that work should not be put at a disadvantage by law.

As it is, they are very poorly compensated. The very least we can do is to place them on the same footing, so far as legislation can do it, with the other four economic groups. That is the purpose and object of this bill. I believe it will accomplish that purpose, and so believing, I shall vote for this bill again, as I have voted for it before, earnestly hoping that it will be enacted into law at this session of Congress.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him? I want to ask the Senator a question just at this point.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. BRUCE. Does the Senator attribute the adversity of the farmer at the present time entirely to the existence of the exportable surpluses of various crops?

Mr. McKELLAR. I believe that it has more to do with it than any other one factor.

Mr. BRUCE. What are the other causes entering into his adversity?

Mr. McKELLAR. I think that is the principal one.

Mr. BRUCE. Does the Senator think that is the only one?

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no. As I said, everything he buys he has to buy in a protected market and everything he sells he has to sell in the open markets of the world, and that, together with the surplus, constitutes the principal reasons for his present condition.

Mr. BRUCE. But the Republican Party has undertaken to protect him by imposing tariff duties on importations of agricultural products.

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course it has; but while it has tried to protect him by taking the tariff off of those things that he uses it has left the tariff on all those things which compose the things that he uses. I do not believe in a high tariff.

Mr. BRUCE. Yes; but he shares those other tariff burdens on his hat and his clothes, and the like, with the rest of us, does he not? We all pay the penalty in that kind of tariff burden.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; but he shares it to a greater extent than others.

Mr. BRUCE. But how? I thought there were certain exemptions made in the tariff in favor of the farmer.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, yes; there are—for instance, farm implements—but all of the things which compose the farm implements, with which they are manufactured, are taxed, and in that way the farmer has to bear the tariff burden just as before.

Mr. BRUCE. But those duties, of course, are also applicable to other members of the community.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no; they are not. They do not fall on 70 per cent of the people, because they do not use them.

Mr. BRUCE. But import duties do fall on other commodities which are used by the other elements of the community as well as the farmer. Conditions are equalized in that respect. May not these exportable surpluses be brought to an end in a perfectly natural way by economic influences which are at work at the present time?

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course not, for the reason that we have been trying it for seven years, and their condition, with the exception of a little spurt in their favor this year, has been constantly getting worse and worse. The Senator knows that the great majority of the farms of the country to-day are mortgaged, and many of them mortgaged for more than they are worth. The Senator knows that the great lending companies—the insurance companies and other companies in the country lending money on farms—have had to take in at forced sale many of those farms. What is the Senator's idea about what we are going to do when those farms are all bought in at public sale by the companies which have loaned money on them? How are we going to manage our farming business except through them?

Mr. BRUCE. I think the World War brought about a period of extraordinary inflation. The farmers, of course, naturally enough, were influenced by the enhanced prices for agricultural products which they obtained at that time to enlarge their operations, and even to buy more land than they could pay for; and on the strength of the same inflation a vast number of small-scale banks sprang up throughout the country which went to the wall, as might have been expected, as soon as the inevitable period of deflation set in. Then, again, many persons totally ignorant of farming went to farming and helped still further to swell the inflation, so now, as I see it, the farmer is simply suffering from the consequences that always accompany a period of deflation. But the situation is improving; the trend of prices is upward; large numbers of farmers are leaving the city and going to the country, and are there sharing those generous wages which the inhabitants of industrial cities have been receiving.

Mr. McKELLAR. Quite the contrary.

Mr. BRUCE. The situation is taking care of itself.

Mr. McKELLAR. The truth is that all of us know that constantly the farmers have received no benefits from the Federal Government while these other classes have constantly received benefits from the Government; the industrial classes through high tariff laws, the banking classes through law, the transportation companies through law, all for their benefit. That has given tremendous impetus to all other business and largely at the expense of the farmer. That is what is the matter with the farmer to-day. It is not because of his acts; it is not because of his default; it is not because of his shortcomings; but it is because of Federal legislation. The special benefits from the Government which are now being enjoyed by other classes should be passed to the farmers if they are to have a fair deal.

Even the Senator from Maryland himself admits that the farmers are not prosperous to-day; the whole country knows it is so. Why is it not the duty of the Congress of the United States under those circumstances to look into these matters and to equalize the rates?

AFFAIRS IN NICARAGUA

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, a few moments ago the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] delivered an attack on the administration and on the conduct of affairs in Nicaragua which it seems to me ought not to pass without a brief answer at this time because it was based on false assumptions and on an incorrect grasp of the situation.

At the present time in Nicaragua our relations with the Conservative Party and with the Liberal Party, the two great parties which have fought for a hundred years for the control of Nicaragua, are so friendly, the administration's conduct of our affairs there has been so ably carried on, and our presence there is welcomed by so many people of both parties that it seems to me most unfortunate that any remarks should be made on this floor showing such a total lack of appreciation of what is actually going on. Such remarks may lead to trouble and to a misunderstanding of our position by our neighbors in Latin America.

It was stated by the Senator from Alabama that he thinks our actions are leading to criticism and ill will in Latin America. Certainly his remarks are inclined to promote just that state of affairs. At some future time I should like to go more fully into what has happened between the United States and Nicaragua since Congress adjourned in March, 1927, but at the present time I only desire to state briefly just what is happening there to-day and to refer to the relations between General Sandino and the Liberal Party and the activities which have just taken place which have called forth this torrent of criticism and several very unfortunate resolutions embodying a number of extremely inaccurate "whereases." These resolutions have been referred to the Foreign Relations Committee and will undoubtedly there be carefully examined.

The rainy season in Nicaragua begins in June or July. During the next six months of the year it is almost impossible for anyone to carry on a military campaign. As Senators know, there are two distinct parts of Nicaragua, the Atlantic seaboard and the Pacific seaboard, and there is very little connection between the two.

On the Pacific seaboard there is a great plain where there is much agriculture, where there are several cities, and where the capital is located. On the eastern seaboard there are mountains and valleys covered with forests where there are no wagon roads and no railroads, but only trails which are barely passable to pack animals in the dry season and practically impassable in the wet season. The rains generally end some time in December, when the country begins to dry up and some of the people then usually go back to their favorite occupation of carrying on political manifestations with bullets instead of ballots. As a matter of fact, at the present time practically all of Nicaragua is in a state of peace with the exception of a small area in the northern part near the boundary of Honduras, in a coffee-growing section, which during a large part of the year is practically inaccessible.

Last April, at the request of the President, Mr. Henry L. Stimson, former Secretary of War and at the present time Governor General of the Philippines, went to Nicaragua to find out the exact state of affairs, to interview the leaders on both sides, and to see whether some working arrangement might not be brought about whereby we could secure that great desideratum of popular government, namely, a fair and open election. It is generally conceded that in the 100 years of Nicaragua's history there has scarcely ever been a fair election. It was extremely to be desired that at the next election every one who wished to do so should be given an opportunity to vote.

The people of Nicaragua are divided into two bitter political factions, the Conservatives and the Liberals. They do not differ very much in principle, as their names would seem to indicate. Those names apply rather to two geographical divisions. The people in one city being "conservative" and in another being "liberal." They have carried their animosity to such an extent that it is practically impossible, or, at any rate, extremely uncomfortable, and has been for many years, for any Conservative to attempt to do business in a Liberal city or for any Liberal to do business in a Conservative city. It reminds one of the situation in the Middle Ages when the independent cities of Italy were so divided by political parties and carried on such bitter warfare as to make it impossible for the members of one political party to live with the adherents of the opposite political party. It will be seen that Mr. Stimson faced an extremely difficult mission.

It is not necessary at this time to go into the history of how President Diaz became president or why we recognized him, instead of recognizing President Chamorro at one time, or various other people. Mr. Diaz was in power at the time of Mr. Stimson's visit in April. General Moncada, the ablest general in Nicaragua, a Liberal and the active fighting head of the Liberal Party, had a considerable number of troops and a good many generals under his command and was threatening the Conservative section of Nicaragua. After having interviewed many people on both sides of the question, Mr. Stimson succeeded in securing an interview with General Moncada himself, and explained to him the attitude of this Government, which was merely the attitude of friendliness, of a desire to have fair elections carried on, a desire held by both Liberals and Conservatives alike. After several interviews an arrangement was arrived at with Mr. Stimson whereby General Moncada and the generals under him, with the single exception of the young General Sandino, agreed to bring in their arms, to stop fighting, and to accept the good offices of the United States and the word of the United States that it would see to it that the next election to be held in 1928 would be a fair election and that every Nicaraguan could go to the polls and cast his ballot without fear or favor. The Liberals heartily agreed to this, because the Conservatives were in possession of the larger part of the country, and, according to the history of Nicaragua, it would have been impossible for the Liberals to have voted freely unless some such arrangement had been made. Consequently General Moncada persuaded all his generals, with one exception, to accept Mr. Stimson's service.

Then followed an extraordinary series of events. President Diaz, the Conservative, abolished the censorship of the press and permitted General Moncada to publish his statements in the press, a privilege which had been denied him for a long time. He also agreed that the supreme court, which had been altered in an illegal manner during the time when General Chamorro was President—and it will be remembered that we did not recognize General Chamorro as President—should be reconstituted, and, furthermore, by an extremely generous act, President Diaz agreed to accept Mr. Stimson's suggestion that the six or seven Provinces of Nicaragua where the Liberals live and which are Liberal in sentiment and by heredity should be governed by Liberals instead of having Conservative governors who could only rule by force of arms and would always be making trouble.

In the course of the next few weeks President Diaz carried out his promises. Six of General Moncada's Liberal generals were placed in charge of these six Liberal Provinces. Freedom of the press was declared; the supreme court was reorganized; every effort was made to give a fair deal to both sides; and as a matter of fact the great majority of the Liberal Party in Nicaragua to-day, instead of being dissatisfied, as the Senator from Alabama assumes, with the attitude of the United States Government and the present condition of things, welcomes it, and looks forward complacently and eagerly to the next election, when its members will have an opportunity to vote and have their votes counted just as much as the Conservatives.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McNARY in the chair). Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BINGHAM. I do.

Mr. NORRIS. If it be true, as the Senator has just stated, that the arrangement made with Mr. Stimson was satisfactory to Diaz and the Conservatives and to a very large majority of the Liberals, and that there are only a few left who are dissatisfied with the Government, why is it necessary for the Government of the United States to maintain its marines down there? If there are only a few people left on one side, and practically all the people are on the other side, why can they not maintain their own Government without our assistance?

Mr. BINGHAM. For the same reason that, although the great majority of people in the city of Washington desire to live in a peaceable and law-abiding manner, it is necessary to maintain several hundred police on the streets.

Mr. KING. But we do not import them.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; but, according to the Senator's own statement, the Diaz régime, combined with the Liberal régime, have all these policemen and have all the country except a little bit of a spot, and all the people are with them. They are in the great majority, and here are just a few insignificant fellows; and yet this big majority, with all the offices, with all the arms, with all the weapons, with all the territory, insist that the Government of the United States shall bring its marines down there to keep that big majority in office and keep it from being hurt by these few fellows who are out in the hills and do not have anything.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I think the Senator was not present when I attempted to review the bitterness between the two political parties. The Senator, coming from the State that he does, and having lived in a country that has for a hundred years accepted the decisions of the ballot box and whose political parties, though they have had certain bitter fights, have never entered into anything like the bitterness of those countries, is, if he will pardon me for saying so, unable to appreciate the bitterness of these factions and of the strife which would break out if we withdrew our marines.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him there again?

Mr. BINGHAM. I should like to finish my brief statement; I yield to the Senator, however.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator, it seems to me, is rather going back on his own statement. His statement is that after Stimson was there everything was lovely, and, as he said—I think using his own words—the great majority of the Liberals were satisfied.

Mr. BINGHAM. They were satisfied with our occupation, not with the Conservatives; and if we were to withdraw our marines they would immediately proceed to that civil war which has been the curse of Nicaragua for nearly a hundred years.

Mr. NORRIS. Then, it appears that there must have been perhaps a majority that was dissatisfied.

Mr. BINGHAM. Not with our occupation.

Mr. NORRIS. If the great majority was satisfied, I can not understand why it is necessary for us to send our marines down there to supervise an election and keep order. When practically the entire country is in control of the other two factions combined, when they are all agreeable and lovely and satisfied, why should we mix in?

Mr. BINGHAM. But they are not, Mr. President. They are not "lovely and agreeable and satisfied" with each other. They are satisfied with the attitude of our Government and have asked the United States to maintain its forces there in order that they may not cut each other's throats and in order that they may have a peaceable election.

Mr. NORRIS. Then we are in this condition—that the Conservatives, represented by Diaz, the government that we put in power, the government that we made——

Mr. BINGHAM. I hope the Senator will not make a speech in my time.

Mr. NORRIS. All right; I will try not to. It is a little difficult, when I have the example of the wonderful speech the Senator is making, not to try to follow his leadership; but when everything is in control now of Diaz and Moncada, who are both united in the same proposition——

Mr. BINGHAM. I did not say they were united.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, yes.

Mr. BINGHAM. No, Mr. President; the Senator misunderstood me. I said that they had both asked the United States to have its marines stay there to see that they had a fair election.

Mr. NORRIS. All right; let us put it that way. We have this condition of affairs, then: Diaz, representing the Conservatives; Moncada, representing the great majority of the Liberals, united that we shall stay there and supervise their election.

Mr. BINGHAM. That is what they have asked.

Mr. NORRIS. That is what they have asked. Let us take that as a foundation to start with——

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, this sounds to me very like the beginning of a new speech, and I desire to get through my remarks in a very few minutes.

Mr. NORRIS. No; it is not going to be a speech. I am going to ask a question. Just take the statement that the Senator has made. These two factions have united, and they say to us, "Now, we are all united. We want a fair election, but we want you to keep your Army down here to see that we get it." Why should we not say, "If you are all agreeable, and there is nobody but Sandino and a few bandits over here in the hills, it does not make any difference whether they vote or not; attend to your own elections, and let the marines go home?"

Mr. BINGHAM. Has the Senator concluded?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; that is my question.

Mr. BINGHAM. I am endeavoring to answer that by the speech which I am trying to make.

General Moncada, the leader of the Liberals, and the ablest general down there, who had been carrying on the war on behalf of Mr. Sacasa, who was on the Atlantic shore, was completely satisfied with the proposals made by Mr. Stimson, agreed to them, and endeavored to get all his generals to agree to them; and they all at one time did agree. General Moncada himself has made a statement in regard to the Sandino incident. There has been a great deal of misunderstanding with regard to this young bandit, who, in his early twenties, is enjoying the rôle of fighting up and down the little valleys in the north central part of Nicaragua, ravishing the coffee plantations, stealing the coffee of the planters, taking it across the boundary to sell it at low prices to the merchants of Honduras, and thereby getting money with which to carry on his depredations. He was once with General Moncada. Mr. Stimson, in a volume entitled "American Policy in Nicaragua," says:

> In contrast with the sensational statements of some of our own press, the following public statement issued by General Moncada after the affair at Ocotal fairly describes the Sandino incident:
> Existing on money from both natives and foreigners and merchants at Jinotega, as he had done before under threats of pillage and bloody reprisal, he—Sandino—interned in the mountains, took foreigners in the army and dedicated his time to murdering his enemies, both Conservatives and Liberals. He proved extremely cruel to prisoners, to whom life was never pardoned. I will not approve such a kind of war. I will never accept it. * * *
> In order to defend the cities of Jinotega, Esteli, and Ocotal, the American command sent marines and soldiers of the Nicaraguan National Guard. Eighty-seven men of these mixed forces existed at Ocotal when it was attacked by Sandino and an overwhelming force. Sandino threw himself against them with all his army. The defenders resisted heroically for 16 hours. * * *
> Sandino suffered great losses, exceeding 400 men. This, of course, has not been murder. There was an armed conflict in a legitimate defense. We Liberals are greatly sorry for the death of our brothers, but it is our duty to deny all contact with mercenaries, censuring such a war lacking in ideals. In Nicaragua the Liberals greatly desire peace and are confident of the word of the President of the United States given to us through his personal representative, Mr. Stimson. All the other Liberal chiefs except Sandino complied with their duty.

There, Mr. President, we have a statement from the active head of the Liberal Party, and one of the ablest liberals in Nicaragua, stating exactly the position of this bandit Sandino. Sandino has been elevated by a few misinformed people who are more desirous of making trouble for the United States than peace for Nicaragua, into being a great national hero struggling against the Conservative Party. As a matter of fact, Sandino is a bandit, an outlaw from his own party, who has been unfaithful to the word which he gave his leader, General Moncada. Because it is more profitably to do so, he has withdrawn into the fastnesses of northern Nicaragua and there attempted to carry out the usual work of banditry. It has been necessary for the Nicaraguan constabulary—a recently organized group of police, trained at the request of the Nicaraguans by the Marine Corps—to go into the mountains and attempt to stamp out this banditry and this nest from which trouble is coming. The larger part of the troops involved are the constabulary of Nicaragua, this newly organized body which we are attempting to train so as to guarantee a fair election at the polls. A few of them, their teachers, have been the marines.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. Assuming that all the Senator has said is absolutely within the facts—and I take it he knows something about the situation—what justification arises in the Senator's mind for our Government to go into the country of another government and interfere in its internal affairs in the way the Senator has pointed out? Is it the Senator's idea that it is one of the duties and powers of the American Government to send its troops all around the world to any nation that may happen to have internal dissensions and undertake to settle those dissensions in that other country?

I should like to have the Senator say what is his justification for our country going down and interfering in the internal affairs of Nicaragua.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, in answer to the Senator's question as to whether I should like to have the United States go into all parts of the world to maintain peace, my answer is "no." On the other hand, we have certain very definite interests in the Caribbean Sea, to wit, the Panama Canal. The Panama Canal is a vital feature of our national defense. We spent over $400,000,000 in digging the Panama Canal as a defense measure. We are deeply interested in maintaining that part of our national defense.

The countries near the Panama Canal have a peculiar interest to us in connection with our isthmian policy, or that part of the Monroe doctrine which we must maintain for our own safety and for our own defense. We can not permit European countries to go in and establish themselves in these Caribbean countries, which would threaten the Panama Canal and our connections there. When revolutions arise, when it becomes impossible to protect life and property, it is the custom of all nations to intervene by sending their marines—which is not an act of war, but is an act recognized under international law—to see to it that their nationals are protected.

This kind of operation has in the past sometimes led to permanent occupation, not by the United States but by other countries. I may say in passing that in regard to Nicaragua we have received complaints from three or four European countries stating that if we did not go down there they would have to go there themselves. To aid the Nicaraguans to peace becomes a part of our national defense, a part of our isthmian policy, a part of our maintenance of the Monroe doctrine. We must either "put up or shut up." We have either to get out and let the other countries go in and protect their nationals or we have to do it ourselves. It seems to me that is part of our duty, and so long as it is done as wisely and patiently as this administration has carried it out, as the last administration carried it out, as the administration before that, the Democratic administration, carried it out in various Caribbean countries, it seems to me it has been well done.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield there?

Mr. BINGHAM. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. I am very much interested in what the Senator has said about the protection of the Panama Canal, and I am reminded of something to which I want to call his attention, when he speaks about the necessity of our protecting that canal, and says that is the one reason why we should intercede in Nicaragua to supervise their elections. The Senator probably noticed in one of the morning papers, as I did, that some fellow down in Panama, right in sight of the Panama Canal, has written and implored the Secretary of State, Mr. Kellogg, to send marines to Panama to supervise the election that is going to take place there. Should we do that?

Mr. BINGHAM. That is a question for the President to decide.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course, it is a little embarrassing, probably, for the Senator to take a position on that until he knows what the administration is going to do about it. But if the Senator——

Mr. BINGHAM. That is a very sage remark, Mr. President, but whether he likes or not the Constitution of the United States gives to the President the duty of recognizing the countries which are to be recognized, and does not give that duty to the Senate.

Mr. NORRIS. But the Senator has taken a position justifying our action in Nicaragua, and given as a reason that we want to protect the Panama Canal. If we are going to supervise an election away up in Nicaragua in order to protect the Panama Canal, how much more reasonable is it that we should supervise an election right down there in the vicinity of the canal, and why should we not, if that is our policy, supervise the election, and what excuse can we give to the country and to the world for the answer of our Secretary of State, who has answered that request by stating that we decline to go into Panama to supervise their election?

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, the Senator probably is sufficiently familiar with the history of Panama to realize that there is no such bitter animosity between the parties in the Republic of Panama as there is in the Republic of Nicaragua.

Mr. NORRIS. Who is going to decide how much bitterness there must be between political parties before we intercede?

Mr. BINGHAM. Very fortunately, the Constitution does not say that that question must be decided by the Senate of the United States.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the President have that to decide? If he does, I want to call the attention of the Senator and, through him, of the President and the Secretary of State to the fact that there is some very bitter feeling in Ireland; that there is terrible strife in Ireland, and the excitement is extremely bitter. They fight over there, too. They have their shillalies all trained, and they are ready, and why should we not go to Ireland and supervise their election?

Mr. BINGHAM. I hope the Senator will tell us, before he gets through, how far Ireland is from the Panama Canal.

Mr. NORRIS. It is just a little bit farther than Nicaragua, and Nicaragua is a great deal farther than Panama. Are you going to stop at Panama? Why should we not protect the Panama Canal even in Ireland as well as in Nicaragua?

Mr. BINGHAM. I hope the Senator does not consider Ireland to be one of the Caribbean countries.

Mr. NORRIS. I have not said so.

Mr. BINGHAM. The Senator implied that.

Mr. NORRIS. No; I have not said so.

AGRICULTURAL RELIEF

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President, the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] is very wrong if he thinks that I am not in sympathy with the farmer. There is every reason why I should be in sympathy with him. To begin with, I am the son of a farmer, a man whose exclusive occupation was that of a farmer for some 50 years of his life, and I myself have been engaged to no limited extent in the business of farming. There is no one in this country who exceeds me in the measure of respect and admiration that I feel for the farmer in many respects.

I think that the farmer is the backbone of all that is best in our American life. Mr. Jefferson said years ago that he is the most virtuous and patriotic member of American society. I share that view. In my opinion, a greater misfortune could not possibly befall this country than for the position of the farmer to remain one of permanent and irremediable distress. There can be no lasting prosperity for anybody unless he is prosperous, and with my conservative nature, that does not lend itself readily to extremist or radical views of any sort, how could I have any but the strongest feeling of political fellowship in every respect with him? No matter what revolutionary shocks this country may be called upon to endure, I believe we shall always be able to survive them, and mainly because of the conservatism, the strength of character, and the sterling qualities of the American farmer.

However, it is not true that nothing has been done for the farmer. In point of fact, Congress is quicker to respond to his demands than to those of any other individual who is a part of our body politic. The best friend I could have in the world is some one who could tell me at this time just what really can be done by human agencies, by legislative authority, to improve the condition of the farmer.

I have read practically every leading publication that has issued from the press in relation to the farmer since I have been a Member of this body. I have been in correspondence with members of granges and farmers' associations. I have purchased supplies for my table from a farmers' cooperative marketing association. I am eager to the very last degree to have pointed out to me some practical means by which the present adverse condition of the farmer may be bettered.

As I have said, it is not true that nothing has been done by Congress for the farmer. Much has been done since I have been here. Has the Senator from Tennessee forgotten that only a year or so ago, through the operation of the Hoch-Smith Act, we placed the Interstate Commerce Commission in a position deliberately to discriminate as regards railroad rates in favor of the farmer?

Mr. WHEELER. They have not done it, though.

Mr. BRUCE. They should do it.

Mr. McKELLAR. But they have not.

Mr. BRUCE. They have not?

Mr. McKELLAR. No.

Mr. BRUCE. Then go to the White House and ask the President, the next time he makes an appointment to the Interstate Commerce Commission, to appoint some one who will help to carry out the letter and the spirit of that law.

Mr. McKELLAR. But the President has already expressed his views about it.

Mr. BRUCE. Then change your President.

Mr. WHEELER. Some of us would like to do that.

Mr. BRUCE. As a Democrat I hope we shall, though I say this with great respect to the present incumbent, for whom I have a high degree of regard in not a few particulars.

Mr. WHEELER. I would like to call the Senator's attention to the fact that wheat in Canada was bringing approximately 21 cents more just across the American border than it was in the United States, at a point just a few miles away, and that was notwithstanding the fact that we had a tariff of something like 30 cents.

Mr. BRUCE. Forty cents.

Mr. McKELLAR. Forty-two cents.

Mr. BRUCE. Forty-two cents, to be exact.

Mr. WHEELER. The increase was partly due to the fact that the Canadian railroads give a cheaper rate to the wheat farmers of Canada than to the American farmers.

Mr. BRUCE. Yes.

Mr. WHEELER. I cite that to the Senator for the purpose of showing him——

Mr. BRUCE. I am glad to have that called to my attention. That is but an administrative shortcoming which ought to be readily corrigible.

Mr. WHEELER. It ought to be.

Mr. BRUCE. It ought to be.

Mr. WHEELER. But just as long as the present administration is in power, it never will be.

Mr. BRUCE. That may be. All I have to say is that I never in my life united more cheerfully in the passage of any legislation than I did in the passage of the Hoch-Smith measure. I said to myself "Here at last is something workable. Here at last is something that will really benefit the farmer without doing injury to the rest of the community." I cast my vote for that measure. Mind you, at the same time I was conscious of the fact that, after all, the adversity of the farmer was by no means referable exclusively to high transportation rates, because only a short time before, notwithstanding all that had been said in Congress about the bearing of oppressive railroad rates on the farmer, Mr. Daniel Willard, the president of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, had gone on the stand before the Senate Interstate Commerce Committee and testified that if all the net profits that the railroads of his country had derived from the transportation of agricultural produce the year before were divided up between the wheat and corn growers alone of this country the division would signify an increase of only 4 cents a bushel to them.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield——

Mr. BRUCE. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. The figures that were given to me in Montana by some of the millmen who understand the situation show that the differential amounts to 10 cents on wheat as between the American farmer and Canadian farmer due to railroad rates.

Mr. BRUCE. If that is correct, I will gladly at any time go with the Senator from Montana to the Interstate Commerce Commission and ask them to redress, through the agency of the Hoch-Smith law, any inequality that exists between the situation of the farmer in this country and that of the Canadian farmer, if it can be redressed.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. BRUCE. Certainly.

Mr. COPELAND. I happen to have the figures before me, as I have had occasion to look them up. The cost of carrying wheat from Saskatchewan to the lakehead is 26 cents a bushel. The cost of carrying it from Montana to the lakehead is 44 cents.

Mr. BRUCE. I suppose one reason is that the Canadian railways, or some of them, are run by the Canadian Government, which to a certain degree conducts them without regard to pecuniary deficits. In other words, Government railways in Canada probably carry the wheat of the Canadian farmer at a loss—that is my surmise about it—and they do that deliberately as a matter of sound public policy.

Mr. WHEELER. The Senator can readily understand that the American farmers living in the Northwest can not possibly compete with the Canadian farmers when that situation exists.

Mr. BRUCE. That is true. I am with the Senator from Montana; I am with the farmer, as I always am when any sound appeal is made on this floor to my support. I have given a striking illustration of what, through the Hoch-Smith measure, Congress is disposed to do for the farmer.

What else has it done since I have been here? Was it not only last year that with my approval Congress appropriated the sum of $10,000,000 to arrest the progress of the corn borer? Was it not only last year that Congress with my approval took the very extreme step—I think any Member of the Senate will say it was an extreme step—of appropriating a large sum of money for the purpose of supplying the farmers in the drought-stricken areas of the Northwest with seed? That was a measure that almost trenched upon the province of purely socialistic legislation; yet Congress was prepared to enact it.

Mr. WHEELER. We did the same thing with the railroads. After the war we deliberately took out of the Treasury of the United States and gave to the railroads large sums of money.

Mr. BRUCE. But we did not do that out of love for the railroads.

Mr. WHEELER. I am not so sure about that.

Mr. BRUCE. We did it out of considerations affecting the welfare of the public generally, including the farmer.

Mr. WHEELER. I do not agree with the Senator at all that we did it for the benefit of the farmer. I do not agree that we took any money out of the Treasury of the United States and gave it to the railroads for the benefit of the farmers, for the fact remains that it never did the farmer one single bit of good. The railroads have never reduced rates to the farmer in the slightest degree since that time.

Mr. BRUCE. The Senator knows that through the splendid management of our railroad systems, in spite of the harm done to them by Government administration during the World War, railroad rates have been inflated to a less degree than almost anything else in the whole economic field in this country. When general costs of living had gone up some 75 per cent, railroad rates had gone up only some 52 per cent. There could not be a finer illustration of the high degree of economy and efficiency with which the railroads of this country are operated.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRUCE. Certainly.

Mr. KING. I think the statement of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] needs a little modification. I remember that the Esch-Cummins bill had provisions which did not meet my approval, and consequently I voted against it. I believed, however, that the Government should make a just settlement with the railroad companies. From what I heard I believed that the payments made to some companies were improvident. During the period the railroads were in the possession of the United States, after being taken over during the war, they suffered some damage and deterioration. Perhaps that is not true of all the railroads. It was proper that the Government should reimburse the railroads for any damages which had been occasioned to them by the Government. We took private property during the war, but compensated the owners for the losses which they sustained.

When we took over the railroad properties the same obligation rested upon the Government to compensate the owners for any injuries or damages to the same. I repeat, that by the operation of the railroads by the Government during the war and for some period thereafter, undoubtedly there was physical injury to some properties, and what we sought to do was to compensate the railroads for the damages which the carriers had sustained by the action of the Government.

Senators will also remember that the financial requirements of the Government were such that it embargoed the money market, so that railroad companies were unable to borrow money required to keep their railroad systems in proper shape. That was an injury to the railroad companies. It was inevitable of course by reason of the war; but all that we sought to do by congressional legislation was to put the railroads as nearly as we could in the same condition they would have been in except for the intervention of the Government. It was not the purpose of Congress to give to the railroads a single dollar, but only to make them whole for any losses sustained by reason of the action of the Government in taking over the railroads. If the settlement was improvident and the railroad companies received greater consideration than was due them, I think it was a mistake in judgment of those intrusted with the responsibility of making the settlements. I never understood that the Government intended that the railroads should receive any gratuity.

Mr. BRUCE. I thank the Senator most cordially for his timely and apposite interruption.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me again just a moment——

Mr. BRUCE. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WHEELER. I would say that I agree with the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] to this extent, that the railroads ought to have been paid for any damage done to them; but I submit that any fair-minded man who made a survey of the situation would have found that the Director General left many of the railroads in much better shape than they were in when they were taken over. I think the Congress of the United States took decidedly hasty action when it appropriated money to the railroads for some claims they made.

Mr. BRUCE. I think, as far as the region in which I live is concerned, that what the Senator said is certainly not correct. During the World War I happened to live on the Northern Central Railroad, which down to the time the Government took it over was one of the most splendidly managed properties in the country. The disorganization and demoralization which resulted from Government operation of that road was too lamentable for words. Finally it reached such a point that at times I saw what I had never before seen in the course of the 25 or 30 years that I had lived on it. I would see a train approach my station and be so inefficiently handled that when it stopped the last car in the train would be two or three hundred feet beyond the station platform.

Mr. WHEELER. I do not know anything about the particular station at which the Senator lived.

Mr. BRUCE. I can not go further into that matter because it is a purely collateral one.

But after all, as the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] might have added, the real object of the Government in making those railroad appropriations was that of an ordinary tenant who before he leaves rented premises puts them in the original condition of repair in which they were when he took possession. The Government had the sense to know that until that great machine was refashioned, until the transportation service of the country was in as good a plight as it was when the Government took it over, all our material and economic interests of every kind, including our agricultural interests, would necessarily suffer, and therefore we spent that money.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me again at that point?

Mr. BRUCE. Certainly.

Mr. WHEELER. That is the point I am making exactly. The United States Government went out during the war and urged every farmer in the United States to borrow more money to plant more wheat and to plant more wheat, until he went into debt clear over his head. Immediately afterwards the deflation came and the Federal reserve bank insisted that those loans be called. The result was that the farmers were deflated all over the country and went broke. The Government of the United States never came to their rescue, and said to them, "We are going to put you in the same position you were in before the war." They never have been put in that same position since the war, although the Government of the United States tried to put every other business in the country in the same position it was in previous to the war, except the farmer, and he has not been put there yet. The Congress of the United States has let him go on and go broke and suffer.

Mr. BRUCE. The inflation was so tremendous as regards land operations and land values throughout the country that the economic consequences could not possibly be taken care of by any ordinary administrative or legislative agency.

Mr. WHEELER. I will admit that it is a difficult thing, but the complaint the farmer makes is that the Government did that for the silver mines and the manganese mines and the railroads and innumerable other kinds of industry, but the poor devil of a farmer out on the farm has suffered because of the fact that he did not have the influence down at Washington that others seemed to have.

Mr. BRUCE. The silver mines have always gotten more out of the country than they have put back into it.

Mr. WHEELER. I do not agree with the Senator about that, of course.

Mr. BRUCE. Especially when the Senator from Montana was addressing himself to the task of inducing Congress to adopt the ratio of 16 to 1 as respects silver and gold, which, too, at one time was supposed to be a panacea for all the misfortunes of the farmer.

Mr. WHEELER. I think that was one time when the Senator from Maryland bolted the Democratic ticket.

Mr. BRUCE. That is the only time in my life when I did.

Mr. WHEELER. I did once; so we are even.

Mr. BRUCE. The thing in my political life of which I am proudest is that I refused to support Mr. Bryan when he was first a candidate for the Presidency of the United States, though I voted for every other Democratic candidate in my time from Winfield S. Hancock down, and even voted for Mr. Bryan twice after he abondaned his free-silver platform.

Then another thing the Senator should recollect is that even before I happened to be a Member of this body Congress was so liberal as to place the farmer entirely outside of the scope of the Sherman antitrust law. So in many respects—I might multiply my illustrations still more—Congress has been astute to put the farmer on a favored footing.

Mr. WHEELER. The Senator does not think for one moment that the farmers of the country have ever been well enough organized to violate the Sherman antitrust law, does he?

Mr. BRUCE. The farmer has less disposition to violate the law than any other member of the American body politic. That is because, as Jefferson truly said, he is the most virtuous and patriotic individual in our country.

Among the complaints of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] is the complaint that the farmer pays such high taxes. That complaint is not applicable to the Federal income tax, because the farmer pays relatively only a small part of that tax. The Senator must have had in mind local taxes. Within whose political control, may I ask him, are such taxes in farming regions? Why, mainly, of course, the farmer. If taxes are higher than they should be in counties and other municipal subdivisions of rural communities, then the farmer should gird up his loins and bring them down, because he is in a better position, politically speaking, to do it than any other American citizen.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BRUCE. Certainly.

Mr. COPELAND. I am sure the Senator has in mind the fact that the farmer to-day pays probably twice or three times as much as before for everything he buys in the way of implements and everything he buys in the way of supplies, and he does pay, as has been stated here, probably three times as much in taxes, but he does not earn any more to-day than he ever did. The Senator is well aware of that.

Mr. BRUCE. His gross income is larger, but his net income is not.

Mr. COPELAND. No; his gross income is no larger. The price he gets to-day for his products is low, and his land is not capable of raising as much in the way of crops as it did 25 years ago.

Mr. BRUCE. If that is so, it is largely due to agricultural depletion, and after all the farmer must bear the brunt of responsibility for that.

But so far as the tariff is concerned the Senator is mistaken. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] will correct me if I am in error, but my impression is that under the present law there is no import duty on agricultural implements imported into this country.

Mr. COPELAND. I am well aware of that; but, nevertheless, because of the increased cost of manufacturing those implements, the cost to the farmer to-day is two or three times as much as it was 20 years ago; not because of the tariff in that instance.

Mr. BRUCE. But agricultural implements can be brought into this country free. There is no import duty, as I understand it, on agricultural implements.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

Mr. BRUCE. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. WATSON. Of course, if we had free trade these agricultural implements would still be free, and there is nothing freer than free, and they are free now.

Mr. BRUCE. As the colored people used to suggest, there is such a thing as being "free until you are fool."

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. There are a great many commodities that are consumed that are highly taxed.

Mr. BRUCE. So far as general Government import taxes are concerned, the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] is aware that all of us share those with the farmer. The farmer does not pay any more taxes on his boots or his shoes or his hat or any of the commodities that he uses along with myself than do I or does the Senator from New York.

Mr. COPELAND. If the Senator will yield to me for a moment, without arguing now as to why it is so that these prices are high, the fact remains that we have an economic situation where the farmer must pay two or three times as much for everything he buys to-day as he did 20 years ago; and has, if anything, less income to-day than he then had.

Mr. BRUCE. The farmer has more gross income at the present time and less net income, because agricultural products are, of course, bringing higher prices absolutely than they have done for some time past.

Mr. COPELAND. They are not very much higher, I think.

Mr. BRUCE. But as to his net income, the profit made by him is not equal to that of the other members of the American community, because he can not make up on what he sells what he loses on what he buys. That is undoubtedly true, and it is in that that his hardship consists. Now, how is that hardship to be corrected? For God's sake, will not some Member of the Senate tell me how?

Mr. FRAZIER. By the passage of the McNary-Haugen bill.

Mr. BRUCE. The Senator from North Dakota says by the enactment of the McNary-Haugen bill, and he believes that to be so. He may be right and I may be wrong, but I can not see that at all.

In the first place, the Senator from Tennessee is mistaken when he brushes aside the constitutional objections to the McNary-Haugen bill in the cavalier way that he does, because the fact will be recalled that some four or five—I will not undertake to enumerate them all—of the very ablest lawyers in this body—the former Senator from Wisconsin, Mr. Lenroot, who is certainly a very able lawyer; the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], who certainly answers that description, and the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], who certainly answers that description, and others, all expressed the opinion when the McNary-Haugen bill was under discussion here at the last session of Congress that it was an unconstitutional measure; because the equalization fee provided for it was an unconstitutional, nugatory, and void thing. I—following, of course, at a long interval—do not hesitate for a moment to say that that is my opinion also as a lawyer.

Mr. WHEELER. But all of them voted for the child labor amendment, which was declared unconstitutional, too, did they not?

Mr. BRUCE. I did not do so.

Mr. WHEELER. But I say that all the gentlemen whom you have mentioned did so.

Mr. BRUCE. I feel that my democracy, to say nothing more, would have to carry an indelible reproach to the end of its existence if I had voted for the child labor amendment to the Federal Constitution. Nothing could possible be plainer to my obscure vision than the fact that any law that attempts, as the McNary-Haugen bill does, to say to the farmer, willing or unwilling, "You shall pay an equalization fee out of every bushel of wheat or out of every bushel of corn or out of every unit of any sort that you sell" is unconstitutional and void. How could there be any difference of opinion on that point? Has the Federal Government, has any State government the power to say to me, assuming that I am a trader or a farmer, "When you sell something you must make a contribution to an equalization fund for the general benefit of your calling, whether you desire to do so or not"? That would be the very essence of arbitrary, tyrannical legislation, and it would violate every constitutional principle upon which the rights of the American citizen are founded. It would plainly be a taking of property without due process of law; it would plainly be an unconstitutional infringement on the private right of contract.

Mr. WHEELER. Congress took the saloon property, did it not, and took the breweries?

Mr. BRUCE. Yes; and it was always held that the granting of the saloon privilege was a mere license; it was always held by the courts that it was revocable at any time.

Mr. WHEELER. But the Government has taken property in many other ways.

Mr. BRUCE. I am glad it did take the saloon license away, antiprohibitionist as I am; but, of course, the Senator knows that what I have stated has been held over and over again by the courts.

Mr. WATSON. Does the Senator believe there is any legislative way by which the farmer may be helped?

Mr. BRUCE. That is what I was coming to. My constitutional objections to the McNary-Haugen bill as a lawyer are absolutely insuperable, and, then, I do not believe that it would produce the practical consequences which its sponsors think it would produce. I think, first of all, that it would give a tremendous stimulus—assuming that the equalization fee plan worked—to agricultural production. In other words, the act would result in very much the same kind of agricultural inflation that followed the economic consequences of the World War; and our last estate would be worse than our first.

Even if that could be overlooked, one of the very first consequences of the act, if it were workable, would be to make conditions of living to every man in the United States that much harder. Every one of us eats bread, for instance. Of course, the economic effect of the McNary-Haugen bill, if it proved workable, would be to make a loaf of bread dearer to every inhabitant of the United States than it was before.

Mr. WHEELER. If the Senator from Maryland will yield——

Mr. BRUCE. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. Of course, the policy that the Senator from Maryland outlined awhile ago, that is, that the farmers should leave the farms and go to the industrial centers, would again raise the price of foodstuffs to the consumer.

Mr. BRUCE. I will come to that. That is a most timely suggestion, because I do not want to preach a gospel of despair, least of all in connection with the farmer.

Is there any sort of legislation that will answer the purposes? Well, I think an out and out subsidy would grant temporary relief. Of course, I am afraid that like every artificial stimulus the stimulus of the subsidy would lead to the headache and other bad consequences of "the next morning." For instance, I considered very carefully the debenture plan suggested by the grange which, of course, is a splendid association of farmers. That provides for nothing less than a subsidy; that is to say, for the receipt by the export farmer of a certain percentage of import duties collected by the Government. That is unquestionably a subsidy pure and simple. And so as to every other suggestion that has been made here. They are in the nature, it seems to me, of mere subventions, mere subsidies, mere artificial governmental aids of one sort or other. So I can not see—I wish I could see—anything to fall back upon at all at the present time apart from some conservative forms of governmental assistance, except the working of natural economic laws; which laws are in operation. As I have said, there is the drift from the country to the city—but there is nothing so terrible about that, for the drift will be back to the country as soon as conditions there improve.

Mr. WHEELER. But the drift to the city will raise the price of wheat, the price of bread, which is the thing we are all talking about, and, of course——

Mr. BRUCE. I do not object to the price of bread being enhanced if it is enhanced through natural agencies and in a perfectly normal, natural, and legitimate manner.

Mr. WHEELER. But the claim is made against the McNary-Haugen bill by those who are opposing it that it is immediately going to raise the prices of all foodstuffs to the people. I wish to point out, however, that if the farmer does not get better prices and is to be compelled to leave the farm and to go into the industrial centers looking for work the effect will not only be to raise the price of foodstuffs but likewise to increase the bread lines which now exist in the city of Chicago.

Mr. BRUCE. The increase in the price of foodstuffs would keep pace with the increase in wages which the inhabitants of cities enjoy, and the people who moved from the farm to the city if they received the higher city wages would be in just that much better position to pay the farmer that they left behind good prices for his breadstuffs.

Mr. WHEELER. But the industries of the country to-day in many places are overcrowded, and there are bread lines in Chicago at the present time.

Mr. BRUCE. I do not know that the industries are overcrowded; and certainly we have no bread lines in the section of the country where I live.

Mr. WHEELER. I say there are bread lines in Chicago, and if the Senator does not think there are bread lines any place else let him go to New England.

Mr. BRUCE. Of course, there is going to be some unemployment; there is going to be some abatement in the extraordinary degree of industrial prosperity which we have enjoyed. Why is it? It is because the manufacturing industry of the country has caught up with the slack of the World War; that is all. When the World War came a vast amount of domestic constructive work had to fall into abeyance and had to be caught up by intensified industrial activity; but now industrial activity has caught it up and we have returned to normal conditions.

Mr. WHEELER. The present industrial condition is due also to the high tariff wall which we have built up around the Nation and which has restricted our world market.

Mr. BRUCE. At the same time that tariff wall is not so high that the volume of our import collections has not increased enormously. Inordinate as it may be pronounced by some of us to be, somehow the tariff has at least worked remarkably well in producing revenue for the country.

Mr. WHEELER. I think if the Senator will analyze the sources from which it is raised and how it is raised he may reach quite a different conclusion.

Mr. BRUCE. The Senator is not more opposed than I am to inordinately high tariff duties. I wish the whole subject might be placed in the hands of some tariff commission, clothed with such a measure of dignity and occupying such a position of aloofness as to discharge some of the same useful functions that are discharged by the Interstate Commerce Commission; but the Senator from Montana, I know, would not like that standard of comparison at all.

So, Mr. President, I do not see anything to do except to wait.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

Mr. BRUCE. Just a moment and then I will yield to the Senator. Natural causes are at work correcting the agricultural situation. On the whole the trend of agricultural prices has been upward now for some years back; on the whole the farmer is getting more and more for his products, and, of course, that tendency is going to be stimulated all the time by this very influx of farmers from the country to the city which has been deprecated in some quarters, although I think unwisely deprecated. The whole theory of the sponsors of the McNary-Haugen bill is based on the idea that the present agricultural adversity is due to exportable surpluses; that is all; no other theory underlies that bill. What difference can it make to the farmer whether these exportable surpluses are terminated by natural economic causes or by artificial legislation?

Mr. WHEELER. I do not agree entirely with the Senator's premise. I think it is for the purpose of curing the evil, not by trying to industrialize this Nation, but by trying to keep the farmers upon the farm and to give them a living wage; because I submit it is not only an economic problem but it is a moral problem as well which this country has got to face if we drive our farmers all into the industrial classes.

Mr. BRUCE. We can not drive them all into them; we will drive just enough to bring about an enhancement of the prices that the farmer receives for his products, which is the very object Senators have in view.

Mr. WHEELER. We will drive them to the cities and make industrialists out of them, and it is a difficult thing now to keep the farmers upon the farm, even when they are making money.

Mr. BRUCE. The Senator knows that the greater our cities are and the more numerous their populations are the wider is the market for the farmer.

Mr. COPELAND. It works the other way also. Let me suggest another phase. If the farmer can not buy in the industrial sections, we are going to have trouble. The Senator and I come from great cities where there are great manufacturing plants, but, as we do not consume the things made there, there can be no prosperity in our cities unless there is prosperity on the farm. I wonder if the Senator is aware of the fact that, taking manufactured steel, for instance, over half of the steel manufactured in the United States is used on the farm. It is amazing that over half of the steel manufactured in the United States goes into fence wire, plowshares, hammers, chains, and other things that are used on the farm.

Mr. BRUCE. And more than 30 per cent of the population of the country is on the farm.

Mr. COPELAND. More than half of the steel produced in the United States is used on the farm, and unless the farmer has buying power in the city we are going to have distress.

Now, if the Senator will yield further——

Mr. BRUCE. Certainly.

Mr. COPELAND. I am advised by wise farmers that the actual cost of producing wheat to-day is $1.75 a bushel, and yet they can not get more than $1.25 for it. The other 50 cents is the labor put in by the farmer and his family without any return. I am not here to have any dispute with the Senator as to the remedy, but we must face the situation. Here is a disease. Here is this great farm industry going into bankruptcy. There must be found a way to cure it; and if no other way can be found, apparently the only measure before us that has in it any possible hope of relief is this particular measure.

Mr. BRUCE. I do not see any hope of relief in it at all. Every branch of human industry at times has to pass through a process of liquidation. When it is the steel industry, or some other great manufacturing industry, we do not think so much about it. It does not affect so many people, to begin with; but the industry passes through a period of liquidation, and that is followed by a period of reorganization and revival, and the industry starts off again on a new career of usefulness and success. I think that before very long, if we will just cease trying to apply artificial remedies to the agricultural situation, it will take care of itself. There will be some more hardship, even some more distress perhaps, but ultimately the situation will be permanently taken care of; whereas, assuming that the McNary-Haugen bill is workable, I can not see that any lasting results are likely to flow from the purely fictitious kind of relief for which it provides.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, it seems to me that if we can not give protection to all we can not give protection to any. What I mean to say is, we have a tariff law protecting the manufacturer. We are contributing to him.

Mr. BRUCE. Yes; but we have endeavored to protect the farmer by the tariff. Some Members of the Senate seem to forget that we have a tariff on wheat. Have we not imposed a tariff on wheat, and have we not imposed a tariff on corn, and have we not imposed a tariff on potatoes?

Mr. KING. And on wool and on sheep.

Mr. BRUCE. Yes; certain kinds of wool. Indeed we have. Tariff legislation has done all that tariff legislation possibly could do for the farmer.

Mr. COPELAND. If the Senator will permit me, we know that the tariff on wheat has not been effective.

Mr. BRUCE. That is not the fault of Congress.

Mr. COPELAND. But let us go back to the general proposition of the tariff. By reason of it everything that the farmer buys is increased in price. He is contributing to the manufacturer by reason of this enhanced price.

Mr. BRUCE. No more than I am or the Senator from New York is.

Mr. COPELAND. No; that is true; but, nevertheless, he is doing it. As a result of the existence of labor unions—and I am in favor of them—the price of labor has been fixed. The law of supply and demand does not operate. It is fixed.

Mr. BRUCE. Not altogether. You can not say that altogether.

Mr. COPELAND. The result is that the farmer's boy goes to the city, and when the farmer wants to hire a man he has to compete with high-priced labor. So the farmer is the victim of the labor union in fixing the price he has to pay for labor, the victim of the tariff system, the victim of the high freight rates; and if he is to contribute to these matters which have become fixed by reason of legislative action, is it not fair, if we can find some way of doing it, to give him the benefit of the same kind of legislative action?

Mr. BRUCE. Yes; but the difference is this: The farmer at the present time is the victim of natural economic causes to which the other elements of American society are not subject. That is what it comes to. In other words, when he goes out to sell his product he has to compete with the whole world. The wheat grower in Montana, for instance, has to compete with the Canadian wheat grower, and with the wheat grower in Hungary and in India and in Russia and in Argentine; in fact with the whole world; and, of course, while Congress is a pretty ambitious body, I take it for granted that it is not ambitious enough to endeavor to correct world-wide conditions which are beyond its power.

That is not true of anybody but the farmer. That is his crowning misfortune. Now, how are you going to make that good to him?

Mr. COPELAND. I do not know that I know how to make it good to him. I am not sure that this bill would, but it is the only remedy that is offered; and it seems to me—and I say this in all kindliness—that if the Senator has no remedy to offer he can not find fault with some of us if we take this one.

Mr. BRUCE. If the Senator will pardon me, it seems to me he puts himself in the position of a friend of mine a few years ago who came to me one day and said, "I am in trouble." I said, "What is your trouble?" He was a young man whom I had known for a great many years, a friend of mine, a man of standing. I said, "What is your trouble?" He scratched his head helplessly and said, "Why, I gave a friend of mine a check on a bank where I did not have any funds." I said, "What in the name of heaven did you do that for?" He said, "Because I had to give him something."

That is what the Senator proposes to give to the farmer. He says, "Take the McNary-Haugen bill, because nothing else is in sight." That is not a suggestive reason to my legislative conscience and intellect.

I have, however, said far more than I intended to say on this subject.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. JONES. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. HEFLIN. Will the Senator withhold that motion for a moment?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. HEFLIN. I want to move that the Senate vacate the order which was entered this morning to adjourn until Monday so that it can meet to-morrow at 12 o'clock for the purpose of discussing the Nicaraguan situation.

We can use that time to good advantage and accomplish something by remaining here to-morrow and Saturday and discussing this very important question. It is a question of great moment to the American people, and I believe that if Senators generally had known this morning that this adjournment course was contemplated this action would not have been taken. I was called out of the Chamber for a moment by some Alabama friends. If the request for adjournment had been made in my presence, I would have objected.

I want to move, therefore, that the Senate vacate that order and that we meet to-morrow at 12 o'clock for the purpose of discussing and making known to the country the facts about the Nicaraguan situation.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I make the point of order that the unanimous-consent agreement can not be vacated by a motion.

Mr. HEFLIN. Then I ask unanimous consent that it be vacated.

Mr. WILLIS. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

Mr. JONES. I renew my motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 43 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned, the adjournment being, under the order previously entered, until Monday, January 9, 1928, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, January 5, 1928

The House met at 12 o'clock noon and was called to order by the Speaker.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

All our times are in Thine hands, O God, and gratitude fills our hearts to-day! Give us the light of Thy truth; invigorate our understanding that we may have right discernment in the solution of all problems. Ours is a moral duty which no one can ignore and no individual can evade. May we stand forth on the golden roll of those of every age who have wrought righteousness, tamed wickedness, and contributed to the ethical assets of their day. In the volume of life's experience may we be inspired by the lessons of courage, of faith in God, of confidence in our institutions, and devotion to the principles of education and liberty. Through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment an act (H. R. 6657) to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Columbia River near Kettle Falls, Wash.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with an amendment an act (H. R. 483) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to acquire certain lands within the District of Columbia to be used as sites for public buildings, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with an amendment the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 82) to continue commissioners in the Court of Claims, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills and joint resolution of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

S. 1398. An act relating to pardons;

S. 1661. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to transfer the Okanogan project, in the State of Washington, to the Okanogan irrigation district upon payment of charges stated; and

S. J. Res. 47. Joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States fixing the commencement of the terms of President and Vice President and Members of Congress and fixing the time of the assembling of Congress.

SWEARING IN A MEMBER

Mr. SPROUL of Kansas appeared before the Speaker's rostrum and took the oath of office.

ACQUISITION OF LAND IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 483) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to acquire certain land within the District of Columbia, to be used as sites for public buildings, with a Senate amendment, and concur in the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 483, with a Senate amendment, and concur in the Senate amendment. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 483) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to acquire certain land within the District of Columbia, to be used as sites for public buildings.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate amendment.

The Senate amendment was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. SNELL. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I think we should have some explanation of this proposition. I reserve the right to object for the present.

Mr. ELLIOTT. The amendment gives authority, when the title to this property down on the triangle is vested in the United States, for the demolition of the buildings on this property, and authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury, with the consent of the Public Buildings Commission, to take such portion of the triangle as is not needed immediately for public buildings and plant trees in the area thus provided for, so that it may be cleaned up and made ready for the public buildings that are to be erected thereon.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. ELLIOTT. With pleasure.

Mr. LANHAM. I would like to say to the gentleman who has reserved his objection that it seems to me that this is not only a proper but a necessary amendment. There is a comprehensive scheme for the building of the structures contemplated in this triangle property. Some of the spaces are to be open and park spaces to provide for the proper approaches to the buildings. In order for some of those buildings in contemplation to be constructed it will be necessary to tear down some of these little buildings which will be purchased and where the ground is to be occupied by the new buildings.

Mr. SNELL. How much territory is included in this purchase?

Mr. LANHAM. This is to give that authority within the triangle which is being purchased for the Government buildings. All of this is subject to the approval of the Public Buildings Commission, which must look necessarily during the construction of these new buildings to temporary quarters for Government employees in the various branches of the public service. Consequently, the Public Buildings Commission would not attempt to raze any of the buildings which were necessary for the housing of Government employees during the time of the construction of the new buildings, and without the authority of this amendment we would have to be coming back for additional legislative authority to carry on the building projects that are contemplated.

Mr. SNELL. It is not the intention to raze all those buildings at once?

Mr. LANHAM. Surely not.

Mr. SNELL. It is a pretty sweeping proposition. I think we should have full information before we granted it.

Mr. LANHAM. If we gave it exclusively to one man, the authority would be pretty sweeping; but here it must be done with the approval of the Public Buildings Commission, which is the very commission which has within the scope of its authority the entire project. I think with that safeguard there can be no valid objection.

Mr. SNELL. What does that area include?

Mr. LANHAM. It includes that part of the territory and area lying between the south side of Pennsylvania Avenue and the north side of Maryland Avenue, extending to Fifteenth Street, which the Government does not now own. It is within this area that these new departmental buildings—that for the Department of Commerce, and that for the Department of Labor, and that for the Department of Justice, and the Archives Building, and so forth—are to be constructed according to the existing law. The Public Buildings Commission must give its approval; and the Public Buildings Commission, as the gentleman knows, has charge of the assignment of space for all of the departments and certainly will not permit the premature razing of any building which will be necessary for the temporary housing of employees of the Government until the whole project is completed.

Mr. SNELL. Of course, I am in sympathy with this general program, but this is such a sweeping amendment that I thought we ought to ask some questions and know it has been gone into thoroughly.

Mr. LANHAM. I think the gentleman is correct about that, but I think the saving clause with reference to the Public Buildings Commission would cover any objection that might be raised to the amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. I want to ask the gentleman a question. The amendment states that these authorized contracts shall be charged against appropriations. That does not go far enough. This amendment should definitely state that all of these authorized contracts shall be within the limit of the appropriations.

Mr. ELLIOTT. That is a matter which can be taken care of in the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. BLANTON. It should be taken care of here, for when our Government executes a contract we are forced to stand by it. The Senate had to furnish some brains, at least, in adding something deemed necessary to this bill, but apparently it has not gone far enough. There ought to be something else added to this bill. There ought to be a proper limitation added, and I think the gentleman ought to ask that this Senate amendment be agreed to with an amendment, to wit, that all of these authorized contracts shall be within the limit of the appropriations. With such an amendment added to the Senate amendment, I should not object, but I shall object unless that amendment is added.

Mr. ELLIOTT. I do not think any amendment is necessary.

Mr. BLANTON. You could enter into contracts for several hundred million dollars right now with respect to this triangle. I am familiar with it because I have been investigating it for the last 10 years. Now is the time and place to place proper restrictions upon this legislation.

Mr. DENISON. If the gentleman will permit, this only authorizes contracts for destroying old buildings.

Mr. BLANTON. But they could contract to spend a lot of money to destroy old buildings.

Mr. DENISON. The gentleman knows it would not take several hundred millions to destroy those old buildings, so why not be frank about it?

Mr. BLANTON. It should not take it. But this commission could contract to pay a whole lot of money to destroy them. I am in favor of destroying the ones that are necessary but we certainly ought to place a proper limitation in the bill before we agree to this amendment.

Mr. ELLIOTT. They can not destroy any of them without the consent of the Public Buildings Commission.

Mr. BLANTON. But the commission could agree to something, just like commissions do agree with some things that are sometimes foolish.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Has the gentleman no confidence in the Public Buildings Commission?

Mr. BLANTON. I have confidence in it as far as it goes and my confidence in that commission goes as far as my confidence goes in any Government commission. Some man proposes something and then every other fellow votes aye without looking into it. We must place a proper limitation in this bill. Whenever you enter into a contract signed by a commission of this Government under act of Congress, the Congress is going to have to pay for it, and you know we will have to appropriate the money.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I object unless the amendment is modified as I have suggested.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take the bill H. R. 483 from the Speaker's table, disagree to the Senate amendment, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana modifies his request and now asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table House bill 483, disagree to the Senate amendment, and ask for a conference. Is there objection?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the gentleman a question. I understand that this matter is subject to the approval of the Public Buildings Commission?

Mr. ELLIOTT. It is.

Mr. MONTAGUE. That there is to be some landscape gardening, and things of that sort, in connection with it? I can see that it is quite obvious that this should be done, but does this contemplate the approval of the Fine Arts Commission?

Mr. ELLIOTT. The whole plan is subject to the approval of the Fine Arts Commission and they have already approved this plan.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I wished to be quite certain of that.

Mr. LANHAM. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. ELLIOTT. Yes.

Mr. LANHAM. I will ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that the Fine Arts Commission has been acting in cooperation with the Public Buildings Commission in the matter of this triangle property?

Mr. ELLIOTT. That is true.

Mr. LANHAM. With respect to the suggestion made by my colleague from Texas, I will ask the gentleman if he does not know as a member of the Public Buildings Commission that it is not the policy of that commission for somebody to make a motion and then every other member of the commission ignorantly vote aye?

Mr. ELLIOTT. That is true.

Mr. BLANTON. It is done on the House floor day after day. Some fellow gets up and makes a motion of this kind and then everybody votes aye.

Mr. LANHAM. It certainly is not done in this commission.

Mr. ELLIOTT. No; not in the Public Buildings Commission.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Chair appointed the following conferees:

Mr. ELLIOTT, Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee, and Mr. LANHAM.

ADMINISTRATION OF THE OATH OF OFFICE TO HON. GEORGE S. GRAHAM

The SPEAKER. Under the authority granted the Speaker by House Resolution 72, the Chair appoints the Hon. ROYAL H. WELLER to administer the oath of office to the Hon. GEORGE S. GRAHAM.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that immediately after the disposition of business on the Speaker's table on Saturday it shall be in order to take up the resolution introduced by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUTLER] establishing a commission to make certain investigations in connection with the sinking of the S-4 and of the Navy Department.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I shall not object, that will be under the general rules of the House?

Mr. SNELL. Yes; it will be.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

ADMINISTRATION OF THE OATH OF OFFICE TO HON. FRANK H. FOSS

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I offer a resolution of the highest privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers a resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 78

Whereas FRANK H. FOSS, a Representative from the State of Massachusetts, from the third district thereof, has been unable from sickness to appear in person to be sworn as a Member of the House, and there being no contest or question as to his election: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Speaker, or a deputy named by him, be, and he is hereby, authorized to administer the oath of office to said FRANK H. FOSS at his home in Fitchburg, Mass., and that the said oath when administered as herein authorized shall be accepted and received by the House as the oath of office of the said FRANK H. FOSS.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I further request that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FOSS] be granted indefinite leave of absence.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

BILL PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT

Mr. CAMPBELL, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that on December 21, 1927, they presented to the President for his approval a bill of the House of the following title:

H. R. 5800. An act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1928, and prior fiscal years, to provide supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1928, and for other purposes.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

Sundry messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House that the President had approved a bill and a joint resolution of the following titles:

On December 19, 1927:

H. J. Res. 92. Joint resolution authorizing the payment of salaries to the officers and employees of Congress for December, 1927, on the 20th day of that month.

On December 22, 1927:

H. R. 5800. An act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1928, and prior fiscal years, to provide supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1928, and for other purposes.

ENLARGEMENT OF CAPITOL GROUNDS

Mr. KIESS. Mr. Speaker, on December 21 last the Speaker laid before the House a letter from the Commission for the Enlargement of the Capitol Grounds, which was ordered to be printed as a document for the information of the Members. The report contains 15 illustrations which are not covered by the order of the House.

The law provides that no part of the appropriation made for printing and binding shall be used for printing any illustrations unless the order to print expressly authorizes the same.

I ask unanimous consent that the order to print may include these illustrations.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I did not understand the gentleman. What document is this?

Mr. KIESS. It is the report of the commission composed of the Vice President, the Speaker of the House, and the Architect of the Capitol on the question of the enlargement of the Capitol Grounds. Permission to print was granted, but permission was not granted to include the illustrations.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

ADDRESS OF HON. A. B. HOUGHTON, AMBASSADOR TO ENGLAND

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a speech delivered by the Hon. Alanson B. Houghton, a former Member of this House and now ambassador to the Court of St. James, made at Harvard University in June last on the question of world peace.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman what that has to do with the proceedings of the Congress.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Mr. Speaker, I do not know that it has anything to do with the proceedings of the Congress, but it has very much to do with the questions now before the Congress and before the world. I hope the gentleman will not object. I am confident I take very little time of this House and use very little space in the RECORD.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The author of this address is a former Member of the House.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Yes; a former Member of the House and now ambassador to Great Britain.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Has not the important subject of "world peace" something to do with the proceedings of Congress, or are we not concerned with that at all?

Mr. EVANS of Montana. I think the country is very much interested in it.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, when I first came to Congress the Hon. James Mann and the Hon. Claude Kitchin and the Hon. Joseph Walsh, of Massachusetts, stood steadfast in the protection of the RECORD, and for a long, long time during the service of the gentlemen mentioned they kept out of the RECORD by objection extraneous matter which did not record the proceedings of Congress. I am not the heir of their duties, but I have a great admiration for what they did and what they accomplished. No one else seems to have taken their work seriously, and the RECORD consequently has been filled every session with a lot of matter which has absolutely nothing to do with the proceedings of Congress. It makes the RECORD ridiculous.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question? Did the distinguished gentlemen to whom he alludes ever go so far as to object to the publication of an address of a distinguished diplomat in the Foreign Service of the American Government, such as the ambassador to Great Britain?

Mr. UNDERHILL. That is what I want to be convinced of. I want to know whether it is the policy of the House to allow all of our diplomats, consuls, and other officials to express their views to the country through the medium of the RECORD.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. If the gentleman will permit, I think it has been customary to allow insertion in the RECORD of speeches made by Senators or Members of the House, members of the Cabinet, or our ambassadors. I agree with the gentleman from Massachusetts that all of this outside matter ought to be kept out of the RECORD, and I intend to do what little I can to assist the gentleman in keeping it out, but I think we have made an exception and allowed the insertion of speeches delivered by Members of Congress, ex-Members of Congress, members of the Cabinet, and ambassadors.

Mr. UNDERHILL. If this is in line with our past policy, Mr. Speaker, I shall not object.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. If objection is made, I shall read this speech into the RECORD. I had hoped not to take the time of the House, but I am going to place it in the RECORD.

Mr. TREADWAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EVANS of Montana. I will.

Mr. TREADWAY. I join with my colleague from Massachusetts in desiring to keep out of the RECORD extraneous matter. There is no one more in favor of the reduction of the size of the RECORD and economies in that respect than I am, but I do think the instance brought up at the present time is one where we should not exercise the expulsion procedure. The address is a very able one. Many of us have read it, and in addition to that it was prepared by an official of the Government. Further, it was delivered by a former Member of this House, with whom many of us have been associated and for whom all of us have the highest regard. I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts will not object.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EVANS of Montana. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. Does not the gentleman think in the House policy expressed in regard to the inserting extraneous matter into the RECORD we ought to include the addresses of admirals of our Navy on the important defects in the policies of our Navy, when such admirals can not get them printed anywhere else without being punished for it? [Laughter.]

Mr. EVANS of Montana. I have not gone into that matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Mr. Speaker, the press of the country carries the information that the State Department is just now conferring with the leading nations of the world in an effort to negotiate treaties to outlaw war.

Last June Ambassador A. B. Houghton, probably the foremost diplomat of America to-day, who served 10 years in Congress, was first ambassador to Germany after the World War, where he served 6 years, and who is now ambassador from this country to Great Britain, delivered an address to the graduating class of Harvard University in June last in which he advocated a change in the Constitution and the laws of the country on this question.

Ambassador Houghton's address is as follows:

PEACE

I want to talk to you a little while to-day about peace. What I have in mind to suggest, briefly, is certain considerations which would seem to indicate, if a more durable peace between them is desired, that the great self-governing peoples must undertake a new experiment in democratic government and extend the right of suffrage into international affairs. You understand, of course, that I am speaking for myself alone. What I shall say must not in any way be accepted as the position of my Government. I can only hope, however, that, if nowhere else, it will find some approval among those tens of millions of plain American men and women who want a durable peace and who are eager and willing to cooperate with other peoples to create a durable peace provided always that, in so doing, they are not asked to violate their own instinctive and fundamental political ideals and beliefs.

The difficulty of promoting a peace by agreement among the great self-governing powers roots in the fact that those charged with political authority assume the inevitability of war. They are ready to agree that peace is desirable and that war is a frightful, expensive, and irrational method of settling international disputes. In view of human experience, however, they see no other alternative. They are compelled, they say, to take human facts as they find them. And deep down in human nature they find racial and national instincts and prejudices which when appealed to have hitherto always resulted in a war spirit. They see no reason to believe that any other result may be expected in any future useful now to contemplate.

WILLING, NOT FORCED

Whatever else may be said to substantiate such a view of the ultimate relations between the self-governing nations, it plainly does not conform exactly to historical fact. War does not originate from time to time simply in a sudden and uncontrollable impulse on the part of one of these great national masses to go out and slaughter another. War is possible, no doubt, because these masses are willing, under conditions, to fight. But these conditions are themselves an integral part of the problem. Before a war is conceivable there must be an issue. And that issue, broadly speaking, is the outcome of a series of maneuvers by which the masses concerned are brought into positions of opposition. Obviously this maneuvering is not done by the masses themselves. Collectively and as individuals they have little, if anything, to do with the subtle and gradual shifting of international relationships. Their interests are directed to the more humble and prosaic task of earning a living. The maneuvering is done by little groups of men called governments. These little groups seek constantly and naturally to gain supposed advantages of one sort and another for their own nationals. Out of their efforts to enlarge or to strengthen or to maintain the interests intrusted to their charge, the masses they represent are gradually maneuvered into positions which, to say the least, can not easily be surrendered. If the process continues, sooner or later a situation arises in which an agreement between these small groups becomes impossible. Then, on the ground that their lives and families and property are somehow involved and endangered, these great masses of men and women, roused by every power of organized appeal and propaganda, are ordered under arms, and war follows. The entire process is in control of the smaller groups. They make the issue. They declare the war. The masses they control simply obey.

Having put this power, or left this power in the hands of their governments, they find themselves at the critical moment, substantially helpless. And so, as individuals, they merely accept the decision and go out to pay the bills of war with their bodies and perhaps with their souls, in the hope that, if not they, then those who come after them may reap a benefit in some measure proportionate to its cost. And even the very men, through whose instrumentality, consciously or unconsciously, this dreadful catastrophe has been brought about explain it on the ground that human nature being what it is, any other determination was impossible—and will be, either now or hereafter.

NOT BIOLOGICAL

Now war may be, in fact, the inevitable result of a serious clash of national interests. It is possible that no method of reaching a peaceful settlement can be devised. But certainly we have no reason to base that assumed failure upon some inherent weakness of human nature. That simply begs the question. War can be said to be inevitable only if we assume, first, that the conditions which from time to time have led to war were themselves the result of a process of necessity; and, second, that the conditions under which men have been brought to fight in times past were, in fact, those precise conditions under which they would have fought if given a choice. Neither of these assumptions can possibly be maintained. It is conceivable, to say the least, that considering the cost the great masses of human beings involved might have preferred some other method of settling any particular dispute. And we know that the conditions which hitherto have led to war are the result of human volition and deliberate choice—not of the populations involved but of their governments. Even if we admit, as perhaps we must, that as long as governments possess the power, first, to create conditions which ultimately result in a clash of national interest; and, second, by declaring war to force those issues to a test of armed strength—even if we admit under these circumstances that history will merely repeat itself and war more or less inevitably follow—we have no reason to admit that a similar result would follow if the power to declare war were in the hands of the populations. That is precisely what we do not know.

The experiment has never been tried. And there are considerations which apparently point the other way.

First. The great self-governing peoples have shown themselves competent to manage their domestic affairs. Foreign affairs are merely an extension of domestic affairs. There is nothing mysterious about them. They are not a sort of arcana, wherein the laws of common morality are excluded and in which only cynical gentlemen of bilingual attainments are competent to play a rôle. They are, in the main, simply the natural and beneficial outcome of a desire to trade. They become potentially dangerous only when men who temporarily possess power undertake, for a supposed national advantage, to infringe either the liberties or the possessions of a neighboring people. Then they become very dangerous indeed. But in so far, at least, as the great self-governing peoples are concerned does a sound foreign policy now necessitate either? Or is such an effort as likely to grow out of great masses of men and women whose interests lie primarily in peace as out of small groups of men who think, perhaps, they can better the relations between them and, sometimes, as history has shown us, are willing to take a chance? It is conceivable, indeed, that what men call "national destiny" might safely be left to work itself out more slowly and in its own way and without quite so much conscious aid and direction.

THE TOLL OF WAR

Second. War has steadily increased its demands. Once it could be waged with profit. Now no gain can equal its cost. Once it could be waged by a relatively small proportion of the populations involved. Now it embraces all. Men and women alike must contribute to its will to destroy. Its proportions have become so formidable and its demands and consequences so ruinous that it threatens to wreck civilization itself. For the wars of the civilized mean the breakdown of civilization. Whatever may be said regarding war in the past, whatever advantages may have come of it, whatever good it may have accomplished, to-day the situation is radically changed. This new democratic era into which we are entering, wherein production is becoming more and more a world process and in which the relations of each one of us is becoming more and more vitally dependent upon others, can not withstand the shock and dislocation and waste of war as easily as societies more primitively organized. Some check upon the use of this method must be found.

Third. While the fundamental relations between peoples are based, as at present, frankly and openly upon force, fear of attack becomes a natural and dominant consideration within each national group. Out of that fear springs, as a matter of course, the desire to increase armaments which, except for use against each other, are largely unnecessary. Each arms for defense, and each thus becomes potentially more able to attack and so more dangerous as a neighbor. What we do not always realize is that fear in this sense is fear of the concentrated power in the hands of governments to make war almost overnight. Such fear could not exist if the war-making power were diffused among a whole people. The tension would necessarily lessen. Time would be required before that power could again be focused. And time is the greatest ally of peace. But we may go even further. If this concentrated power, now in the hands of little groups of men called governments, were in fact diffused among their peoples, we may safely assert that they would be less inclined than now to develop situations out of which war might easily emerge. They could not be sure of their ability to carry such questionable plans through to completion. The mere fact that they had so managed a nation's business as to lead it to a dangerous crisis would be their condemnation. A new set of forces, not hitherto available to prevent war, would come into active operation.

THE ETERNAL AUTOCRAT

Fourth. The power to declare war stands on a different plane from all other powers of government. It is all-embracing and all-consuming. It subordinates all other powers to itself. It represents the highest act of sovereignty. It is the one power which of all others a self-governing people would logically reserve to itself, since it puts in jeopardy their collective lives and property. And yet, strangely enough, it is the one power they do not possess. We create governments primarily to protect our individual lives and property. To that end, we make laws and set up legislative safeguards, and if these prove unsatisfactory, we change them. It is only when all our lives and all our properties are suddenly involved in a great and supreme decision affecting peace or war that we cease to be self-governing. We accept the decision of others. The fact that self-governing peoples choose their own governments and are, therefore, presumably responsible for the actions and decisions of those governments, does not meet the issue. Those governments are never elected on the precise issue of peace or war. They are elected on domestic grounds and for domestic reasons. And a government elected primarily on an issue, let us say, such as the tariff, may not be at all representative when suddenly confronted by the need of a decision involving peace or war.

Such considerations are, of course, obvious enough. No sane human being would deny their compelling force if it were not for one doubt. And it is this. Are the plain men and women who make up the vast bulk of each of these self-governing nations as competent to determine if and when a war is necessary as the little groups of individuals who now form their Government? That is the doubt. And the answer to that doubt depends, obviously, upon our belief in popular government. There was a time when the ability of men and women to govern themselves under any conditions was disputed—and for precisely the same reasons. History and the rise of self-governing states have demonstrated not only that they are competent, but that they are happier and safer when they take on themselves the responsibility of government. Now we find ourselves face to face with that ancient question in a new guise—whether, although admittedly competent to govern themselves within their own frontiers, they are competent to control their fundamental relations with other peoples—in other words, to determine whether, at any given time, those relations shall be relations of peace or of war. That is the nub of the matter.

The great peoples are now self-governing. Each of them has set up a machinery of government which gives it effective control of its own domestic affairs. But in the region of international affairs the existing machinery of government has never been within their control and is not now.

Theoretically, of course, each self-governing people controls its relations with other peoples. Practically, by leaving the power to declare war in the hands of their governments they lose that control. It is conceivable, of course, that owing to some inherent moral instability or lack of understanding they are unfitted to assume that control—that they would treat lightly a decision which meant so much to them and to others and squander recklessly their lives and property in vain wars against their neighbors. But the presumption, at least, is in their favor. After all, it is their lives and their properties which are involved. And it is certainly within their power, if they will, by the appropriate contributional means either to permit the continuation of a system autocratic by nature, which always has resulted in war, and by which, as at present, their lives and property can be taken without consultation with them and without effective means of protest, or by agreement with other peoples to take upon their common shoulders the power to decide whether at any particular time war is or is not necessary. If they choose the latter course, war is inevitable only in so far as they themselves want it to be. They will be in position to decide, for then the full power of sovereignty will finally be within their grasp. Only then will the democratic process be complete.

NO PEACE BASED ON FORCE

If what I have said has substantial basis in fact, it would seem that the time is at hand when a new experiment in democratic control must be made, and those peoples who have demonstrated their competence to govern themselves within their own national frontiers must assume direct responsibility for their relations with each other. Our Governments have shown themselves unable to protect us against war. They continue to act along well-defined grooves and in accordance with the dictates of a political theory which exalts nationalism and relies frankly upon the use of force, when necessary, to attain these ends. We have no apparent reason to hope for any change in their method and in their aims. The future, if they control it, seems likely to be merely an intensified repetition of the past. Personally I believe we can not safely continue to be democratic within our national frontiers and autocratic in our relations with the other self-governing peoples. A durable peace can not be based upon force. It must, if it exists at all, be based upon good will. And I believe profoundly that that practical good will exists, that the great self-governing peoples can safely trust one another, and that only a method of dealing between them, inherited from an outgrown system of autocratic government, prevents our recognition of that great and beneficent fact. We are caught in a process of our own making. And we must unmake it.

That, substantially, completes what I have to say. What remains is to discuss the means by which that possible extension of democratic control can be put into practical effect, and into this discussion I do not propose now to enter. Nevertheless, to make my argument complete, I must indicate very briefly two conditions which seem to me essential:

First. If so great a political experiment is to be tried, it must be frankly an international experiment. It can not be safely or expediently entered upon by one nation alone. Obviously, the experiment would have a greater chance of success if confined at the beginning to those peoples who are most alike in race and ancestry, who possess, roughly, the same degree of economic and political and educational advancement, accept the same standards of life, respond to the same appeals, and react to the same emotions—in other words, the great self-governing peoples. Obviously, too, such a proposition can only be brought before them by the consent and with the cooperation of their respective governments. A conference at which each is represented would, therefore, be a necessary preliminary.

ON THE PEOPLE'S HEADS

Second. The object of such a conference would be, of course, to determine whether each of these governments is prepared by proper legislative action to enable its people to accept or reject a proposition whereby a declaration of war against the other peoples in the group can be made only after the question has received the affirmative sanction of a majority of its qualified electors; and, following this, to enter into an agreement whereby in return for reciprocal pledges each shall agree not to attack the others for a term of—say—100 years. If, as a result of such a conference, these two propositions can be formulated and accepted, a day should be fixed on which all the peoples so pledged would be given an opportunity to vote for or against ratification—so that by the simultaneous action of the individual electors in all the great nations involved the full responsibility for that agreement would be dramatically brought home to each and each be made aware that the issue of peace or war between them will be thereafter in their own hands and control. Into such a conference, it seems to me, the plain people of America would be eager to enter. Certainly, nothing in our past, nothing in our political traditions, nothing in our accepted principles of government, prevents our entering into an agreement not to attack nations which agree not to attack us. In this way, and perhaps in this way only, can we join hands effectively with the other self-governing peoples in a common effort to secure a more durable peace. But the agreement I am contemplating must be something more than an agreement between governments. It must be an agreement between the peoples themselves.

I need hardly point out to you that if such an agreement could be reached it would leave untouched the relations between each of these powers and all the other powers not involved. Only, as between the peoples who made this compact, there would be this additional security. For as the chances of a lasting peace are greater in the hands of parliamentary governments than in the hands of autocrats, so I believe those chances will be greater still when in the hands of great masses of human beings whose interests lie in peace and who think in terms of peace and who know that their individual lives and property are the stake if peace is broken. At any rate, so far as I can see, no effective alternative is open. If the danger of war is to be lessened, a sufficient measure of control, it seems to me, can be obtained only when the self-governing peoples definitely and constitutionally take the decision into their own hands.

Let me thank you now for the patience with which you have listened to me. I realize better than you possibly can how inadequate is the statement I have just made. But, however inadequate, it at least has this excuse, that it is an effort to point out an added security against war where it is most destructive and most dangerous—that is to say, between the peoples who are most alike, the self-governing peoples. Of course, if we are content with the present relations between them, we need no added security. But in view of the war which ended only eight years ago and of the peace that is even now being worked out, are we content?

INTERNATIONAL DAIRY CONGRESS

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs:

To the Congress of the United States:

I transmit herewith a report from the Secretary of State concerning participation by the Government of the United States in the Eighth International Dairy Congress, which will be held in Great Britain in June–July, 1928, under the patronage of His Majesty King George V.

Concurring in the view of the Secretary of State and the Secretary of Agriculture, as stated in the report, I request of Congress legislation authorizing acceptance of the invitation of the British Government to the Government of the United States to appoint delegates to that congress, and an appropriation of $10,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the payment of the expenses of delegates.

CALVIN COOLIDGE.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 5, 1928.

CLAIM BY THE GOVERNMENT OF NORWAY FOR PAYMENT OF INTEREST

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

To the Congress of the United States:

I transmit herewith a report from the Secretary of State in relation to a claim presented by the Government of Norway for the payment of interest on certain sums advanced by it for this Government in connection with its representation of American interests in Moscow, and I recommend that an appropriation be authorized to effect a settlement of this claim in accordance with the recommendation of the Secretary of State.

CALVIN COOLIDGE.

THE WHITE HOUSE, January 8, 1928.

DEPARTMENTS OF STATE, JUSTICE, COMMERCE, AND LABOR APPROPRIATION BILL, FISCAL YEAR 1929

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8269) making appropriations for the Department of State, Department of Justice, Departments of Commerce and Labor. Pending that motion, I would like to ask the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER] if we can agree on control of the time. It has been suggested that we let the debate run through to-day.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Let the debate run on to-day, and before the adjournment we can make some request for limitation. I assume that there will be coupled with the gentleman's motion a request that the time be equally divided between the two sides.

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the time be equally divided between the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER] and myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 8269, and pending that motion asks unanimous consent that the time for general debate to-day be equally divided between the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER] and himself. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The motion of Mr. SHREVE was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. LEHLBACH in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 8269) making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice and for the judiciary, and for the Departments of Commerce and Labor, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes.

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen of the House, before beginning discussion of the numerous items in the bill I wish to pay my respects to some of my associates on the committee who have been so kind in their cooperation in preparing the bill. I refer particularly to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER], the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ACKERMAN], and the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN]. [Applause.]

The bill we have presented to you to-day calls for $89,047,985.14. That, as you know, is divided between the four great departments of the Government covered by this bill.

These appropriations in the bill are $1,536,630.07 in excess of the amount we appropriated last year. Permit me to say it is also $169,900 under the estimates made by the Bureau of the Budget.

The total amount distributed under the four departments are as follows: Department of State, $13,875,955.14; Department of Justice and judiciary, $26,657,730. This is a decrease of $227,705. The Department of Commerce, $37,545,960, an increase of $80,510. The Department of Labor, $10,968,340, an increase of $793,470.

Now, if the committee will permit, I should like it to indulge me to the extent of allowing me to analyze the figures and discuss some of the changes that have been made. The committee went extensively and exhaustively into the items in the bill. The hearings are very voluminous, and I would recommend that each and every Member of Congress read the hearings.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE

The Department of State or, rather, its activities are separated or divided into five different groups or divisions: The department in Washington, including its passport bureaus throughout the United States, for which we have recommended $1,462,365, an increase over 1928 of $56,160; its Foreign Service organization, carrying $9,117,600, an increase of $330,316.84; the Foreign Service buildings and retirement funds, for which $1,763,000 is necessary for the next year; certain international obligations for which the United States makes annual contributions. These amount to $1,483,240.14, a decrease of $456,871.27; and the United States Court for China, which requires an annual contribution of $48,750. This then makes a total increase for the Department of State of $890,355.57. This increase is mainly made up of certain items in the Foreign Service and an increase in the Foreign Service buildings fund and retirement fund to carry out the provisions of which there is contained the first contribution on the Government's part of $213,000.

SALARIES, SECRETARY'S OFFICE

We have recommended a total of $1,145,760 for salaries under the Secretary's office, which is the main fund out of which is paid the salaries for the Washington organization. This is an increase of $56,160, and covers some salary increases totaling $20,000, as well as an amount of $10,780 for the salaries of four departmental employees to replace four Foreign Service officers now in the department who are badly needed in the field. The balance of the increase is to enable the department to bring up to date the cataloguing in the library, which has been in arrears for several years.

DEPARTMENTAL CONTINGENT AND PRINTING AND BINDING EXPENSES

We have allowed $53,605 and $200,000, respectively, for the department's local contingent and printing and binding expenses. This represents an increase of $10,000 in each instance and is to be used for the purchase of additional file cases and the printing of record books, invoice forms, and visa forms for diplomatic and consular offices abroad.

My attention was called yesterday to the fact that there is a shortage in room. This appropriation will take care of that, and I am glad to inform the gentleman from New York [Mr. BACON] that we have endeavored to take care of this matter and will supply the foreign offices with sufficient paper so that they may carry on their correspondence in a dignified way.

CLERKS AT EMBASSIES AND LEGATIONS

The appropriation for clerks at our embassies and legations abroad carries an increase of $15,000, bringing the total up to $390,000 for 1929. In some of the most important embassies, such as Brazil, Colombia, Costa Rica, and so forth, there is only one clerk available, and the increase we have allowed will permit of the appointment of an additional where they are most needed.

CONTINGENT EXPENSES, FOREIGN MISSIONS

For contingent expenses incident to the conduct of our foreign embassies, we have recommended a total of $854,500, an increase for 1929 over 1928 of $58,350. This is to provide for a skeleton force for each Government-owned mission building, varying with its size and the conditions in the country in which it is located, to consist of gardeners, housemen, janitors, and so forth, for the proper upkeep of these buildings. This is in accordance with the act of May 7, 1926, for the preservation of diplomatic and consular properties, and we believe is a very good thing in order to prevent deterioration of the properties in which our Government has already invested.

CLERK HIRE, UNITED STATES CONSULATES

The department has been handicapped in many consulates in supplying requests from the Department of Commerce to keep current their trade lists and world-trade directory reports by reason of lack of clerk hire. To relieve this situation we have allowed an increase of $60,000 in the amount for clerk hire to permit of the hiring of additional clerks to be appointed in those consulates where they are most needed. Including this addition, the amount recommended for 1929 for clerks at United States consulates is $1,645,000.

The State Department supplies over 90 per cent of the world-trade directory reports which the Department of Commerce has on file. These practically constitute business rating of some 300,000 foreign buyers or prospective buyers of American merchandise. Moreover, these reports have to be revised annually.

There are besides lists of dealers in various kinds of business which it is necessary for consular officers to revise and check from time to time to insure their accuracy. During the period from January 1 to September 1, 1927, the State Department received from the Department of Commerce a total of 4,264 communications requesting a total of 6,860 trade lists, covering some 475 different kinds of commodities, be checked with or revised by consulates abroad. The number of names on these lists aggregated 58,000 and constituted a heavy demand upon the time of 320 consular officers. A letter from Commerce, dated October 10, 1927, states that in the fiscal year 1925–26, 2,500 lists were received from consuls about 55 per cent complete as to information; the 5,400 lists in 1927 were 90 per cent complete. In addition to these lists the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce requested some 1,096 world-trade directory reports on specific firms, each request made separately by Commerce. I submit a copy of the letter concerning the trade lists which I have just mentioned. The letter states that a further increase is expected.

CONTINGENT EXPENSES, UNITED STATES CONSULATES

Similar to the contingent expenses for United States embassies, except that this amount is used for United States consulates, there is recommended in the bill $1,005,000, which includes an increase over 1928 of $30,000, which is required in the most part by a steady increase in rental of consulates abroad. This increase in rents is due to the inability to renew leases at the rentals heretofore paid, where, in those countries, by reason of leases specifying payments in local currency, more money is required to pay the rentals due to the steady betterment of local exchange.

SALARIES OF FOREIGN SERVICE OFFICERS

After going quite fully into the needs for Foreign Service officers abroad, the committee recommended $3,001,000, covering the salaries of 678 Foreign Service officers. This represents an increase of $71,000, covering 20 additional officers. The department estimated to us there are 25 consular offices being administered by clerks because of lack of career officers to properly represent them. This increase therefore will largely relieve the situation.

POST ALLOWANCES

We have recommended a sum of $100,000 for post allowances for the department, an increase of $71,000 over the current year. These allowances represent a fund which is designed to enable the President, in his discretion, to make special allowances by way of additional compensation to the Foreign Service officers of the department assigned to posts in those countries of the world where, by reason of unusually high living expenses and adverse conditions of foreign exchange, their salary is not sufficient to enable them to live. The department figures that this increase is quite necessary because of the constant resignations from the service of officers unable to meet the rising expenses of living abroad, and this is to be used to buttress up such salaries usually by small amounts in those instances where it is most needed.

FOREIGN SERVICE BUILDINGS FUND

Congressman PORTER, chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee and chairman of the Foreign Service Buildings Commission, authorized in the Foreign Service buildings act, appeared before our committee in support of the Budget estimate of $1,300,000 to carry out part of the authorization contained in this act and made a very interesting statement, which appears in the hearings at page 202. As the House knows, the act I have referred to authorized an expenditure of $10,000,000. Including amounts carried in deficiency acts and this estimate, there will have been made available for the acquisition of sites and placing buildings thereon, by the 1st of July, 1928, $2,435,000. This is less than the $2,000,000 per annum authorized to be appropriated and less than the $3,402,472 expenditure approved by the commission, but it is all that is required up to this time for expenditure. Projects approved so far are located as follows, an explanation of each appearing in the hearings: Panama City, London, Tirana, Albania, Managua, Nicaragua, Yokohama, Penang, Paris, Calcutta, Monrovia, Rio de Janeiro, Shanghai, Mukden, Amoy, and Tokyo. I should like to state that the motive which has actuated the buildings commission in their selection of projects has been the choice first of those posts where climatic conditions make service perilous and it is believed that proper housing conditions will relieve the situation.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SHREVE. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. Can the gentleman tell us where we can find information as to what is to be expended in each of these places, and what sort of structure is provided for? Can the gentleman give that information with reference to any particular point?

Mr. SHREVE. I am free to say to the gentleman that Congressman PORTER came before our committee and went into great detail as to the construction of these buildings, which statement appears on page 202 of the hearings. He also showed some motion pictures of the projects. He showed the condition at the present time and indicated what was proposed in the way of buildings. It is very interesting and illuminating, and I am sure that Mr. PORTER will be pleased some evening to show the motion pictures again, showing exactly what they are proposing to do.

Mr. DENISON. Does this bill provide an item for the construction of a building in Panama City?

Mr. SHREVE. We carry a general provision, and the selection of the projects and allocation of the money is made by the commission and the department. The appropriation is in a lump-sum amount. The projects are itemized in the hearings, which include Panama City.

Mr. DENISON. It is very commendable that there is to be constructed a building in Panama City. There is none more needed anywhere than there.

Mr. SHREVE. The committee was inclined to think that this commission was proceeding very wisely, and was really starting a wonderful work. Our country should really be on a par with any other country in the matter of buildings for our representatives in foreign countries.

FOREIGN SERVICE RETIREMENT AND DISABILITY FUND

Now, we have included in the bill the Budget estimate of $213,000, which is the first contribution on the part of the Government toward carrying out the provisions of section 18 (a) of the act of May 24, 1924—the Rogers Act—which authorizes annual estimates to be submitted of appropriations necessary to continue in full force the retirement and disability system established by that section.

STATUE OF HENRY CLAY, CARACAS, VENEZUELA

Also an amount of $41,000 toward the erection of a bronze statue of Henry Clay at Caracas, Venezuela, in accordance with the provisions of the act of February 24, 1927.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

There are few changes in the appropriations we have recommended for the Department of Justice for the fiscal year 1929, as against 1928. The total amount involved is $26,657,730. While on the face this appears like a reduction of $126,000 under 1928, this reduction is more than offset when consideration is taken of $250,000 contained in the last deficiency act for the purchase and installation of new boilers and other machinery and which is included in the comparison.

[1] Includes $484,546 in first deficiency act of 1928.

SALARIES, ATTORNEY GENERAL'S OFFICE

I should like to call the committee's attention to the fact that in the recent deficiency act which passed this House a sum was included for the payment of additional salaries under the Attorney General's office of $25,400 for the last six months of this current fiscal year. For those additional positions we have included, together with the amount for the regular salary roll of the Attorney General's office, the amount necessary for their payment for the whole of the next fiscal year, making the amount available for 1929 for the Attorney General $1,066,600.

SALARIES, FEES, AND EXPENSES FOR UNITED STATES MARSHALS AND THEIR DEPUTIES

We have increased the Budget estimate for the salaries of United States marshals and their deputies by $7,500, making the amount available for 1929 for this purpose $3,672,500. This, added to the amount the committee granted last year for the same purpose, will give further nominal increases to the salaries of the lower-grade marshals and their deputies.

SALARIES AND EXPENSES OF DISTRICT ATTORNEYS AND THEIR REGULAR ASSISTANTS

After listening carefully to the requirements of the district attorneys' offices and their assistants we added $15,000 over the Budget estimates to the two appropriations under which these expenses fall, making the amounts available for 1929 $1,440 and $1,130,000, respectively. In connection with the Budget estimates this represents an increase of $40,000 and $30,000 over 1928, which is to be used for salary increases for assistant district attorneys and their clerks. In allowing these increases in this most important aspect of the department's work we believe that it will have a most salutary influence in those cases where faithful and efficient service warrant increased compensation.

SALARIES OF CLERKS OF UNITED STATES COURTS

Consistent with an additional amount allowed in the first deficiency act of 1928 for the addition of 11 employees in different United States court jurisdictions, we have suggested an appropriation in the bill before you an amount of $1,820,000 for the salaries of clerks of United States courts. This amount allows a small amount also for the increased compensation of some of the deputy clerks in these courts.

MISCELLANEOUS EXPENSES, UNITED STATES COURTS

When we had the estimate for miscellaneous expenses for United States courts under advisement we took into full consideration an addition, which was contained in the Budget estimates of $119,000, which was to cover the salaries of 34 law clerks at $3,000 each and their traveling expenses. These clerks were to be used for the United States circuit judges. We disallowed this whole amount and deleted the language providing for the employment of these clerks both because we did not think them necessary and because no legislation authorizing their appointment was on the statute books of the Government.

In traveling around over the country we discovered that the United States marshals and United States attorneys and deputy United States attorneys have been very poorly paid. We began last year with some recommendations to the Department of Justice, hoping that we might be able to relieve this situation. As I have stated, we are carrying some additional appropriations this year, so far as we can, to cover some of these inequalities.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHREVE. Yes.

MEXICAN CLAIMS COMMISSION

Mr. HUDSPETH. I was hoping that the gentleman would touch on the matter of the Mexican Boundary Claims Commission. I was looking to see if it was mentioned in the hearings, but I do not find it. I would like to ask the gentleman in regard to the special and general Mexican Claims Commission. Can the gentleman give us any information as to the progress that is being made concerning the adjudication of those claims by this commission, and when they will probably report those claims or pass upon them? That is a matter which, of course, is of very great interest to the people along the Rio Grande and the border section of Texas.

Mr. SHREVE. I am glad to say to the gentleman that the American agent of that commission appeared before the committee and made a very satisfactory statement, and assured us that they were making progress; that they would endeavor to finish the work within the time fixed. A very large number of claims has been filed on both sides of the river, and they require careful investigation of the commission first, and afterwards that of the two Governments, in order to be adjudicated. The commission has been making good progress.

WATER BOUNDARY COMMISSION

As to the Water Boundary Commission, I may say the situation is well in hand, and we have there now a gentleman who is actively devoting his time and attention to it. I refer to Mr. Lawson, an old reclamation man, and he is proceeding rapidly with the work. The commissioner on the other side of the line informed us last year that they were about ready to report.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I am gratified to get that information. I understand that the two boundary commissioners representing the United States and Mexico have agreed upon a treaty and a survey of the land, so far as the El Paso Valley is concerned, and that that treaty is now before the State Department here and before the State Department of Mexico. I just wanted to get that information which the gentleman has given me in regard to the claims commission. Can the gentleman inform me what is the limit fixed by the law as to time?

Mr. SHREVE. I think it is about a year now.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. SHREVE. Yes.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. While we are on that Mexican boundary question, may I ask the gentleman concerning the so-called commission, concerning the distribution of the waters of the Rio Grande? Does the gentleman's bill provide for that purpose?

Mr. SHREVE. We were just speaking of that, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. What have you done with that appropriation?

Mr. SHREVE. We have increased that appropriation.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. It is all they will be able to utilize?

Mr. SHREVE. Yes; we have provided all the money they needed.

Mr. GARNER of Texas. Is there any information before your committee as to when they will have their first joint meeting?

Mr. SHREVE. No. The gentleman from Alabama, my colleague [Mr. OLIVER], may probably recall.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I understood the State Department to say that they would suggest that an early date be fixed for the meeting, but there is no definite time fixed by the commission for its meeting.

Mr. SHREVE. I now yield to the gentleman from New York.

UNITED STATES MARSHALS

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I want to go back to the point the gentleman was referring to at the time he yielded to the gentleman from Texas and that is the appropriation for United States marshals and deputies. Last year the appropriation was increased $78,320 to take care of about 690 deputies in the lower salaried grades. In this bill the salaries of the marshals are readjusted and properly so, but I desire to direct the gentleman's attention to the condition which exists in the southern district of New York and the eastern district of New York. These deputies, who have a great many more duties to perform than deputies in the smaller districts, are receiving pay that is hardly a living wage for New York City. As the gentleman knows, they have to escort prisoners to Atlanta, and they have to serve injunction papers.

It is a very serious condition there. Men are getting $1,700 and some are getting as little as $1,500. I know of one case where a man does not have enough to get decent clothes. Surely we ought to pay them as much as a police officer receives in that same community. At the proper time I am going to offer an amendment and I assure the gentleman the situation there is really one of grave concern. I hope the gentleman and his committee will in the meantime look into the matter.

Mr. SHREVE. The committee has already looked into it. We had before the committee the United States district attorney of New York and he made a wonderful statement, so we are fully familiar with all the facts the gentleman from New York has just stated, and it was our endeavor in this bill to correct the conditions he has mentioned.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But you do not.

Mr. SHREVE. Well, we commenced last year. There was some money last year that was saved for the increase of salaries. However I want to be shown and want to be sure, because I feel confident the bill will cover the situation. I suggest to the gentleman that he take up the matter with the Attorney General's office and let us know about it.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I will do that within the next 24 hours.

Mr. NEWTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHREVE. Yes.

Mr. NEWTON. I am glad the committee is pursuing this policy with reference to marshals and deputies. Has the committee done anything with reference to the deputy clerks of the United States district courts?

Mr. SHREVE. Yes; we are also taking care of the clerks and deputies.

Mr. NEWTON. Because there is a situation there that certainly must be remedied.

Mr. SHREVE. I will say to the gentleman that that situation needed some correction, but for two years, now, we have been trying to correct it. In the course of time it will be corrected all over the country, but it takes time to do those things. More than that, there is a very great difference in the activities of the various courts over the United States and what will apply to one district does not apply to another. In some sections of the country the courts have not as much to do as others and hence the work of the clerks varies, while in the section from which the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] comes they are overwhelmingly worked. We are trying to work out a system that will comprehensively take care of all of the United States.

Mr. NEWTON. I know of an instance of a deputy clerk who, I think, is getting around $1,800 or $1,900 a year. He has to spend all of his time at his work and his experience is invaluable to the practitioner who only gets into the Federal court now and then. I am very glad to know the committee has taken this action.

Mr. SHREVE. We realize the very great importance of that matter.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHREVE. Yes.

DISTRICT ATTORNEYS AND THEIR ASSISTANTS

Mr. SNELL. I was very much interested in the allowances that are made for the salaries and expenses of the district attorneys and assistant district attorneys. I notice you have increased the current appropriation by $40,000. This is to cover the proposed adjustment of compensation in the offices of United States district attorneys, including their clerks, and I was wondering what you could do toward increasing the salaries of district attorneys with such a small amount as $40,000.

Mr. SHREVE. They will get a nominal increase because there are not so many of them in the United States.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. It might mean an increase of 50 cents.

Mr. SHREVE. No; the gentleman from Iowa is a bad mathematician.

Mr. SNELL. Just how do you expect that to increase the salaries of these officials?

Mr. SHREVE. Many will get an increase, but this is not distributed to everybody. It is intended for use in such cases as were mentioned by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA], but it is not intended for those smaller towns where such conditions do not prevail.

Mr. SNELL. Then this money is to be used in the discretion of the Department of Justice, and they will place it where they see fit?

Mr. SHREVE. That is the idea.

Mr. SNELL. How much extra is provided for assistant district attorneys?

Mr. SHREVE. Thirty thousand dollars.

Mr. SNELL. We have this situation in the northern district of New York. The department has authorized them to appoint an assistant, and they want to get an assistant for $2,400. Such a man, however, will go up against a man who in one case will get a fee of $10,000, and I would like to know what is the use of sending a boy to do a man's work in a proposition of that kind, when the proposition, perhaps, involves Government property to the extent of hundreds of thousands of dollars.

Mr. SHREVE. That does not just quite explain the situation.

Mr. SNELL. I am asking for information.

Mr. SHREVE. Many of these men in the Department of Justice are capable of earning four, five, or six times as much money as they are getting.

Mr. SNELL. I think that is true.

Mr. SHREVE. But they are devoting a few years to work in the Department of Justice for the purpose of getting a background so that they may go out to one of the great cities and almost instantly acquire a practice. You will find that is true in many of the departments, especially in the Patent Office, where men are working for less money than they could receive on the outside. Of course, as the gentleman knows, the Government can not pay what private industry and individuals pay. But this is the point: Those men are rendering a great service and I think they are very efficient, although they are getting small pay.

Mr. SNELL. Has the gentleman's committee allowed as much as the Department of Justice has thought necessary in order to get proper men to fill these positions that are vacant or the ones that are filled at the present time by men who are not really capable of doing the work.

Mr. SHREVE. I am not aware there are any such offices filled by men not capable of doing the work.

Mr. SNELL. No; I do not know that I should have said that. I think perhaps that should have been left out; but they are not getting men of the type they want.

Mr. SHREVE. Well, I will not say that, but I will say they are not retaining the men they want. They are getting good men, but after a man has acquired this background, after being with the Department of Justice here in Washington for a time, he goes out somewhere and opens up an office for himself and profits by the wide experience he has had in the department here.

Mr. SNELL. I appreciate that will always be true regardless of what we pay them.

Mr. SHREVE. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. But you have allowed the Department of Justice practically what they have asked for, have you?

Mr. SHREVE. Yes; and in some instances we have increased the estimate of the Budget.

Mr. SNELL. Then if I should go to the Department of Justice with a specific case, if they agree with me, they can not say they would be glad to grant the request, but the Committee on Appropriations has not granted them enough money.

Mr. SHREVE. Well, I have never heard of such a statement being made.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. If the gentleman will permit, I do not think the gentleman from New York would wish any Member of Congress to give an assurance like that.

Mr. SHREVE. No.

Mr. SNELL. That is a pretty general statement.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Some Members of Congress probably like to pass the buck and many on the outside like to do the same thing, and seldom can Congress, if ever, be able to say that what we have done has absolutely satisfied everybody. We have, of our own volition, increased the amount recommended by the Budget for district attorneys and assistants to district attorneys, and we have also carried a large sum to provide for the employment of special assistants in cases of importance requiring unusual skill. The Attorney General came before the committee, and it seemed to me that he was very well satisfied with what the committee had given the department, and he registered no protest.

Mr. SNELL. That is what I have in mind. In the opinion of the committee they have given everything asked for that was reasonable and fair to provide ample assistance in this department.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. We could, perhaps, in justice, have raised some salaries. There are many rendering special services who are not paid what a lawyer on the outside could get.

Mr. SNELL. I agree with the gentleman about that; but I had in mind that in a general way they are satisfied.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. We could, in justice, have raised the salary of a good many, but, as stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SHREVE], we must leave that largely to the Attorney General.

Mr. SNELL. It would seem to me from the statements made by the gentleman from Alabama and the gentleman from Pennsylvania that we have provided a reasonable amount to take care of these conditions as they exist throughout the country at the present time, in accordance with the case presented to the Appropriations Committee by the Department of Justice.

Mr. SHREVE. That is the aim of the committee.

Mr. SNELL. That is what I wanted to have clear in my own mind, and I think it is a matter that should be cleared up at this time.

Mr. SHREVE. As the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER] has suggested, we have provided funds for special assistants to provide for cases where especial legal talent is desired, and I am glad to hear that the gentleman from New York is satisfied with the arrangement.

DEPUTY MARSHALS

Mr. HUDSPETH. I do not want to tire my friend, and this is a matter that possibly the gentleman went over in the hearings, because the gentleman mentioned something about raising the salary of deputy marshals. Out in my section of the country these officials are called upon to enforce all of the laws—immigration, labor, prohibition, and so forth—and I do not think they get appropriate salaries for the work they are doing.

Mr. SHREVE. We have tried to remedy that. We began last year when they were given increases. We have given them more this year.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I beg the gentleman's pardon for going over the matter again, as I am sure the gentleman has had the matter under consideration.

Mr. SHREVE. Yes; much that I have said about the assistant district attorneys also applies to the deputy marshals. There are sections of the country where they are seriously overworked, but there are other sections where they do not have so much to do.

Mr. HUDSPETH. And is this left to the discretion of the Attorney General?

Mr. SHREVE. Yes.

Mr. WELLER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SHREVE. Yes.

Mr. WELLER. With reference to the assistant district attorneys in the southern district of New York, the gentleman possibly recalls that I made a speech on that subject last year.

Mr. SHREVE. Yes.

Mr. WELLER. Does this bill contemplate any increase in salary for these men?

Mr. SHREVE. We have granted a slight increase, which I presume the Department of Justice will allocate in such manner that it will in part become effective in New York City. I hope so.

Mr. WELLER. We have the gentleman's best wishes anyway.

Mr. SHREVE. Yes.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. SHREVE. Yes.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Is that the best the gentleman can do? Must the Department of Justice make the allocation?

Mr. SHREVE. We never make the allocation here, as the gentleman knows. These appropriations are carried in lump-sum amounts for the department's use.

PENAL INSTITUTIONS

As you gentlemen know, the control and management of prisoners convicted of violations of United States statutes has been vested in the Attorney General. There are six penal units for the housing of Federal prisoners under his jurisdiction, as well as a large fund for the support of the same type of prisoners in other institutions than Federal. These institutions and the amounts for their upkeep as recommended are as follows:

Object	Appropriations, 1928	Estimates, 1929	Amount recommended in bill for 1929	Increase (+) decrease (−), bill compared with 1928	Increase (+) decrease (−), bill compared with 1929 estimates
PENAL AND CORRECTIONAL INSTITUTIONS
Penitentiary, Leavenworth, Kans.	$866,740	$890,000	$880,000	+$13,260	−$10,000
Penitentiary, Atlanta, Ga. (including $250,000, first deficiency act, 1928)	1,100,000	852,500	852,500	−247,500
Penitentiary, McNeil Island, Wash. (including $75,150 in first deficiency act, 1928)	478,150	509,600	509,600	+31,450
Federal Industrial Institution for Women, Alderson, W. Va.	230,000	275,000	260,000	+30,000	−15,000
U. S. Industrial Reformatory, Chillicothe, Ohio	360,000	372,500	372,500	+12,500
National Training School for Boys, Washington, D. C.	240,000	252,710	252,710	+12,710
Probation system, United States courts	30,000	30,000	25,000	−5,000	−5,000
Support of prisoners	2,300,000	2,350,000	2,350,000	+50,000
Inspection of prisons and prisoners	12,000	13,000	13,000	+1,000
Total, penal and correctional institutions	5,616,890	5,545,310	5,515,310	−101,580	−30,000

We have recommended the Budget estimate in each instance, with the exception of the penitentiary at Leavenworth and the Federal Industrial Institution at Alderson for women. In these two instances we made reductions.

I might say that the National Industrial Institution for Women is the newest institution that the United States Government has, and it is being constructed on modern lines and being managed with the most enlightened methods as to the handling of female prisoners.

The expense of maintenance is very high for the reason that the population has by no means reached its limit. The Industrial Reformatory at Chillicothe is another new institution and where men are doing the work, and they have about 300 prisoners there now who are being well taken care of. The institution seems to be getting along fairly well.

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE

The total appropriation recommended for the Department of Commerce, including the Secretary's office and all of the bureaus under its jurisdiction, is $37,545,960, which is $80,510 more than the appropriations under which the department is now operating, and $50,500 less than the Budget estimates. Following is a list of the bureaus in the department, showing the current appropriation for each, the Budget estimate, the amounts recommended in the bill, and the increases or decreases:

Bureau	Appropriations 1928	Estimates 1929	Amount recommended in the bill for 1929	Increase (+), decrease (−), bill compared with 1928 appropriations	Increase (+), decrease (−), bill compared with 1929 estimates

	[2] 37,465,450	37,596,460	37,545,960	+80,510	−50,500

[1] Because of some of the appropriation having been made available for 1927 there is in reality an increase for 1929 over 1928 of about $500,000.

[2] Includes $838,000 in first deficiency act, 1928.

THE ENFORCEMENT OF LAWS RELATING TO WIRELESS COMMUNICATION

The committee recommended a substantial appropriation for the enforcement of wireless communication laws when the present radio activities throughout the country necessitated some Government supervision. During that year, however, following court decisions and an opinion rendered by the Attorney General to the effect that the Department of Commerce was without authority to enforce existing regulations relating to broadcasting stations, over $100,000 was returned to the Treasury as unexpended. Since that time, however, regulatory legislation has been enacted empowering the radio division of the department to supervise all commercial and private radio stations, observe the terms of their licenses relating to the use of wave lengths and power, and hours of operation. It assigns call letters to all stations and examines and licenses radio operators, both commercial and amateur. There has been included in the recent deficiency act $84,000 for the balance of the present fiscal year to enable the division to carry out the provisions of the act mentioned. For the division for 1929 we recommend $304,000, which is a commensurate increase over 1928 when consideration is taken of the fact that these additional duties for the present year will only have been undertaken for a period of six months.

Another important branch of the service relates to commercial aeronautics.

AERONAUTICS BRANCH

For the information of those Members who were not here when the important work of lighting and maintaining our airways was initiated, I think it would be well to call attention to the organization of the aeronautics branch and what has been accomplished heretofore.

The aeronautics branch of the department was organized under the air commerce act, approved May 20, 1926. It performs the functions intrusted to the Secretary of Commerce by the provisions of that act. These include: The establishment and maintenance of civil airways and their equipment with intermediate landing fields, beacon lights, signal and radio apparatus, and other aids to air navigation; the establishment and enforcement of air traffic rules; the inspection and licensing of aircraft; the collection and dissemination of information pertaining to air commerce, including data concerning the causes of accidents; the establishment of a suitable weather service on airways; the charting of airways and the publication of air maps; the promotion of air commerce, industry, and trade; and the conduct of scientific research and development work tending to the improvement of facilities for air navigation. The act provided for the rating of air ports as to suitability and for the encouragement of the establishment and maintenance of air ports by municipalities. When operations authorized by the act were commenced the intention was that, so far as practicable, the duties imposed should be distributed among existing agencies of the department. Accordingly the task of establishing, maintaining, and operating aids to navigation along air routes was assigned to the airways division, operated as a part of the Lighthouse Service; the mapping of air routes under the airway mapping section, which is a part of the organization of the Coast and Geodetic Survey; and the scientific research for the improvement of air-navigation aids to the aeronautical research division, which is a part of the Bureau of Standards. For the examination and licensing of aircraft and airmen, the enforcement of air traffic rules, and for the collection and dissemination of aeronautical information new divisions were set up in the department, namely, the air regulations division and the air information division.

The appropriations which cover the activities of this branch of the department are for convenience of allocation carried under two funds: One, aircraft in commerce, which covers the Washington activities as well as the inspection of aircraft, and for which we have included $662,000. This represents a reduction under the Budget of $40,000, covering the salaries of 10 inspectors. In the current year they are using the services of 20 inspectors, and the estimates called for 50 in 1929. The committee felt justified in reducing this amount by 10 in view of the authorization allowed in the bill for the purchase of five additional airplanes, which will permit the inspectors to travel from one place to another for inspection purposes much quicker. The other fund, air navigational facilities, which is for the cost of establishing and maintaining civil airways, carries an appropriation in the bill of $3,209,850, an increase over 1928 of $402,860. This will permit of the lighting of 2,500 additional miles of airways during 1929, which will make a total mileage of airways lighted in the United States of 10,012.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHREVE. Certainly.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. In that connection it may be well to say that we were of the opinion that 40 inspectors, if supplied with airplanes, would do more work than 50 largely required to go by train.

BUREAU OF FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC COMMERCE

Mr. SHREVE. Yes. I want to say a word about the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce this year. Our increases have been considerable, and it may be of interest to the House to know just what they are. For the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce for 1929 we have recommended the total of $4,520,857. This represents the large increase over 1928 of $470,400, and an increase we made over the Budget estimate of $20,000. These increases are distributed among the different funds of the bureau as follows:

Purpose	Appropriations, 1928	Estimates, 1929	Amount recommended, 1929	Increase (+), decrease (−), bill compared with 1928 appropriations	Increase (+), decrease (−), bill compared with estimates
Salaries, director's office	$247,887	$252,887	$252,887	+$5,000
Printing and binding	240,500	250,500	250,500	+10,000
Contingent expenses	108,000	108,000	108,000
Promoting commerce in Europe	808,992	864,143	844,143	+35,151	−$20,000
Promoting commerce in South America	410,791	458,817	458,817	+48,026
Promoting commerce in Far East	333,187	365,000	365,000	+31,813
Promoting commerce in Africa		85,010	105,010	+105,010	+20,000
District and cooperative offices	435,000	495,000	495,000	+60,000
China trade act	30,000	30,000	30,000
Export industries	810,440	875,000	875,000	+64,560
Domestic commerce	199,160	255,000	275,000	+75,840	+20,000
Customs statistics	335,000	335,000	335,000
Restrictions and regulations of foreign trade	35,000	50,000	50,000	+15,000
Directory of foreign buyers	30,000	45,000	45,000	+15,000
Transportation of remains	1,500	1,500	1,500
Traveling expenses	45,000	50,000	50,000	+5,000
	4,070,457	4,520,857	4,540,857	+470,400	+20,000

Despite this large increase, most of which was indicated in the Budget estimates, our committee was deluged this year with requests of every description, and it held hearings for over three days permitting more than 60-odd various commercial organizations to appear before it, making requests which if they had been granted would have totaled over $2,000,000 more than the increase allowed.

In 1920, when the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce first started expanding its appropriations were $1,085,460. As already stated, the recommendations for 1929 are $4,540,857, an increase of $3,455,397 since that time, and less than $500,000 of the amount of $5,000,000 stated to the committee last year by the director as the sum that would represent "a more or less complete institution."

A large number of requests were made for economic surveys covering every description and every type of manufacture. The committee has recommended no appropriation for any of these numerous requests from these outside organizations, recognizing as it does that there is being carried in one fund alone under the bureau an appropriation of $495,000 for the maintenance of 26 district offices throughout the United States and another appropriation supplementing the aid, the district offices are already giving to domestic commercial interests in the United States amounting to $275,000.

Mr. NEWTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHREVE. Yes.

Mr. NEWTON. There was a request made of the subcommittee, of which the gentleman is the chairman, for a very substantial addition in the number of trade commissioners, commodity commissioners. I note that that request has not been met. I am inclined to agree with the report of the committee in that respect, but in going over the report on page 23 I fear there is something there which might indicate a critical attitude upon the part of the committee of the work being done by the present commodity representatives, or divisions in respect to commodities.

Mr. SHREVE. Not as to the divisions nor to the work a limited number of "commodity" trade commissioners might do, but our criticism is to the abnormal number of requests for them.

Mr. NEWTON. I wanted to be sure about that.

Mr. SHREVE. The only thing the committee desired to do was to impress upon the country the situation as to the future. Last year at the suggestion of the director who stated that at most this innovation would never apply to more than a dozen major commodities and only then to very necessary situations.

But the idea has spread in the short space of time of less than a year to all over the United States, so that every town and hamlet wants a commodity expert sent over to represent some particular business in that particular town or commodity in a foreign country, until the thing has got to be intolerable. That is the reason for our report and why we intend following the original idea of a very limited number. We do not intend to tolerate the thought that every industry in the United States is to have a traveling Government representative. We will, however, make those points of contact between the great industries of our country and foreign governments. I know of one particular case in the old country where a particular kind of horn was provided for in a city ordinance. The ordinary salesman could not go to the officials of that town and have them change that ordinance. It required a Government official, and our commercial attaché, representing this Government, went and got in contact with an official of the foreign government, and he succeeded in that way in having the ordinance changed in respect to that particular horn. That is the sort of thing that we intend to cover. We are not providing salesmen for every manufacturing institution all over the United States, sending them abroad to represent some particular activity, but it is only when they can get this particular information that we propose to help them, and we will always be ready to help them under those circumstances.

Mr. NEWTON. I am very glad to have the gentleman's attitude in that respect, because my own experience is that those divisions in respect to commodities, in Washington here, have done very fine work. I would not want to see that work curtailed, and I sympathize with the committee in its attitude toward all of these extravagant demands.

Mr. SHREVE. Yes; the commodity divisions here in the city are rendering quite valuable service, but so far as "commodity" trade commissioners are concerned we were swamped. We spent two or three days at the end of our hearings to hear gentlemen coming from all over the United States—150 to 200 witnesses—and most of them came representing those particular activities that have been taken care of. It seems to me that the country at large did not realize the splendid foreign organization already set up abroad giving service, and service that was being rendered everywhere in foreign countries by our foreign offices.

Mr. KELLY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHREVE. Yes.

Mr. KELLY. I direct the attention of the gentleman to the question of regional economic surveys, which is covered in the report, and which indicates a rather critical attitude on the part of the committee toward the regional surveys. The gentleman knows that I appeared before the committee. What is the attitude of the committee on that?

Mr. SHREVE. What I have said pertaining to the other matter might apply to this. We did not object to the idea of brief economic surveys made in the United States, but we do object to Erie County in Pennsylvania or some other county in some other State, or to some city like Boston or Philadelphia, coming and asking us for a survey of their community, which, judged by the sample before me, covers every conceivable subject, from vital statistics to taxation, agriculture, shipping, and so forth, contained in 477 printed pages and duplicating work of our other Government organizations such as the Bureau of the Census, Department of Agriculture, and so forth. Furthermore, just as soon as word passed out that there was a survey made in the Southwest, everybody all over the country wanted a survey of their particular district. I had one letter from Washington in which it was stated that the writer thought that the Government could do the job very much better than their particular local chamber of commerce.

Mr. KELLY. The gentleman does not mean to limit the regional surveys of a comprehensive view of the United States, does he, by regions, to carry out the very purpose of the law which is to compile and collect information on raw materials and manufactures?

Mr. SHREVE. I will not say that I am opposed to it. As I have already stated, I do not object to brief economic surveys of broad geographical sections of the United States, but to a voluminous, expensive document, like the one before me, covering, as I have also said, every phase of life in a specified community, much of the data already available from other Government institutions and heretofore collected by them at Government expense, I do object. The matter should proceed very slowly and be worked out carefully and studied to avoid duplication, and then in the course of a year or two see whether they are so universally necessary.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. SHREVE. Certainly.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I think the attitude of the committee might well be gathered from the fact that we have continued an appropriation of last year, used for making and completing one survey, and which will now be available for other surveys. We added $15,000, which will be available for that purpose.

Mr. KELLY. I was going to ask whether that could be used for such a service?

Mr. SHREVE. The gentleman can come to his own conclusion as to that.

Mr. KELLY. I think the south coast should be given a survey, and perhaps the manufacturing districts of the South Atlantic should have a survey.

Mr. SHREVE. With what we added and what was remaining in the fund we believe there is enough to take care of the expenditures under this fund.

Mr. KELLY. Then the report may be said to be somewhat exaggerated?

Mr. SHREVE. No; it is not. We have covered the situation fully. I wish to say another word about the organization abroad. We are not inclined to send out assistants for anything more than to provide for those circumstances which I have tried to describe.

Despite a foreign organization of over 60 offices, employing over 150 trade commissioners and assistant trade commissioners, not including numerous clerical assistants, at an annual cost to the Government alone of nearly $2,000,000 for this branch of the bureau's work alone, the committee had more than 25 requests to appoint any number of so-called "commodity" or "special" trade commissioners to travel over the territory already occupied by these foreign offices mentioned, but to represent some particular commodity or branch of manufactures. I ask you in all candor, would any large commercial organization, represented internationally and spending $2,000,000 annually for over 60 offices, on top of this great outlay duplicate the work these offices would be supposed to be doing by sending additional high-salaried individuals into different parts of the world? Obviously, it would not. If, perchance, it had some particular line of merchandise it wished to "push," it would communicate with the offices in question and indicate that their activities should be increased in that direction. In fact, I put this parallel up to one official of a very large company in the United States and he immediately saw the duplication of effort and expenditure involved. Further, that he had made a request of one of the bureau's offices on the very type of manufacture he at first desired several "commodity" trade commissioners to represent, and he stated that he received all the information and service he could possibly wish for. This procedure was started by the bureau last year with several such representatives, with the idea that it never would expand to the extreme proportions the requests we have received indicate it would if allowed to continue, even in the short space of time of six months. Furthermore, I do not, and the committee does not conceive it to be the function of the Government to single out particular or individual types of commodities and manufactures in the United States, either in its already established offices, or the so-called "commodity" commissioner, if we had approved the continuance of the idea. Rather, it is the department's function to assist foreign and domestic trade and commerce nationally. Frankly, gentlemen, if this procedure were permitted to continue, it would be but a short time before you were asked to increase the bureau's already substantial appropriation by several millions of dollars to duplicate work that its foreign offices, already amply staffed, have already done and are doing. I hope, therefore, that the committee's recommendations will stand, which as I have already stated, contain a total increase of $470,400.

BUREAU OF THE CENSUS

We have recommended for the Census Bureau the Budget estimate of $2,048,200, and which includes an amount of $110,000, being the first appropriation toward starting the preliminary work necessary for the fifteenth decennial census of the United States.

STEAMBOAT INSPECTION SERVICE

The annual amount available for the next fiscal year (1929) for the Steamboat Inspection Service is $1,114,060, which represents an increase of $34,000 over the present appropriations and $5,000 over the Budget estimate. Eleven thousand dollars of this increase is for additional traveling inspectors (three) and the remainder to be used for salary increases for assistant inspectors and clerks in the field.

BUREAU OF NAVIGATION

We have included in the appropriation for the Bureau of Navigation of $16,860 for additional commissioners and their clerks and office expenses at Mobile and Los Angeles, where they are very much needed. This makes the total amount available for 1929 $333,880.

BUREAU OF STANDARDS

Moderate increases among the various funds of the Bureau of Standards to keep apace with the very valuable and increased work incident to its progress bring the bureau's amount for 1929 up to $2,246,055. In arriving at this increase a reduction must be taken from the 1928 figures of $200,000 for a power plant which was authorized during this year and which by its nature is not comparable to the scientific work undertaken and for which appropriations are made.

BUREAU OF LIGHTHOUSES

There has been a total increase in the bureau's appropriation included in the bill for the next fiscal year (1929) of $468,000, bringing the total to $11,145,250. With the exception of the amount for public works, the appropriations remain practically the same as for 1928. There have been increases of $9,700 and $6,300, respectively, in the salaries of employees on Lighthouse Service vessels and Lighthouse Service. For public works, there has been an increase of from $609,000 to $1,100,000 for vessels, and a reduction of from $638,000 to $622,000 in other works. The distribution of the amounts recommended for public works is as follows:

Item No.	Project	Amount requested	Item No.	Project	Amount requested
1	Vessels	$1,100,000	10	Lansing Shoal	$80,000
2	Hudson River	25,000	11	North Manitou Shoal	75,000
3	Upper Chesapeake Bay	40,000	12	Muskegon	37,200
4	Inland Waterway	10,000	13	Frankfort	4,800
5	Tampa Bay	17,000	14	Alaska	15,000
6	Southwest Pass	45,000	15	Grays Harbor	25,000
7	Replacing fog signals	40,000	16	Goat Island	15,000
8	Straits of Mackinac	90,000	17	Santa Barbara	5,000
9	St. Marys River	25,000	18	Honolulu	58,000

The explanation of the 18 items contemplated, amounts for which are shown above, is shown in detail in the hearings before the committee.

COAST AND GEODETIC SURVEY

The appropriations for the Coast and Geodetic Survey have run along about the same for the past several years, except for several amounts necessary for the construction of vessels, one amount for which, of $408,000, was contained in the 1928 deficiency act.

IMMIGRATION SERVICE

Now, I want to say a word to you about the Immigration Service. Your committee this year took a trip around the rim of the United States, visiting our neighbors on the border lines to the north and to the south. Our particular mission was to make a study of the immigration situation. I am pleased to report to the House that we found things almost to our entire satisfaction. The new border patrol, which was created a year or so ago, is a marvelous institution. It is composed largely of ex-service men, men of large experience, brave, fearless, and capable of managing any situation that might be met on the border. They are gentlemen; they are fine-appearing men in uniform; they are sober and honest and industrious; and to my mind they form one of the finest bodies of men that I have seen anywhere. They are scattered all along the border.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. That is in what department?

Mr. SHREVE. The Department of Labor. It is my opinion, and I think the committee will agree with me, that the number of men coming clandestinely over the ocean has been greatly reduced and the men coming across the border to the north and to the south is very small, comparatively. If you take away this patrol, as the Secretary told our committee, the situation would be vastly different. During July and August the border patrol at San Antonio turned back 1,500 people. They had 500 more that they sent to the customs office and to the immigration office. Of course, the number is not so great in other places, but it shows that the patrol is doing the work. We have increased the appropriation; we have increased it for two or three reasons. The first is that these men ought to get better pay, and, secondly, we want to establish a higher class, with greater compensation. We are going to give them a few extra men also.

Mr. NEWTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. SHREVE. Yes.

Mr. NEWTON. The gentleman was out in Minnesota along the main portion of the northern border, but the time at the disposal of the committee would not permit their visiting the Pigeon River station, north of Duluth. It so happened that I spent some time up there and that I know something of the work of the border patrol at the Pigeon River station, which is on the main highway, but with no railroad there at all.

The men are at work there very long hours throughout the entire season, extending through the night. I am glad that provision is made for additional money, because some of these men have had no increase of pay at all, and they rather think they were out so far that the committee had forgotten them, since the committee had visited other points.

Mr. SHREVE. We did not go there because it would have required two more days.

Mr. NEWTON. They made one arrest when I was up there in another part in September, where a man was picked up in the woods about 15 miles from the highway. I may say they are very alert.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHREVE. Certainly.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I find you have increased the salaries of the higher-grade inspectors. Part of this fund is to be used also to increase the salaries of some of the lower grades?

Mr. SHREVE. Yes; that is true.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I want to call attention to the condition of the men in other grades. I happened to be connected with this service 20 years ago. Some of these men in the lower grades are getting only about $100 or $200 a year more than they were getting 20 years ago. They are all specialists in their work, and they are not being paid in commensurate relation to the pay that is given to men in New York City doing similar work. Some of the laborers and employees down there are simply getting starvation wages. It is certainly not becoming for this Government to pay such low wages. I fear that after the $60,000 increase has been largely expended but little will be left for those of the lower grades.

Mr. SHREVE. Well, we are making just as rapid progress as we can under the limitations imposed upon us. We are doing the best we can.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That may be true, but in the meantime these people have to eat, their children have to be clad, they have to pay rent, and surely we ought to do something for them.

Mr. SHREVE. There is another service in the Bureau of Immigration about which, perhaps, I should say something. We found that the deportation service was only rendering service during eight or nine months of the year. There is a great deal of talk over the country about people who should be sent back. They are here and everywhere, although I am inclined to think there are not as many as it is claimed there are. It is stated there are 100,000 in penal institutions. Many of those would not be subject to deportation. However, we felt inclined to keep that machinery working the whole year around, so we are giving them $200,000 more to add to their deportation squad. So you may expect that instead of having 12,000 deported during the next year it will be around 14,000 or 15,000.

Mr. W. T. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHREVE. Yes.

Mr. W. T. FITZGERALD. May I ask the gentleman what the average cost is of deporting one of these aliens?

Mr. SHREVE. It is hard to tell, but it runs into considerable money.

Mr. BACHMANN. If the gentleman will permit, Mr. White was before the Immigration Committee this morning, and that same question was asked of him. I think he said that the average cost was about $87, but to deport to China the highest cost was $300.

Mr. SHREVE. It runs all the way from $100 to $300. There is one more thing I ought to bring to the attention of the House, and that is the helium situation.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Before the gentleman proceeds with that, may I ask a question as to the Mexican border. How well is that guarded, and do we provide any more in this bill for enforcing the immigration law along the Mexican border?

Mr. SHREVE. That is being taken care of in splendid shape. I have just referred to the San Antonio situation down there, and we are strengthening that service wherever it is necessary, but the Mexican border is being taken care of.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. The gentleman believes there are not many crossing the border?

Mr. SHREVE. Not very many. If they get across they are caught. One thousand nine hundred of them in three months were picked up at San Antonio, and then there were 500 more, making about 2,400 all told. We are perfectly satisfied with the situation on the southern border.

Mr. BACHMANN. I understand that $200,000 of an increase was asked this year.

Mr. SHREVE. No; we have just given $200,000 for deportation.

Mr. BACHMANN. How much was requested this year?

Mr. SHREVE. All told, for the Immigration Service a total of $7,110,000, an increase of $575,000.

Mr. BACHMANN. There was some discussion before the Immigration Committee along those lines.

Mr. SHREVE. During our hearings an additional or supplemental estimate of $235,000 was submitted which was granted, making the total increase for 1929 over 1928 $575,000.

Mr. BACHMANN. So there is an increase this year of about $200,000?

Mr. SHREVE. No; a total increase, including the supplemental estimate of $235,000, of $575,000.

Mr. GIBSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHREVE. Yes.

Mr. GIBSON. I notice in the hearings an increase of $207,000 for the construction, repair, and improvement of immigration stations.

Mr. SHREVE. Yes.

Mr. GIBSON. That does not contemplate the building of any stations?

Mr. SHREVE. No; that is to fix up Ellis Island. They have to have some heating work done there; their plumbing is bad, and they have to have some repairs made there. It is principally for Ellis Island.

Mr. GIBSON. Does the gentleman know of any survey that has been made for the purpose of determining a uniform type of immigration building to be erected along the borders?

Mr. SHREVE. No; we have not gotten that far along.

Mr. GIBSON. I want to say to the gentleman that along our northern border some one representing some of the departments at Washington appeared this summer to make a survey, and I just wondered under what department that matter would come.

Mr. SHREVE. I am glad the gentleman mentioned that. I would like to see the day when we would have a line of Government buildings along the border that would be a credit to this great country of ours.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to inform the gentleman that he has consumed one hour.

Mr. SHREVE. I thank the Chair and I yield myself another hour or so much as is necessary.

Mr. GIBSON. Will the gentleman yield for an observation?

Mr. SHREVE. Yes.

Mr. GIBSON. I want to heartily indorse all the gentleman has said with respect to the border patrol. I want to commend the committee for its activity in making a trip along the border, although it had a strenuous day in Vermont.

Mr. SHREVE. We had a very enjoyable day in Vermont, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. GIBSON. Will the gentleman tell us as to conditions along the northern border with respect to the enforcement of the immigration law?

Mr. SHREVE. We found conditions along the border, with respect to the enforcement of the immigration law, very satisfactory. There were a few places, perhaps, where the service needed some strengthening. In Buffalo the building of the new Peace Bridge, perhaps, has brought about easy access between the two countries, and it is possible that there we shall have to strengthen it a little; then at Detroit and at one or two other places. But, on the whole, I am very glad to say we are well satisfied with the situation we found.

Mr. GIBSON. Is it not true that the Government is securing the services of high-grade, intelligent men in the enforcement of the immigration and customs law along the northern border?

Mr. SHREVE. Oh, yes; they are the finest kind of men.

Mr. HUDSPETH. May I ask the gentleman how he found conditions on the southern border?

Mr. SHREVE. I am very pleased to say to the gentleman that we found conditions on the southern border very much improved since I was there before, some two years ago.

Mr. HUDSPETH. That has been my observation.

Mr. SHREVE. Really, we were very pleased with the improvement.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I am very glad to hear the chairman of the committee make that statement.

Mr. SHREVE. I am not inclined to think any large number of Mexicans are coming across the border down in the gentleman's part of the country.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I do not think so either, I will say to my friend—illegally.

HELIUM

Mr. SHREVE. I would now like to say a word about helium. This is a subject in which everybody is deeply interested because we supply helium for the Army and the Navy and their consumption now is about 1,000,000 feet a month, which would be 12,000,000 feet a year.

The helium situation may change overnight. You can make a plan for one day and to-morrow you may have to change it. Last year we had the Petrolia field. The Nocono field was a new project which it was pointed out to us would take care of our requirements of helium, and we were asked to authorize the construction of a pipe line. They had a rock pressure up there of 315 pounds. Some new wells were drilled and the gas was piped off in other directions, and the next thing they knew the thing began to fall down and fall down until we found we only had a pressure of 178 pounds, which would not be sufficient to guarantee the building of a pipe line. I am pleased to say that the men in charge over in the Bureau of Mines used their good judgment, and although there was an authorization by Congress to build the pipe line, they did not construct it.

Mr. COLTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHREVE. Yes.

Mr. COLTON. Can the gentleman tell us what progress has been made in the purchase of lands supposed to contain helium?

Mr. SHREVE. I will come to that in a moment.

After they had practically abandoned the Nocono field, they were still operating the Petrolia field, which leads into Fort Worth, and last year they thought this field was about exhausted; but they began to give it some study and working over, and they produced about an average of one-half million feet a month. Sometimes it ran a little over that and sometimes a little less. Now the bureau is working on a new field, with every prospect of success.

Mr. COLTON. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. SHREVE. Yes.

Mr. COLTON. I understand that certain public lands have been reserved because they have helium-bearing gases?

Mr. SHREVE. That is true. The reserves have been set aside with the idea of conserving the rights of the United States in all minerals, but particularly with relation to helium.

Mr. COLTON. Has the committee any information as to the investigations made to determine the extent of this gas on these reserves?

Mr. SHREVE. The Bureau of Mines is working in conjunction with the Geological Survey, and all their test wells and everything are put down at the instance of their advisers. They are working in harmony, but there has been no report made that would answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. COLTON. It would hardly seem necessary or hardly the part of wisdom to go and buy lands until we explore these public lands.

Mr. SHREVE. They do not do that. Nobody in the Government would think of doing that. It is always tested out to the last analysis before anything is bought, and then there is the question of whether they buy any of the land or not. The Government does business just the same as the gentleman would do business or any other business man.

Mr. COLTON. I notice the appropriation for this purpose has been cut down.

Mr. SHREVE. That is because it is not necessary. We are carrying all that is necessary.

Mr. ARENTZ. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. SHREVE. Yes.

Mr. ARENTZ. Is the amount of money appropriated for the promotion of mining investigations the amount requested by the Bureau of Mines?

Mr. SHREVE. That is the amount requested. Everybody seems perfectly satisfied, and they are getting along all right with it.

Mr. ARENTZ. And during the current year they have about all they can properly use?

Mr. SHREVE. Yes.

Mr. ARENTZ. I think this is a very important field.

Mr. SHREVE. Very important.

Mr. ARENTZ. And also the field mentioned by the gentleman from West Virginia, the investigation of falling roofs and of accidents due to bad roofing.

Mr. SHREVE. We gave them a little money to make that study some time ago.

Mr. ARENTZ. There is only about $20,000 or $25,000 added to that, I imagine?

Mr. SHREVE. Yes.

Mr. ARENTZ. But it is a very important study, because nearly all accidents and casualties come from that cause.

Mr. SHREVE. Yes.

Mr. COLTON. And the gentleman's committee has increased the amount to be used by the Bureau of Mines for the investigation.

Mr. SHREVE. Yes.

I thank you, gentlemen. [Applause.]

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN].

SUBMARINES

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman and fellow members of the committee, the press of yesterday contained what purported to be an interview with my good friend and colleague from New York, Major LAGUARDIA, in which he is quoted as having used the following language:

> I for one will recommend the House of Representatives that it shut up talking about the S–4. I shall recommend that more submarines of that type be built by the Navy as soon as possible.

Not that I think that silence is the proper method of treating the subject when we stand to-day in the shadow of a calamity that is casting a veil of gloom over the entire country, but I do say that it is to be regretted that the gentleman did not follow his own recommendation. For within 24 hours after he gave the interview to the newspaper he took up nearly half an hour on the floor yesterday talking on the very theme he would foreclose to others. The gentleman from New York is original. I like him; he has a charm of personality which makes friends and a brilliant mind which makes him a valuable Member of this House. But since he has undertaken to lecture his colleagues, I feel that the barriers are down and the gentleman must not complain if we come back at him.

He talked for 25 minutes as the defender and apologist of the Navy. That is a new rôle for him, because in my years of experience in this House I think that is the first occasion that he ever took the part of defending anything or anybody. His usual rôle is that of attack, and I want to tell the gentleman that the rôle of attack is better suited to his character. He might have made a better job of his speech if he had tried rather to express the revulsion that perhaps every man in this House and every red-blooded man and woman in the country feel in the shadow of this great calamity.

What prompted this change of rôle? The paper said that he went to Provincetown. Why did he go to Provincetown? To see a reed shaken by the wind? He went there gratuitously to investigate the sinking of the submarine. He confesses that he has no knowledge of the subject. He went there to learn; and think of the school he went to in order to get his information. He went to the men who are largely responsible for the very conditions which brought about this terrible catastrophe.

But, aside from that, I suppose they entertained him nicely and treated him with distinguished consideration. He comes back converted to the methods of the bureaucrats in Washington who have been proclaiming for years that it is impossible to do anything to make submarines safe; that they are essentially war vessels, and that all safety appliances must be subordinated to military uses. The gentleman now tells us on this floor that nothing could be done to save the submarine; that nothing can be done to salvage her; that nothing could have been done by way of appliances or safety devices to prevent this disaster.

Why is he so confirmed in his belief that the Navy has been doing the best thing? Was it because they treated him so nicely? If that is so, he need not be flattered by the distinguished attention he received. That is a common thing with the Navy, nowadays.

They are frantic for experts to confirm their contentions. A couple of weeks ago they entertained a garage keeper with distinguished consideration as "an expert." They found that he had never seen a submarine before his visit to Provincetown. There was an expert, indeed! I am wondering whether my friend and colleague wants to have himself put in that category.

I am reminded of an unpublished stanza of Maud Muller.

> I am Captain Jinks of the submarine,
> And aviator in between;
> An admiral I might have been
> If I had joined the Navy.

[Laughter and applause.]

But, aside from his qualifications the gentleman's defense was entirely futile. It answered an indictment that did not exist. It purported to defend the divers and those in charge of the divers at Provincetown who were making such sacrifices in behalf of their fellowmen.

No one, except the Navy bureaucrats, have even remotely intimated that there was any fault to be found with the divers or with the men engaged in salvage operations. Nobody charges them with neglect. They are acting the part of Americans—brave, noble, devoted men—and petty bureaucrats can neither brighten nor tarnish their glory, nor the credit due them by any gratuitous praise which they now belatedly render to them.

Certain swivel-chair men in the Navy Department answered the cry of indignation which swept over the land by sounding the praises of the officers and men engaged in the work of salvage. That, of course, was only drawing a red herring across the trail—an old trick of those whose consciences disturb them. My colleague now takes up the strain—and the joke of it is, that even while he was talking and insisting that the Navy had done everything possible and that there was no need of further investigation, the President's message suggesting an investigation was reposing calmly on the Speaker's desk waiting to be sprung by my good friend, the chairman of the Naval Affairs Committee.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Has the gentleman observed the attitude of the public mind in this whole situation to be, as we in New York gather it—namely, that there has grown up in our country this bureaucratic crowd, as you call it, in the Navy, as well as the Army, or what somebody has referred to as our militaristic caste in the United States, which has gotten into the habit of treating the American people condescendingly, curtly, and even discourteously, in effect telling them that it is "none of their business" what happens to submarines or other instruments of warfare. In this particular instance of the S–4, this supercilious caste which has grown up in our Army and Navy has gone one step too far. They may hold Congress in disdain, but not the people. When they told the public in a most discourteous manner that it was none of their business what happened to submarines or the lives of our boys in a submarine the public was quick to resent it. A keen observer will now notice that these "superior" persons have drawn into their shells and have somewhat abandoned their patronizing and defiant attitude.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I have many intimations from many sources, through a very large correspondence, tending to show that the attitude of the American people is very resentful. The reason for that is that the recent accident to the S–4 was not the first in our Navy. On March 25, 1915, the F–4 sank outside of Honolulu, and 21 brave sailors lost their lives. It took weeks to locate the vessel, and when they found her they fumbled around with all sorts of expedients and experiments in attempts to raise her. Finally, they had to send to San Francisco for pontoons to be made. When they brought the pontoons to Honolulu there were no rings, eyelets, bolts, shackles, or anything on the exterior of the vessel to which the pontoons could be attached. They had to get a diver from New York to travel all of the way to Honolulu, and he, with others, went down to the bottom of the sea and with hydraulic pumps excavated channels underneath the submarine through which to pass the lifting chains. The divers waddled around in the mud and silt for days.

The chains having been pulled up around the submarine and securely fastened, the next arduous and even dangerous task was to sink the pontoons and attach them to the chains. That accomplished, the next step was to pump out the water from the pontoons, in order that they might exert their lifting power to bring the wreck to the surface. The tedious process took months of anxious and arduous labor.

On September 25, 1925, the S–51 went down off Block Island in a collision with the steamship City of Rome. The inquiry inevitably arises: Had the Navy done anything in the meantime to make such vessels safe? Had they put either shackles or bolts or eyelets or rings on the surface of the submarines to which pontoons might even be attached? Even if they did feel that it was impossible to lift the submarine from the bottom by a direct lift, did they do anything to expedite and facilitate the attachment of either chains or the pontoons to the submarine? Nothing!

Mr. SOMERS of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes.

Mr. SOMERS of New York. In view of the fact that this is an unusually dangerous instrument for the operators, does not the gentleman believe that we might better direct our attention here to trying to bring about an agreement among the nations of the world to outlaw this vicious instrument?

Mr. GRIFFIN. I shall take that up a little later, if the gentleman will permit. I want to follow out the cause of these accidents and see how far the Navy has gone in the direction of safeguarding these vessels, or whether they made any effort whatever to make them safe.

My own opinion, answering the question of the gentleman, is that they can be made safe; but the Navy persistently, obstinately, refuses to make them safe, because they are wedded to the notion that they are military devices, and that as military devices life-saving considerations should be made subordinate to their military purpose. Yet I have never heard of any of the admirals who go to sea in battleships or cruisers getting rid of the life rafts, the life preservers, or the radio system, or the oscillators, or the other devices they have to render navigation secure. Why should the submarine be put in this anomalous, peculiar position of being purposely made unsafe?

That is what I am trying to get at—that they are purposely made unsafe. I wonder if it is possible that these Navy gentlemen think as Admiral Melville thought in 1905, that if the submarine is made an effective naval vessel the appropriations for battleships and cruisers and destroyers will cease. Admiral Melville deliberately made that statement in 1907 when he complained that Congress had refused to make appropriations for battleships because in the same session they had made an appropriation for submarines. I wonder if that thought lingers still in their minds.

Take the period between 1915, when the F–4 sank, and 1925, when the S–51 sank. Not a blessed thing was done in all those 10 years to render those vessels safe or to safeguard their crews.

My complaint is that they have failed to install the devices which foreign nations have tested and found effective. First of all are the shackles, or rings, or eyelets. I am using many terms to describe what I mean, because the Navy does the same thing. It seems to me there ought to be some way of attaching such devices without interfering with the mobility of the vessel. I am speaking advisedly, because I have letters and personal assurances from men who have been engaged in the construction and operation of submarines. I have here a letter now, and as there is no inhibition against making it public, I will read it:

> Please permit me to congratulate you on your sensible and patriotic stand in regard to the investigation of the sinkings of the S–51 and the S–4. Had your very practical suggestions been carried out after the loss of the S–51 I am sure lives would have been saved in the S–4.
> There are many safety devices which is possible to incorporate in the present and future designs of submarines at nominal cost.

Who is this man? He tells in the next paragraph. He says:

> I speak from experience, as after graduation from the Naval Academy I commanded various naval submarines, and was for a period of five years trial captain for the Lake Torpedo Co. of Bridgeport, Conn. Later I went into commercial salvage work, and when the United States entered the war took command of the salvage steamer Favorite to France and was on duty there as the wreck master of the United States naval forces in France.
>
> Anything I can do to further the cause of practical improvement with a view to making impossible a repetition of a disaster like the S–4, I will gladly do.
>
> Again assuring you of my admiration for your stand on this matter and with holiday greetings, I am
>
> Respectfully yours,
> SLOAN DANENHOWER.

That is an example of scores of letters I have received from men in the service. You will find that although the men are brave and courageous and will take risks, they do most certainly feel that they ought not to be compelled to take risks that are absolutely unnecessary.

Nothing was done between 1915, when the F–4 was lost, taking a toll of 21 lives, and September 25, 1925, when the S–51 was sunk, with a toll of 33 lives—a period of 10 years. Why? Because certain men in a certain Navy bureau are wedded to routine and to conservatism. They have never in the last 12 years accepted a suggestion, particularly from the outside, or given a welcome to any proposal to make submarines safe, or to safeguard their crews. They keep up the constant refrain, "It can't be did; it can't be did." Are they katydids? The need of the hour is for men who will not say, "It can't be did," but men who will say, "It can be done."

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. Can the gentleman tell us to what extent the submarines of foreign nations employ these safety devices that he mentions?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes. I will go into that directly. In the first instance, there is a safety signal telephone buoy, with which foreign submarines are equipped, which may be released when the vessel meets with disaster or is upon the bottom, or even for purposes of communication while they are engaged in tests or trials. This buoy, when released, floats to the surface and bobs upon the water. A passing vessel noticing this buoy, which is well known to belong to the Navy, a boat is lowered, an officer goes over, opens it, takes out a telephone and immediately puts himself into communication with the stricken crew.

That is not a new device. It was in use on the U–3, the German submarine, which sank in Kiel Harbor January 17, 1911. Her signal buoy was promptly released; a vessel passing noticed it. It was opened; telephone communication was established. They learned that it was the U–3, with 27 men and 3 officers on board. Assistance was called and an attempt made to raise her. She was equipped with eyelets. The salvage vessel was unable to make the dead lift, so they compromised by raising one end, and 27 of the crew escaped through the torpedo tube. The officers could have escaped also, but they were wedded to the tradition of their Navy to stick by the ship, and they stuck to their posts. Later on the chain broke which held the submarine in that inclined position and she dropped back, and these heroic officers suffered death at their post of duty.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. What depth of water was that?

Mr. GRIFFIN. I can not recall the depth.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That is very important.

Mr. GRIFFIN. The S–4's length is 231 feet and she sank in 102 feet of water. If we had had adequate devices, such as the Germans seem to have had as far back as 1911, there would have been nothing in the world to prevent hooking chains on to her bow and lifting her, so that the torpedo tube would rise above the surface of the water and allow the men to escape by that means.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Has the gentleman figured how much lift it would be?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Well, yes. I note that the gentleman in his remarks yesterday spoke of the S–4 as weighing 800 tons. Her actual weight is somewhat over 1,000 tons, but in any submarine of this character, divided into compartments, unless all of the compartments are flooded, the net lift is very much lessened.

On the S–51, two years ago, they began salvaging operations immediately after she sank. They had to get the pontoons from New York. Why did they not have pontoons at the submarine station where they belonged? They sent divers down who consumed 65 diving days at their work. Doing what? Simply trying to dig holes under the submarine to get chains around it. They finally got chains around it and they sank eight pontoons. The capacity of these pontoons was 80 tons each. Now, if the gentleman will give me his attention, I will explain just what that means. Commander Ellsburg, whose report I have on the salvaging of the S–51, reported that there was a net lift on the S–51 of only 650 tons. A part of her compartments were not filled with water. Now, for 650 tons they used eight pontoons having a lift of 80 tons each.

Nobody can tell me that a lift of 80 tons or even a hundred tons is too great a strain to put upon the hull of a submarine, provided it is properly secured to the frame. There is no use of going into the figures of stress and strain and strength of material, but I will give you one simple illustration. No one would think of throwing the burden of the lift on one grappling ring or eyelet or of putting all the lift of 650 tons, if that is her buoyancy or net lift, on one chain. Common sense dictates that the load be distributed, because distribution of the lift distributes the strain. Therefore put a dozen eyelets on the hull if necessary. It is perfectly practicable to put such a device upon the hull of a submarine. If it is necessary to have her hull like the skin of an eel, inset or countersink the eyelets.

In the case of the S–51 there was a strain upon each of the chains of only 80 tons. With tackle having the capacity to lift 120 tons, which was within the possibilities, they could very easily, if they had had shackles on the bow of the vessel, have attached them and raised her bow.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Of course, it would be ideal to raise the bow of the vessel, as the gentleman suggests, but has the gentleman taken into consideration the depth of water in which the hull is now as well as the pull necessary to raise the bow of the vessel?

Mr. GRIFFIN. I have gone into that very thing.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. If that is so, what derrick is there in this country that could have done it?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five additional minutes.

Mr. GRIFFIN. That is just the thing in a nutshell. The gentleman talks of derricks! Did you see the pictures in the paper of the derricks they brought out there to salvage this submarine? Flat hulks with derricks on them; they are a disgrace to any navy that uses such obsolete methods. Why did they not have salvage vessels? What has the Navy ever done to recommend the building of salvage vessels? Nothing! I besought them two years ago, when the S–51 was wrecked, to request Congress to authorize the construction of salvage vessels such as are used in foreign navies.

Now, what are these salvage vessels? They are simply big hulks of catamarans with tremendous displacement, sufficient to lift any submarine that has ever been built or will be built for some years to come—with cranes and all the apparatus necessary to distribute the weight on the different parts, so that it would be perfectly possible to lift a submarine if it had shackles attached to its hull, or even shackles or eyelets to which pontoons could be quickly attached. Is that a dream? Is that my imagination? Germany has the Vulcan. France has another salvage ship of that kind. Italy has the largest of them all, and I am sure would have been glad to have loaned it to us in our trouble. What a shame that we should at this good hour and in this civilized day be compelled to confess our inadequacy and our inefficiency where human life is at stake!

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Does the gentleman believe the Vulcan could have lifted the S–4?

Mr. GRIFFIN. No; but she could easily have lifted one end of her, the same as she did with the U–3.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But the U–3 was a very much smaller boat and was in much shallower water, and that makes a lot of difference.

Mr. GRIFFIN. The depth was not of so much consequence—the net lift was only a couple of hundred tons.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But it was not in 100 feet of water, as the gentleman knows.

Mr. GRIFFIN. What is the use of arguing those things. I do not happen to know the exact depth and neither does he. I can only say where there is a will there is a way. If a submarine sinks in a depth where one end of her can be brought to the surface, there ought to be vessels large enough, big enough, and with appliances strong enough to at least lift one end. I am modest and that is all I am asking.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Does the gentleman believe such a vessel could be lifted at a depth of 400 feet?

Mr. GRIFFIN. They have not sunk as yet in 400 feet.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. But the ocean is more than 400 feet.

Mr. GRIFFIN. That leads to another question. If any should happen to sink in a place where such an ocean depth prevails, there would be no hope unless there were means of escape for the crew before the vessel reached that depth. That has its possibilities, too. But we are now speaking of the accidents with which we have so far had experience—the S–51, which sunk in 134 feet of water, and the S–4, which sunk in 104 feet of water.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. I do not think the gentleman has told us whether or not the German submarine U–3 had a hook or shackle on it?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes; she did—a number of them.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. And that is the way they did lift it?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes; that is correct.

Mr. ROMJUE. Can the gentleman state how far the vessel was from the coast at the point where it sank? I believe it was in 104 feet of water, but how far was it from the coast at Provincetown?

Mr. GRIFFIN. I do not know the exact distance, but it seemed to me from looking at the map that it must have been about a mile or mile and a half.

Mr. ROMJUE. From the pictures I noticed in the papers it was apparently very close.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. Do I understand that the gentleman brought to the attention of the Navy Department the feasibility or the advisability of installing these devices and they turned the gentleman down?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Absolutely.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. When?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Oh, repeatedly; for instance, in my speech in the House here two years ago. That was public notice to everybody and the department knew about it.

Mr. JACOBSTEIN. It seems inconceivable they should not have brains enough to employ these devices.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Remember, too, that I am only speaking of well-known devices that are in use in foreign navies. In addition to the grappling rings or eyelets, there is the signal buoy and there is the smoke bomb to indicate when a vessel is about to arise.

Mr. DENISON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. I have an indistinct recollection of one of the Japanese submarines being sunk rather recently; has the gentleman any information about that?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes.

Mr. DENISON. How many lives were lost on that submarine?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has again expired.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I wonder if I would be warranted in asking a little more time, as there seems to be much interest in this matter.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I yield the gentleman five additional minutes.

Mr. DENISON. I would like to know in this connection, while the gentleman has the floor, why that vessel was not raised and whether or not they had the safety devices that the gentleman speaks about.

Mr. GRIFFIN. The Japanese have had three notable accidents beginning with April 15, 1910, when the submarine 6 sank, owing to a defective valve, and 14 lives were lost. On August 21, 1923, the submarine 70 of the Japanese Navy sank at Kobe base, Japan, and the cause was unknown. The death list was 85 men. On March 19, 1924, the Japanese submarine 43 sank after a collision, and 49 lives were lost.

Mr. DENISON. I am just wondering if there is a bureaucratic condition there which is responsible for that condition or whether they have these safety devices.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I never went into that. I have been so busy worrying about keeping our own house in order that I have never bothered with the Japanese problem.

I see I can not make headway consecutively. I did not anticipate talking so long on this subject; but I prepared an agenda for the consideration of the commission that I hope will be appointed pursuant to the President's suggestion.

I put in a resolution the day after the vessel sank asking for a special committee to consist of seven Members of this House, to investigate the disaster and to study the question of safety devices. I am glad the President has sent his message and has suggested the appointment of this commission. This indicates he has an interest in the subject, but my only regret is that he did not do this two years ago after the sinking of the S–51. I introduced my resolution then calling for this investigation and it has lain dormant and neglected. I reintroduced it the other day when the S–4 sank, and I still believe that an investigation by the membership of this House, sitting as a jury, where the experts could be heard and cross-examined would be a better way of learning the truth than to rely on any expert commission that might have a reason, through their Navy connection, to hide the true facts—in short, I think it would be much better to have us sit here and bring the experts to the Capitol instead of being obliged to await their pleasure in reaching their conclusion. I think we can rely upon the intelligence of this House to determine, when we get the facts, whether a certain thing is right or wrong.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. I want to congratulate the gentleman upon his presentation of this very interesting and important subject and also to commend him for his promptness in calling it to the attention of the House immediately after the accident. In connection with the gentleman's statement that the President has requesed an investigation, I am wondering if the gentleman noticed in this morning's Washington Post a paragraph from the pen of George Rothwell Brown, which says:

> It won't, I am sure, create any surprise that the President requests an investigation of the S–4 disaster, as it was plain to all eyes that Congress was going to insist on having one. The great knack in leadership is in knowing which street the parade is going to turn down.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I was going to go into the matter of the agenda for the commission, and my reason for bringing it up now is to indicate the avenues of research and the devices which are feasible and which have been tried out, as well as to indicate to the House that certain parties have been derelict in not having installed these devices. I may be somewhat premature, but here is my idea as to the scope of the inquiry:

AGENDA

(For the S–4 commission)

1. Was the S–4 equipped with an oscillator and auditory diaphragm to signal and receive signals and sounds of vessels moving in the vicinity?

2. Was this device in good condition?

3. Was it manned at the time of the accident?

4. Has the Navy Department issued any orders requiring a member of the crew of the submarine to be always on duty at this device while the vessel is submerged?

5. What orders of the Navy Department have been issued, if any, with respect to the attendance of a warning escort vessel while a submarine is navigating submerged?

6. What has become of the order of the Hon. Franklin Roosevelt, former Secretary of the Navy, respecting the installation of signal smoke bombs intended to warn shipping that a submarine is about to rise to the surface?

7. Were any such devices ever installed?

8. What is the status of the telephone signal buoy? Why were they removed and why have they not been restored?

9. What steps have been taken to install air inlets giving direct communication to each compartment of the submarine?

10. Why have not grappling rings, hooks, eyelets, or shackles been installed on submarines to facilitate their prompt raising either by pontoons or direct lifting tackle?

11. Why were not pontoons kept at the submarine base in the vicinity of the scene of submarine submerging practice?

12. What steps have been taken by the Navy to design appropriate salvage vessels equipped with all modern devices for prompt salvage of submarines in distress?

13. What steps have been taken by the Navy to study the operation of a certain diving suit devised in Germany and adopted by the navies of Germany, Holland, Denmark, Sweden, and Spain?

14. What steps have been taken by the Navy to provide an airlock escape chamber or a diving chamber such as is used in certain types of submarines?

15. Why can not such a submarine be employed in salvage operations where the divers can work on the sea bottom without disturbance from either wind or rain?

16. What steps have been taken by the Navy to install automatic double swing doors between the compartments of the submarine?

I am sure that if the commission digs into these matters it will make recommendations that will forever preclude the recurrence of such disasters as this, which shocked the Nation and the world.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its principal clerk, announced that the Senate insists upon its amendment to the bill (H. R. 483) entitled "An act authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to acquire certain lands within the District of Columbia to be used as sites for public buildings," disagreed to by the House of Representatives, agrees to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. KEYES, Mr. WARREN, Mr. FESS, Mr. REED of Missouri, and Mr. ASHURST to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The committee resumed its session.

DEPARTMENTS OF STATE, JUSTICE, COMMERCE, AND LABOR APPROPRIATION BILL, FISCAL YEAR 1929

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield to myself five minutes.

Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to make a statement at this time, and am now only led to do so in order to correct what might be construed as an indictment against the entire personnel of the Navy.

I am in accord with the commendable interest shown by the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN] to provide submarines with proper and adequate safety devices, also to provide funds for adequate salvage equipment that will aid in the prevention of loss of life and property resulting from disasters.

Since investigations have been ordered by the House of the sinking of the S–4, and full information will later be placed before the House relative to this matter, it occurs to me that all improvident statements should be avoided at this time. While I would not charge that the gentleman from New York has uttered any improvident statement in so far as showing interest in providing salvage and safety appliances for the Navy, yet when he undertakes to refer to "a bureaucracy" and impliedly to charge that the Navy as a whole is responsible for what he considers to be mistakes and omissions involving culpable negligence, I respectfully submit that his indictment is too broad. There are only a very few officers of the Navy to whom have been assigned in the past the work of constructing and designing submarines. The great number of naval officers could not in any way be held responsible for any mistakes or omissions that may have occurred relative to submarines.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I will.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I will say that I am very glad that the gentleman has modified my statement in that way, because I had in mind to qualify it myself. But I was indulging in a figure of speech when I said that the Navy as a whole was responsible. I am placing my condemnation on the men of the Navy who are responsible for the backward policy, and I think the gentleman knows that I did not mean to assail the Secretary of the Navy or the Admirals who are not responsible.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. That correction is in keeping with the accustomed fairness of the gentleman from New York, and I was sure that he had no desire to do injustice to a great service. No one would insist that the Navy has never made mistakes in the past. What service, whether we call it Government service or not, has not made mistakes? It is not unusual when any great catastrophe happens to hear the suggestion that adequate provision could and should have been made to avoid such a disaster. This has been said in reference to the great overflow of last year which resulted in the loss of many lives.

I feel that the inquiries which the House has already set in motion will later disclose who, if any, are to blame for not having provided safety devices for our submarines and better salvage equipment. Then again, the investigation will likely lead to another important step by placing the designing and construction of submarines in future under the control and direction of those officers of the Navy who have to man them and have manned them, and who are best qualified to correct mistakes in design or construction.

I am frank to say I have felt that perhaps in reference to the designing and construction of submarines we have not always given to that service the aid of those officers best qualified to perform this work. [Applause.] What we have done in reference to aircraft should be done in reference to submarines.

Now, in conclusion, I feel sure that my friend from New York will not take issue with me when I say that the personnel of the Navy, both officer and enlisted, in patriotism, ability, skill, courage, human sympathy, and human kindness are not surpassed by any like body of men. [Applause.] If mistakes have been made and it required a great disaster to accentuate them, we can feel assured that an intelligent effort will be made to do the things that should now be done in order to conserve human life when disasters come. [Applause.]

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA].

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, the difference between my colleague from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN] and myself is that I know that I am not an expert upon submarines. After his criticism and mild rebuke directed toward me for going up to Provincetown and looking around, I think this House was entitled to a more constructive and surely more accurate information on the subject from the submarine expert. As to my being lavishly entertained, let me tell the gentleman that if he will try 36 hours on a submarine in the North Atlantic on a cold January night, he will disabuse his mind of any elaborate entertainment. I had one meal with the crew, and the rest were four meals at 24 cents apiece. If going to the spot and talking with men who do know their business was the wrong thing for a Member to do, I plead guilty.

Mr. O'CONNOR of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Not now. I shall yield to the self-appointed leader of the Tammany delegation in this House in a moment. It is true, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN] says, that I have criticized the Navy in the past, and that in most instances I have assumed the attitude of attack on the floor of the House, but I have never once come before this House unless I knew what I was talking about, and I would not come before this House with any suggestions of lifting boats from the bottom of the ocean unless I knew something of the size, dimension, and structure of the boat, and unless I thoroughly understood the physics and mechanics involved in such an undertaking, which the gentleman has entirely ignored or overlooked in his suggestions of salvaging submarines, and I have never made such a childish, stupid, silly, unworthy charge as to say that the officers of the Navy have purposely made the submarines unsafe.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Why, they say that themselves.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That they have purposely made the submarine unsafe?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman has never heard a Navy officer say that in his life. It is ridiculous to say that officers of the Navy Department have purposely made unsafe their own vessels, in which they are bound to go from time to time, and to which their own comrades, classmates, and in many instances their sons are assigned.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Has not the gentleman seen the quotation in the newspaper recently, the authorship of which I think is by the head of the Bureau of Navigation and Construction, a certain Captain Rock, in which he says that these submarines are military vessels and that safety devices are not considered to be essential; that all safety devices must be subordinated to their military purpose?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Oh, that is entirely different from saying that the vessel is made purposely unsafe. That statement indicated that the function and particular service and purpose of a ship were the essentials. It is the same in aviation. A pursuit plane has a factor of safety of 3 to 1, while a passenger plane has a factor of safety of 6 or 7 to 1. A passenger plane has a gliding angle of about 5 to 1, while a pursuit plane has a gliding angle of 2 or 3 to 1. You must take into consideration the purpose for which the plane or the vessel is made. A submarine must submerge and must have speed. If we attach a lot of spangles and fangles to it so that it loses its necessary qualities then there is no purpose in having such a vessel.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I am glad to see that the gentleman has gotten back to the airplane.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes. At least I know something about that, and that is more than I can say of the gentleman with respect to the submarine. The gentleman compares the submarine U–3, which sank in the Kiel Harbor, with the S–51 and the S–4, but in reply to my inquiry he says that he does not know at what depth of water the U–3 sank. If the gentleman ignores the depth in which the vessel sinks, and seeks to make a comparison between a vessel in 40 feet of water and a vessel in 100 feet of water, then I submit to an elementary school class in physics whether or not such a comparison is of any value. Besides, this German U-boat was a much smaller craft. Besides, the compartments in this U-boat were not all flooded with water. That is why it was possible to lift one end of it.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Just one moment. Does the gentleman state that the U–3 sank in 40 feet of water?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I will say that it sank in 50 feet less of water than the S–4.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Is that a guess or it is an actual fact?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman knows, or he ought to know, because he made the comparison and he has just lifted the S–4 out of the water, just a few moments ago. He described how the German U-boat was lifted out, but he ignores entirely the conditions. The gentleman then says that he is going to apply shackles and eyelets and rings to submarines, and is going to lift them out under all circumstances, and when he is asked what he is going to do if it sinks in 300 feet of water, or 400 feet of water, he has no reply. Gentlemen, if a submarine sinks in 300 or 400 feet of water there is absolutely nothing that can be done. Divers can not work at that depth and therefore all the rings and hooks and eyelets would be of no avail. It so happened that the S–4 and the S–51 sank in comparatively shallow water. As long as we have navigation on the sea or under the sea or in the air, if my colleague from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN] will permit me again to refer to the air, accidents will happen. And again I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN] that he entirely overlooks the possibility of lifting eight hundred or a thousand tons out of a hundred feet of water. His own suggestion of having these hooks and rings and eyelets and shackles is for the purpose of making quick attachment and lifting the vessel out of the water. As I have already said, no one derrick or crane could do it. A crane or derrick with a lift of 200 tons would require an enormous float sufficient to carry it and stand the strain of such a lift. To get sufficient such floats at one spot they could hardly get close enough to the submerged body to effect a uniform lift. When the gentleman refers to pontoons, then, of course, so much time is required to get the pontoons to the site of the accident, to sink them, to blow the water out that all hope of completing such operations within time to save life in a submarine is entirely lost. Therefore, if the pontoons are the only method known at this time to lift a submarine and it being necessary for divers to go down to attach these submarines, all of which require several diving days, it is clear that hooks and rings and shackles and eyelets are not the solution. A submarine is a mass of intricate heavy machinery in a light hull. A ring or eyelet can not be attached simply to the hull of the vessel. Such an attachment would tear out the minute it is put under the strain of a pull. To apply these rings to large submarines would require an entirely new structure of the ship, and this at the cost of weight, space, speed, and a submarine at the present stage of the art has no such space or weight to spare. All of these matters have been under consideration and study for years.

The gentleman from New York referred to Commander Ellsberg, and I am sure that Commander Ellsberg will inform him that everything humanly possible was done for the S–4.

The gentleman from New York talks about the telephone buoy. Very well. You can use such appliances only under ideal conditions. The U–3 to which the gentleman refers was not sunk as the result of a collision as in the case of the S–4 and the S–51. Here we had a terrific collision. In one case by a large passenger boat, the City of Rome, and in this particular case by a large Coast Guard cutter steaming at 18 knots, and in such cases every appliance on board is put out of commission. We saw that in the ballast tank air tubes and in the compartment air tubes.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Does the gentleman mean to say that the S–4 and the S–51 did have this telephone buoy?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. No. I said that if it did have it, in all likelihood it would have been put out of commission. Besides, in the case of the S–4, as in the case of the S–51, there was no need of the telephone buoy, for the reason that the spot of the collision was known, and in the case of the S–4 communication was actually established with those still alive on board. And I must say again if a vessel sinks in very deep water such a signal or such communication is of no avail. Of course, if a suitable indicating and communicating buoy can be applied to a submarine and is of sufficient value to warrant its application, submarines should have them, but that is a matter for the experts to work out, and to date no such appliance has been perfected to that degree of accuracy and usefulness as to warrant censure for their absence on our vessels.

Now, we did have rings and shackles and eyelets on the smaller Holland boats, but they were of no avail and will be of no avail when the gentleman attaches his eyelets and rings and shackles on a boat and says he is going to send a derrick there to lift it. But he has not constructed that derrick yet. Does the gentleman know that the biggest derrick and crane on land in this country can lift no more than 200 tons? How is the gentleman going to build a derrick and float it and go out and lift a ship of 800 tons?

Mr. GRIFFIN. You do not need a derrick.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. How are you going to lift the ship?

Mr. GRIFFIN. The gentleman does not know?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I know he does not know. That is just the point. You can not have a tender, a derrick, and a salvage boat following every submarine. It is just as easy to require a squad of firemen to run under every aviator and catch him in a net if he falls down.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I would rather not.

Mr. BLANTON. In that connection I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Very well; go on.

Mr. BLANTON. Is it not reasonable to expect that in making the trial trip of a submarine, where the submarine is submerged and where one trial trip is following another, when one is completing a mile trial trip, that we should send a tender out to let other ships know where the submarine is? Is it not reasonable?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That has nothing to do with this argument. The gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN] bases his whole argument that we should have a——

Mr. BLANTON. When we were expecting the landing in Paris of Colonel Lindbergh that night no airship could fly in Washington except one, and that one was to notify the people here that afternoon of his safe arrival. That was a sane regulation. The Navy should have exercised not ordinary care, but the highest degree of care, in sending a tender over this mile course.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I do not yield further to the gentleman.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman's statement was rather remarkable.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I do not believe you are going to train men to maneuver a submarine if you are to have an escort to every submarine, because the presence of an escort destroys the very function of the submarine.

Mr. BLANTON. On a mile trial?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That is not practicable with a submarine.

Mr. BLANTON. The ship that struck the submarine had no knowledge of the submerged craft. They should have had knowledge that the other was there.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. That course was marked. There is a mark there that is used for that purpose, and that is notice to all navigators to look out for submarines at that point.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. May I have three minutes more?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for three minutes more.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. As to escort ships or warning ships to follow submarines the general consensus of opinion of submarine officers is that it is not necessary and of no service. In fact, Lieut. Frank Worden, who commands the S–8 and who has been in command and in the submarine service for several years and knows his job, goes further and says that such a ship would be a source of annoyance to the submarine. I want to say in passing that Lieut. Frank Worden was on the job a few hours after the accident, remained on constant duty without getting any sleep for days and days, and when he talks about submarines he knows what he is talking about. This gallant young officer hails from the State of Montana and was appointed several years ago to the Naval Academy by our colleague the gentleman from Montana, Mr. EVANS. I want to congratulate Mr. EVANS on his choice and appointment of this splendid young officer. Now, this is what Lieutenant Worden says about an accompanying or warning ship to follow a submarine:

> It would be just one more vessel to watch. As we were maneuvering it would be necessary to have the tender keep clear. I do not consider the presence of a tender necessarily desirable. No surface craft interfered with the S–8 during her tests. When they saw the periscopes they got out of the way.

What I reiterate now and what I said yesterday is that when a vessel sinks in deep water it creates a difficult problem involving many factors. When you have two vessels colliding with terrific force you have everything on board of the ship thrown out of gear. The question of rings and eyelets and shackles has been considered by the Navy Department. I am sure the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN] does not contend that it is his invention. Such a device has been used on small vessels, on submarines, but not on large vessels. No matter what salvage conditions you create, you can not salvage a ship in 300 or 400 feet of water, no matter what you do, even with pontoons. Pontoons are large, heavy, and clumsy and cumbersome. You can not have pontoons and salvage ships following every submarine. Assuming that you have eyelets and rings and shackles, it takes time to put those pontoons down, and you have to send divers down, and all that is a matter that can not be done within 60 days.

I think I have been fair in my criticisms on the floor of the House, and I repeat what I said the other day, that the Navy did in this instance all that was humanly possible; and I say again, as I said before, that it is easier to salvage a ship in the quiet of the House Office Building on paper, disregarding all matters of physics, weather, sea, mechanics, and equipment, than it is to do it on the spot under a hundred feet of water. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has again expired.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama is recognized.

NICARAGUA

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, following on the success of the American Revolution, the ferment of republicanism penetrated throughout the world. Kings shook on their thrones. Emperors and potentates trembled for their systems. France was the first to follow the example of the United States by overthrowing the Bourbons under Louis XVI. The Napoleonic wars were in a large measure the reflex of the shock which ensued, and were in their essential aspects the result of the efforts of the monarchs of Europe to defend their governmental systems.

Kings reigning by virtue of "divine right" felt that it was necessary that they do something to stamp out the republican spirit. They trembled for the traditions of monarchial government. There was conflict through the world between the spirit of republicanism and the monarchial system. Following the example of the United States, the Spanish-American colonies one by one had asserted their independence of Spain and she was being driven from the New World. At that juncture, in 1815, the "Holy Alliance" between the rulers of Austria, Prussia, and Russia came into being. Its essential purpose was to defend the monarchial system against the spirit of republicanism. It was the answer of "divine right" to the ferment of republicanism.

THE PURPOSE OF THE HOLY ALLIANCE

The Holy Alliance as a part of its program planned to restore the power of Spain in the New World and to again subject those colonies which had achieved their independence to the dominion of the King of Spain. It was also designed that new provinces and realms of power within the New World should be marked off to European sovereigns. In that sense the Holy Alliance was a threat to American independence.

As an answer to that threat and in order to clear the situation, Mr. Monroe enunciated the principle which has come to be known as the "Monroe doctrine." It was, in substance, that the United States would regard any attempt upon the part of the European governments to extend the monarchical system into the Western Hemisphere as an act of unfriendliness to the American Government. That is all the Monroe doctrine was at its beginning. It was merely an answer to the Holy Alliance. It confined itself to the principle that an attempt to extend monarchical systems of government in the Western Hemisphere was inconsistent with American interests; by its implication it extended merely to matters of sovereignty so far as American countries were concerned. It held, in short, that no European monarchy would be permitted to bring additional territory on the Western Hemisphere under its dominion nor to create upon the Western Hemisphere any new monarchical system.

It was not intended to interfere with existing situations. It did not challenge the dominion which Great Britain had over the islands of the West Indies as well as portions of South America and of Canada, nor the control which various European countries had over territory in the Western Hemisphere. It was confined solely to new situations and new attempts to extend monarchical systems and control over territory on this side.

MESSAGE OF PRESIDENT MONROE

The Monroe doctrine had its expression in President Monroe's message to Congress submitted on December 2, 1823. Russia was asserting claims upon Alaska and other territory in that part of the continent. Referring to these claims, President Monroe said:

> In the discussions to which this interest has given rise, and in the arrangements by which they may terminate, the occasion has been judged proper for asserting as a principle in which the rights and interests of the United States are involved that the American Continents, by the free and independent condition which they have assumed and maintained, are henceforth not to be considered as subjects for future colonization by any European powers.

In referring to conditions among the new Latin American Republics of South America, he said:

> We owe it, therefore, to candor and to the amicable relations existing between the United States and those powers to declare that we should consider any attempt on their part to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere as dangerous to our peace and safety. With the existing colonies or dependencies of any European power we have not interfered and shall not interfere. But with the governments who have declared their independence and have maintained it, and whose independence we have, on great consideration and on just principles, acknowledged, we could not view any interposition for the purpose of oppressing them or controlling in any other manner their destiny, by any European power, in any other light than as the manifestation of an unfriendly disposition toward the United States.

In these paragraphs was expressed all of the Monroe doctrine. One of its chief purposes was the protection of the new Latin American Republics. Of course, neither Monroe nor anyone of his time ever dreamed that it would ever be argued that the United States was assuming the duty of pacification, preserving public order, and policing our neighbor nations, nor of collecting foreign and American debts from them.

The Monroe doctrine recognized the full sovereignty of each of the Latin-American countries, and the full political equality of each of them with the United States. It claimed no superiority nor overlordship for ourselves, nor any greater right in any of the other countries than they had in our own. It claimed for the United States no right whatever to meddle with the internal affairs of our sister Republics. To the contrary, it was an assertion of their right to govern themselves, free from interference from European monarchies, as well as from ourselves.

It ought to be unnecessary to argue to intelligent and candid men that we have no more right nor authority under the Monroe doctrine to violate the territory or the sovereignty of a Latin-American Republic than we would have in the case of a European or Asiatic country. It was intended as a bulwark for the protection of our sister Republics, and not as an engine for their oppression.

WHAT MONROE DOCTRINE IS

No respectable authority has ever claimed that the Monroe doctrine conferred upon the United States any rights whatsoever. It was merely a declaration of our national policy, and has, of course, never attained the dignity of a rule of international law. Under it we owe no duty to take any action inconsistent with our national interests. We do not need to insist upon the doctrine longer than it suits our policy to do so, but many abandon it at any time without any breach of faith with other nations. Under it we owe no duty to protect the nationals or property or interests of European nations which may be jeopardized by a South American revolution. For all such we may remit the complainants to the assertion of their rights under the recognized principles of international law. European governments have the same rights under international law, with reference to South American Republics, as to other countries of the world. It gives the United States no protectorate over Central and South American Republics, nor duty to defend them from attack, and none to answer for their shortcomings.

The Latin-American Republics may go to war with each other or with nations of Europe or elsewhere without giving us cause to intervene. They are as completely sovereign and independent as we ourselves. The doctrine merely announces for us that we will not permit nations of the Eastern Hemisphere to encroach upon the sovereignty or territory of other American nations.

The meaning of the Monroe doctrine, as recently set forth by Secretary Hughes, is as follows:

> Properly understood, it is opposed (1) to any un-American action encroaching upon the political independence of American states under any guise, and (2) to the acquisition in any manner of the control of additional territory in this hemisphere by any un-American power.

Considering the intent of the message, and that it has been, and must be, interpreted in the light of changing circumstances and conditions, I do not believe that the correctness of Mr. Hughes's definition can be disputed.

ATTEMPTS TO EXPAND AND DISTORT DOCTRINE

Many attempts have been made to expand the Monroe doctrine, to contort it, and to twist it. It is important, in order to understand the persistency of these attempts, that we should recognize just what is back of them. It is necessary to recognize the fact that there are those here in our own country and among our own citizens who do not accept in their full implications the doctrines of republicanism and of democratic self-government. America has her fascists as well as Italy.

It is a common belief that all Americans were unanimous in their desire for independence. This is a grave error. It is a fact that a very influential element of our people were loyal to the British Crown and had no desire to change our political system, and had no wish to break the ties which bound them to the Old World. They did not believe in republicanism nor in self-government.

Many of these Loyalists and Tories were driven out as the Revolution went on. I wish that all might have gone and that they might have remained away. Unfortunately many of them came back when the war was ended. The strangest development in all American political history is that within 20 years after the close of the Revolution the same Tory elements which has opposed independence were found contending for political control against those who had won independence. That struggle between Tory elements, those who believed in caste and privilege, those who held that a small superior class should be developed which should ride at ease upon the shoulders of the masses—the struggle between the Tories, their political descendents the Federalists, and the modern school of the same political faith, on the one hand, and those who believed in real democracy, on the other, has come down to us to this day. That struggle between Toryism and Americanism is as acute to-day as it has ever been in the past. Much of the time the Tory elements have been in control of our Government. May I make what I mean perfectly clear by saying that in my judgment they are in control now. [Applause.]

WHAT THE TORIES ARE TRYING TO DO

The effort has been made to twist and contort the Monroe doctrine into an instrument which shall serve the will of the Tories, who do not believe in democracy—to serve their will in their efforts to mark off the Western Hemisphere as territory belonging exclusively to us, so that it shall be the field for our exclusive exploitation, and in which we shall expand as we may find it convenient and safe to do so. They dream dreams of world power; they think of imperial Rome and would make America into a new Rome. They think of South America not as a collection of independent nations, entitled under our own principles to enjoy the right of self-government; to the contrary, they think of South America as an appendage of the United States. It is their conscious design, so far as they have a consciousness, little by little and time by time as they may be able to digest them, to swallow up and absorb the South American countries, so that our flag may float from pole to pole.

That is their degraded idea of America's future. They would absorb these weak countries without their consent; they would take them through our military power and through the might of the strong arm.

In the meantime they choose to regard Central and South America as a field in which our business men and financiers shall enjoy special and exclusive rights and privileges. There they shall have exclusive advantages of trade; they shall have concessions for opening mines, digging harbors, constructing railroads, and making loans; it shall be the happy hunting ground of the American manufacturer and trader, and of the American financier and international banker, and the toiling millions of Central and South America shall exist not upon terms of equality with us but as servile populations, to be exploited for our economic benefit.

THE SHADOW OF IMPERIALISM

It is necessary to get this picture in our minds in order to understand the efforts which the Tories have made to expand and extend and contort and twist the Monroe doctrine until finally it shall be converted into such an instrument that it will serve them in the purposes which they have in their hearts. Theirs are the principles of imperialism. Theirs is the doctrine which the nations of the Old World have applied in their own peculiar spheres of influence. Under its influence the British flag floats over India and over many other portions of the world; under it France holds her territory in Africa, Asia Minor, and China, and so on and on and on.

Because of the clash of interests between the great imperialistic and exploiting nations the world had the recent terrible war. With all the folly of man apparently we have learned nothing from its horrors and are now preparing the way for another war based upon cold commercial considerations, and a desire to get control of more territory that we may exploit it and make money out of it and grow rich and powerful out of it.

It is to combat this awful thought, to combat these dreadful schemes that I feel such a great interest in the developments which are taking place to-day in Nicaragua.

I hear gentlemen speak of the "right" of one nation to land troops upon the soil of another nation for the protection of the lives and property of its nationals. There is no such right. International law knows of no such thing. It is not a "right," it is merely a practice. It is a practice indulged in only by those who are strong enough to be able to do so with safety to themselves; only by those who are powerful enough to be able to violate the territory of another nation without fear of adequate rebuff and reprisal. It is the practice followed by the great and powerful nations in dealing with those who are weak and poor and subject to them.

Within the history of the world, in either ancient or modern times, no nation of first rank has ever submitted to the assertion of any such right within its territory upon the part of any other nation whatsoever. When I hear men talk of such "rights" I recognize that they are lacking either in information or in candor.

There is no such "right." It is a "practice," I admit. Whether a justifiable practice each particular case must stand on its own merits and it is not possible to condemn it by wholesale. Suffice it to say, Mr. Chairman, that having accomplished the protection of its nationals and of their property, no one has ever been so rash and regardless of logic and consistency as to say that a nation may go further, and after having protected the lives and property of its nationals, go on and remain indefinitely in the country whose sovereignty has been infringed upon.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five additional minutes.

PRESIDENT CARRYING ON AN UNCONSTITUTIONAL WAR

Mr. HUDDLESTON. We entered Nicaragua upon the pretended purpose of protecting the lives and property of American citizens. Having accomplished this purpose, there was no excuse, either under international law or international practice, honesty, or good faith, for remaining there. There is no pretense we are there now protecting American lives and property. Nobody argues this. Even the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BEGG] has not the temerity to take such a position.

What are we doing in Nicaragua? We are carrying out an agreement made by Mr. Stimson with leaders of the two Nicaraguan factions. And who was Mr. Stimson? He was the extrajudicial, or, to put it in plain words, the illegal representative of the President of the United States—his personal representative there. He made a trade with the various elements in Nicaragua. Whether honest or otherwise, it is immaterial for the purposes of this speech. He made this trade, and now American boys are fighting and laying down their lives—to defend America? To defend American rights under international law? To defend American property and protect American lives? No; to carry out the trade that Mr. Stimson made.

And since when, I ask, has Stimson, the President, or anybody else had the right without the consent of the Congress of the United States to enter into any obligation which binds us to keep our soldiers upon foreign soil? [Applause.]

The action of our administration in keeping marines in Nicaragua and in carrying on this wild adventure is illegal, even as a matter of technicality; in effect and reality it is violative of the very fundamentals of Americanism; it is unconstitutional. Men have been called from office for smaller offenses. [Applause.]

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BEGG].

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I think 5 minutes is entirely too much time to take in answering the substance of the last speech of 20 minutes. The statement was made that the gentleman from Ohio would not have the temerity to make the statement that the marines are in Nicaragua for the purpose of protecting life and property.

Mr. TUCKER. American life and property.

Mr. BEGG. Yes.

Mr. TUCKER. Now.

Mr. BEGG. Now. I will cite the gentleman to the special communication of President Coolidge in the Sixty-ninth Congress, second session, in which he not only makes the flat statement that repeatedly were requests made from American nationals direct to the Government, but to the American representative in Nicaragua, for protection of both life and property, and that the chargé d'affaires of Great Britain at Managua made representations that they wanted the United States to protect the nationals and the property of Great Britain.

The ambassador of Italy in the city of Washington made the same character of representations to the State Department in Washington, and if that statement is not accurate, then the message of the President on Nicaragua is wrong.

Mr. BLANTON. How about the last message of the President?

Mr. BEGG (continuing). And if that statement is accurate, I come right back to my principle announced yesterday and ask you where is the man that is willing to take the position that the Monroe doctrine no longer shall be enforced?

Where is the man who is willing to say we will not protect the nationals of Great Britain and Italy or support the Monroe doctrine? Where is the man, I ask again, that is so unresponsive to these basic principles of patriotism that moved the spirit of every man of the time to which the gentleman refers—the Revolutionary period—when the Monroe doctrine was called into force, as to say he will disregard the rights and lives of the American citizens in foreign territory?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEGG. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. How long would the gentleman have us remain there?

Mr. BEGG. That is an easy thing—if I had absolute control they would remain there just as long as was required to establish a stable, responsible government in Nicaragua. [Applause.]

Certainly, gentlemen, the United States would never violate the sacred territory of any nation having a responsible government; but when the President of Nicaragua, as admitted by the gentleman's own side, has been constitutionally and legally elected as first designate in Nicaragua, when he requests the support of some outside power—what for? To maintain peace and preserve life. No one would refuse that aid that means so much to suffering humanity.

Instead of waging a war, we should be deemed missionaries of peace. If it is wrong to help the irresponsible, chaotic nation of Nicaragua to gain a place among the nations of the world, until they can guide their own ship of state, it is just as wrong for the Christian church to send missionaries to the heathen. There is no difference whatever. It is only carrying the benefits of Christian civilization in the way of stability to a government so they can not only protect the lives of the nationals of other countries, but their own people as well from the assaults of the bandit tribes. [Applause.]

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I now yield to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TILLMAN].

AMERICAN MINING CONGRESS

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. Chairman, the American Mining Congress met in this city in December. I have some mining in my district, and they have passed resolutions which I desire to extend in the RECORD as a part of my remarks. I wish them to appear in the body of the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by embodying certain resolutions as a part of the extension of his remarks. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. Chairman, there is quite an extensive zinc field in my district. I desire to give due publicity to the matter which follows:

Important strides in development of mineral resources of the South are expected to follow recent action of the American Mining Congress. At its convention here early in December this organization adopted a resolution calling the attention of mining developers to the possibility of engaging in profitable production of southern minerals. The resolution reads as follows:

Whereas it is the steadfast purpose of the American Mining Congress to stimulate development of mineral resources and to promote the welfare of the mining industry of the United States; and

Whereas this organization has, during recent years made investigations of southern mineral resources and has found that in States in the South there are valuable deposits of zinc, lead, manganese, bauxite, kaolin, marble, clays, and other useful minerals in commercial quantities that are susceptible of economic mining: Therefore be it

Resolved, That this body earnestly commends the undeveloped fields in the South to the favorable consideration of the mining industry of the Nation to the end that home industries may be fostered and have precedence over foreign fields in supplying minerals for American needs in commerce and industry.

The resolution was brought forward by Judge J. H. Hand, of Yellville, Ark., a resident of my district. He is a member of the Askansas Department of Mines, and of the board of governors of the southern division of the American Mining Congress. When Judge Hand laid the matter before a meeting of the board of governors it was unanimously approved and he was authorized to present the resolution to the convention. It is expected that added impetus will be given to the movement at the annual Southern Industrial Development Conference which will be held in a southern city, March 15–17. The place of the meeting will be fixed early in January.

In presenting the matter to the convention, Judge Hand stated that the South is already on the eve of important mineral developments.

The mineral production of Arkansas in 1926 was valued at $87,000,000 from which the State received $2,000,000 in severance taxes.

He said:

A large portion of the mineral production consists of oil. Arkansas has a number of mineral resources, chief among which are zinc, lead, manganese, coal, oxide, and various forms of valuable clays. But the mining industry, except for bauxite, is in a very limited stage. Arkansas produces 70 per cent of the bauxite mined in the country. During the war when the older fields were unable to meet the pressing demands for the production of lead, zinc, and manganese, the north Arkansas fields came to the rescue. It happens that these fields are off the main traveled paths of the industry. The trend of mining operations has been westward and the South has been overlooked.

Judge Hand stated that the American Mining Congress has done much in drawing the attention of the mining industry to the mineral possibilities of the South by having its representatives investigate these resources, resulting in the discovery of "virgin fields of various valuable minerals."

The American Mining Congress is pointing the way to the mining fraternity into these fields—

Said Judge Hand:

I hope the mining industry will cooperate in the development of these fields in the South, instead of going to Chile and other countries, as the foreign products compete with our own. The expansion of home industry and the making of an all-American mining industry will compensate for any cost that any branch of industry may have to bear by reason of this cooperation in the development of these fields. I regard the American Mining Congress as one of the greatest organizations of this country. I have known it and followed it closely for 20 years. When the American Mining Congress began its work the mining industry was regarded as a game of chance and luck, and was looked upon with suspicion by business interests. Mining is now reduced to a science and ranks in prestige with other lines of business. The work of the American Mining Congress in bringing and holding together the mining industry and purging the mining industry of fraudulent practices has elevated the mining industry to a basis of confidence on a parity with other lines of business. Since the American Mining Congress has made its influence felt in the South many business men of Arkansas have awakened to a realization of mining opportunity in the State. Arkansas has zinc, lead, manganese, lime, phosphates, cement, marble, and the finest building stone in the world. Within a few years Arkansas will be able to meet the demand for electrical energy for smelting and mining and other industries.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. SWANK].

FLOOD CONTROL

Mr. SWANK. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, the leading measures for the consideration of this Congress will be the subjects of farm relief and flood control. Farm conditions are too well known to be reviewed on this floor. Every Member of this House knows that our farmers have suffered more in the past eight years than in any other equal period of time in the history of this country. They are working just as hard as ever, practice the most rigid economy, and should have equal protection of the laws. The farmers have just as much right to enjoy some of the pleasures of life as any other class of citizens, and I hope that a bill may soon be enacted that will place our farmers on the same plane as other industries protected by laws. Our farmers can not continue to produce the necessities of life at a loss and should be assisted in obtaining relief from these conditions.

But, Mr. Chairman, I am before you at this time to discuss legislation for the control of floods in the United States, and this subject is also of great interest to our farmers, as well as the country in general. As preliminary to my remarks on this subject, however, I wanted to again call the attention of this House and the administration to the necessity of enacting agricultural legislation before we adjourn.

Since the disastrous floods last summer on the Mississippi River the attention of our people has been focused on this subject as never before. The Committee on Flood Control began to hold sessions long before Congress convened in December to give everybody that so desired an opportunity to be heard. I wish now to congratulate that great committee for this action and for the energetic and able manner in which it has been considering legislation for the control of the floods of the United States. I remember the two first weeks of the hearings that representatives from the various States in the Mississippi Valley and other sections were here to present their plans to the committee and assist the members of that committee in drafting an effective bill to present to Congress for its consideration. Never have I seen a committee work harder nor more conscientiously on a subject. Large delegations from different States were here to attend the hearings, and since Congress convened the committee has been holding hearings, and many times at night. The committee is seeking all the light and assistance they can get on this important subject. Like agricultural legislation, it is not a political bill and is not so considered by the committee, but is a subject that affects the whole country. This legislation will not only affect the Mississippi Valley and tributaries and other streams that contribute to the floods on the Mississippi, but will affect the country in its entirety.

Every Member of Congress appreciates the fact that this is a most important question, and that it is difficult to draft a bill to meet all objections. Many good bills have been introduced, and the committee has been considering them all and will soon report a bill for our consideration. We can not all have everything in the bill that we want, but we should make it just as good as possible and have it apply not only to the Mississippi River proper but to all tributary rivers and others that contribute to the flood waters of the Mississippi. The importance of the Mississippi can not be overestimated in times of peace or war. It runs through the central part of the United States and carries much of our commerce and contributes, with its adjacent territory, to our agricultural products to a large extent. Without this great artery of transportation, freight rates in the central portion of our country would be higher than they are at the present time. With improvement in transportation on this river, we will get relief in rates. Much further assistance will be received by improved navigation on the tributaries by proper control, not only for flood relief but for purposes of navigation. There is no reason why navigation can not be had much farther up the Missouri than at this time, and no reason why navigation can not be carried out on other rivers, such as the Arkansas as far as Arkansas City, Kans., and even Wichita. It is easy to see how this would affect rates and transportation, in addition to internal improvements and control of the floods on many other streams. For many years the waters of the United States have been permitted to lay large areas of our most fertile land in waste and cause destruction to our citizens and their property, instead of controlling these waters for the use and benefit of our people. And it is no idle dream to say that they can in a large measure be controlled, to prevent such destructive floods, for navigation and other uses of the people.

The floods of this year on the Mississippi alone caused property damage to an amount which would be sufficient to construct levees, reservoirs, and storage basins at many places on these various streams. But, Mr. Chairman, it is not alone a money or property question, but a question of the lives of our people and a large part of them, too. A large portion of this water can be utilized for the protection and welfare of our citizens just as well as to let it go to their damage and destruction. In many parts of the United States water that would otherwise be wasted is made to serve mankind and much fertile land has been reclaimed by irrigation and many people given an opportunity to make a home and lead a useful life. We can continue to let it go to waste and destroy our people and their property, or confine it to our own use for the general good of the whole country. It is not a sectional question but one in which all our people are interested. You must remember that the land affected by the Mississippi and its tributaries comprises more than half of our land, industries, and people. It is a national problem and as such should be considered. All whom I have heard before the committee agreed to the national aspect of this subject, and the only difference I find is the question of the division of costs and the extent to which the bill should apply.

I appeared before the committee the first week of the hearings and urged that any bill reported for the consideration of Congress should combine the reservoir and storage plans with the levee system. By this method much of the water would be held back from the Mississippi. These reservoir and storage basins should be located on the tributaries and other rivers that contribute to the floods on the Mississippi. The Arkansas and Red Rivers contribute much to these flood waters and the same is true with the Washita, South Canadian, North Canadian, Cimarron, and other streams in Oklahoma. The construction of reservoirs and storage basins on these streams would not only be of great assistance in relieving the floods on the Mississippi, but would prevent great damage each year to Oklahoma, Texas, New Mexico, Kansas, and Arkansas. It hurts a farmer just as much to have his crops, land, and property destroyed on one of these rivers in Oklahoma as it would if he lived on the Mississippi. It was shown to the committee by estimates of competent engineers that 200 reservoirs and storage basins could be constructed in Colorado, New Mexico, Texas, Kansas, and Oklahoma at a cost of $130,000,000, and that such a system would render the Arkansas and Red Rivers absolutely harmless, so far as floods are concerned. This would help our people in many other ways, as reduction in transportation costs by making more rivers navigable. This plan would encourage farmers to build additional lakes and ponds on their farms, and would be of benefit in relieving the droughts of the West.

The floods last summer on the Mississippi alone affected 31 States and 41 per cent of the total area of the United States. That flood covered 12,500,000 acres of fine land, rendered 600,000 American citizens homeless who before had been prosperous, and damaged property to the enormous extent of approximately $400,000,000. In addition to all this destruction and property loss, this flood caused suspension of our mails, greatly interfered with interstate commerce, and damaged industry to almost an indeterminate degree.

Reliable estimates show that landowners in Oklahoma lose more than $10,000,000 annually in the destruction of land, crops, and other property by floods, and that the loss to our

State, cities, and public utilities each year will equal a like amount. Oklahoma has more than 782,000 acres of land subject to overflow, and competent men have estimated this as high as 2,000,000 acres, and the proper solution of this great question is of vital interest to our people as it is to the rest of the country. It not only affects the people who live near the Mississippi, but also affects those on other streams such as the Missouri and the Oklahoma streams that I have mentioned. The principal question, as has been stated, is to control the Mississippi floods, on account of its greatness and because it is a navigable stream. That is just what the plan that I have outlined will do, and, while we are doing that, we will also protect our other people who live on tributaries and other rivers that contribute to the floods. These floods clearly demonstrated that levees alone will not do the work, no matter how high they may be. About all that the levee system in itself will do is to raise the river bed. If these were 100 feet high, the same would be true, and the only thing accomplished is greater costs and maintenance. The testimony before the committee—and I heard most of it—was to the effect that levees, spillways, reservoirs, and storage basins would do the work and protect our citizens. Who will say that a method should not be devised that would render the same assistance to a resident on these other streams as he would be given if he lived on the Mississippi? It is neither a political nor a sectional question.

I believe the hearings developed fully the fact that it is a national question and must be dealt with from that viewpoint. Then the next conclusion naturally follows that the entire cost of construction should be borne by the Federal Government by congressional appropriations. This is the plan I favor, and I am opposed to charging any of the costs of construction against the landowners, States, or municipalities. The people in the levee districts have been taxed to death, and they can contribute no further. This land is the bread basket of our Government and must not only be protected but must be developed. Of course, it will cost something, and so do other governmental operations cost something. In my judgment, we could reduce other appropriations without any additional tax levy and without interfering in the least with any governmental activity to a sufficient amount to take care of this entire cost of construction. A reasonable appropriation could be made until the work is completed without adding a cent of additional cost to the Government. But, gentlemen of the House, work on the lower Mississippi alone should not be done and other portions of the Mississippi area left untouched and the people along the tributaries and other streams I have mentioned left to suffer by these destructive floods. They are also entitled to relief and their homes saved and property protected.

Mr. Chairman, I ask permission here to insert a portion of the report and request of the Oklahoma City Chamber of Commerce, adopted December 8, 1927, to the Chamber of Commerce of the United States on Mississippi flood control:

Lower Mississippi River control offers no protection to the greater area, greater values, greater population, greater commerce, greater economic resources, greater national development, greater necessity of protection, and greater tax-paying public in the flood-swept valleys of the streams above the leveed district, which district was picked out as the particular and sole concern of the Government. It is time now to deny that the Mississippi River from Cairo down is all of the Mississippi River or that it is the only territory entitled to protection.

The levee system ignores every available use of water in economic development, whether it be industrial, or agricultural, or navigation, or commerce. It contemplates sheer waste of that which is or might be extremely valuable in the upper area in all the above-named uses. It does not contemplate the reduction or control of floods where they do the greatest damage, which is before they have accumulated in the main stream, or the use of those flood waters in the reclamation of dry lands, which are as much entitled to governmental solicitude as reclamation of wet lands below.

The governmental policy of attempted control of Mississippi floods by strictly local works on the lower Mississippi has proven a failure in every high flood since it was started. The ordinary flood of 1927 demonstrated that the river so leveed had less than one-third the required flood capacity, and 226 breaks in levees resulted, mostly from undercutting, some from overflowing.

The people of the United States have expended many hundreds of millions of dollars—some figure seven hundred and fifty millions, other computations run down to two hundred and fifty millions—precise accuracy of figures is unimportant. They have supplied this money as fast as it could be economically spent, although constantly warned by eminent hydraulic engineers of the disasters that would attend the development and completion of the system. The warning was unheeded and the disasters have occurred.

This condition of unfairness finally became apparent to the eight States comprising the drainage basins of the Arkansas and Red Rivers, whose flood destruction was the equal of the lower Mississippi and entirely ignored. Thereupon commissioners were appointed to work out a plan of flood control that would offer assured protection to the neglected properties in the valleys of those States and afford some real protection to the heretofore deceived and now bankrupt owners and residents of the leveed Mississippi. This commission is known as the interstate commission for the control of the Arkansas and Red Rivers, and is composed of 27 members, appointed by the governors of those States.

After a number of years' work, the commission has devised a plan of impounding in about 200 controlled reservoirs the flood run-off from more than one-third of the area drained by those rivers—actually about 40 per cent of the flood run-off. This would reduce to a condition of harmlessness all of the tributaries where reservoirs were placed; would keep the main stems of the Arkansas and Red Rivers and their principal tributaries down to a flowage within their bank limits; and would protect hundreds of millions of property in the valleys of these rivers and above the leveed interests, which have never engaged the concern of the Federal agencies.

This plan of assisting in flood control on the Mississippi by impounding the waters through reservoirs and storage basins on the Arkansas and Red Rivers, their tributaries, and the other streams mentioned above has been carefully worked out by competent engineers and others interested in this subject and who have given it much study.

I insert here a statement from the Oklahoma Conservation Commission concerning the flooded area along the rivers of that State:

Grand River or Neosho: The estimate is based on the theory that the Robinson Dam and improvement will be made, which will materially reduce the flooded area as exists to-day. Lands subject to overflow on the above theory are 17,500 acres.

Verdigris River: The Verdigris River proper has 65,600 acres of flooded area. The Caney River, Bird Creek, and Hominy, all tributaries to the Verdigris, add 37,000 acres of flooded area, making a total of 102,600 acres for the Verdigris and its main tributaries. This estimate may be a little low on the Verdigris proper, but the above is about right from the information I have.

Main Arkansas River in Oklahoma is about 270 miles and the valley lands subject to overflow are about 80,000 acres. Salt Fork and its tributaries have a flooded area of 30,000 acres.

Red Rock Creek has a flooded area of 3,200 acres.

Black Bear Creek has a flooded area of 6,400 acres. Both of these streams are tributaries to the main Arkansas.

Cimarron River in Oklahoma (not including that portion in Cimarron County, Okla.) equals 270 miles and has a flooded area of 58,400 acres, and its eight main tributaries have about 190 miles of valley lands, of which 19,200 acres are subject to overflow, making a total for the Cimarron and its main tributaries of 77,600 acres subject to overflow.

North Canadian River is about 420 miles from its mouth to Guymon in Texas County and the land subject to overflow equals 130,000 acres. Deep Fork, one of the main tributaries of the North Canadian, is about 110 miles long and the flooded area in this valley equals 38,000 acres. Wolf Creek and the other tributaries of the North Canadian have about 90 miles of valley land of which about 12,000 acres are subject to overflow, making a grand total of overflow lands in the North Canadian and its tributaries of 180,000 acres.

South Canadian River has about 360 miles in Oklahoma and about 280 miles of this valley are subject to overflow, making about 110,000 acres, and its tributaries, exclusive of the North Canadian and Deep Fork, equal about 70 miles of valley land, of which about 15,000 acres are subject to overflow, making a total for the Canadian River of 125,000 acres subject to overflow. This stream is so erratic and makes so many changes of its channel proper, that it is hard to come anywhere near making a correct estimate of the damaged lands because a farm to-day may be the river bed in 30 days.

Other small streams emptying into the Arkansas are Pole Cat, Illinois, and Pateau, covering about 60 miles of valley land—part of which is subject to overflow, especially Pateau Creek. The combined flooded area of these three streams equals 11,000 acres.

Red River: The tributaries of the Red River in Oklahoma include the Washita, Mud Creek, Beaver Creek, the two Cache Creeks, Deep Red, Red River of Oklahoma, Salt Fork, and Elm Creek, comprising about 640 miles of valley lands. The principal one of these eight streams is the Washita, which has about 270 miles of valley land of which 165 miles are subject to overflow, making approximately 370 miles of valley lands of which 175 miles are subject to overflow, making approximately 56,000 acres, making a grand total for the Red River district of approximately 109,000 acres subject to overflow. The flooding of the lands in this section of the State is quite erratic. Some years pass without any floods, while other years from two to three floods may occur at any time during the year causing great damage.

This brings the total flood area of all the streams in Oklahoma to 742,300 acres. It is safe to say that the floods in Oklahoma cause an annual loss to the landowners of some ten to fifteen million dollars; besides, the loss to the State, counties, cities, railroads, and other public utilities possibly is equal to five to ten million dollars annually.

These figures compiled by W. C. Burke, engineer, Oklahoma City, Okla.

I mention these statements for the reason that they are made by competent men whose profession is engineering and who have had many years of experience in this line of work. In the Sixty-eighth Congress I introduced a bill authorizing the engineers of the War Department to make a preliminary survey of the South Canadian, North Canadian, Cimarron, and other rivers in Oklahoma, with a view to the control of their floods. Provision for a preliminary survey of these rivers was made in the general bill which became a law May 31, 1924, and which included my bill. The Arkansas River and other Oklahoma streams were also included. This was the first step to take under the law for a complete and regular survey for flood-control purposes.

The plan outlined in my remarks not only affects Oklahoma, New Mexico, Texas, Kansas, and Arkansas but the entire Mississippi Valley and the country at large. Congress has provided large appropriations many times for the assistance of our citizens, few in number compared to those who will be relieved by a proper bill for Mississippi River flood control, and adequate funds should be provided for this purpose during this session of Congress. Oklahoma has contributed to the "reclamation fund" through the sale of public lands the sum of $5,917,843.10, and not one cent of this amount has been spent in our State. What we ask now is that we be included in any bill for control of the floods on the lower Mississippi River, and our people and the people in the other States affected given the same protection as our other citizens, and at the same time greatly relieve the lower Mississippi River.

Mr. Chairman, this plan is feasible, practical, and the most economical plan for the control of the floods on the Mississippi River. The opinions of the Army engineers should be given due consideration and weight, but their opinions and work in the past have demonstrated that the opinions of others are also worthy to be considered. The Army engineers thought the floods could be controlled by levees, and this plan has totally failed to do the work. Competent engineers in civil life, just as competent as the Army engineers and just as experienced, advocate the plan of control by reservoirs and storage basins in conjunction with the levees.

Gentlemen of the House, Congress should not legislate by sections in this country, but should make the legislation apply to all the people who are similarly situated. The people on the rivers in Oklahoma, Texas, Kansas, and the other States affected by these rivers should also be relieved from destructive floods just the same as the people who live on the Mississippi River proper. It is not merely a suggestion for protection of our people, but, while granting them this relief given others, you will greatly reduce the flood waters on the Mississippi River.

Mr. Chairman, I wish again to repeat that I am opposed to any of the cost of construction being charged to the land affected by these floods, or to any charge being assessed against any drainage district in these areas, or against any city, town, municipality, or any State. I hope and trust that Congress will take action at once on this problem that so greatly affects so many of our citizens.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. ABERNETHY].

VENTILATION OF THE HOUSE AND SENATE CHAMBERS

Mr. ABERNETHY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, during the last Congress I addressed the House upon the question of the need of the ventilation of this Chamber, and it may be of interest to the Members of the House to know just what has been done with reference to that matter since that time. At that time I called the attention of the House to the large number of deaths that have occurred among the Members of Congress since the year 1922. In that time 30 Members of the House and 11 Senators have died from various causes. Whether the impure ventilation of this and the Senate Chamber had anything to do with their deaths is a question, but anyone who sits here and undertakes to be upon the floor of the House while we are having sessions knows that something is radically wrong with the ventilating system of the Chamber. The matter was called to the attention of the Committee on Appropriations at the last session of Congress. The chairman of that committee would not act then, because he said he did not have before him sufficient data.

The consideration of the necessary work to be done and apparatus to be installed to provide for the ventilation and air conditioning of the legislative Chambers of the United States Capitol is a work of such importance that when the matter was before the House Committee on Appropriations during the last Congress it was suggested that a careful survey be made of actual conditions by the most expert authorities in the employ of the Government upon the subjects of ventilation and air conditioning and that the assistance of the Public Health Service be enlisted in connection with the Bureau of Mines in the formation of a committee of experts, who should take into consideration all of the conditions to be met in a work of this kind. This suggestion was made by the Hon. MARTIN B. MADDEN, chairman of the House Committee on Appropriations, and based upon the fact that for many years the subject of ventilation has been considered to a greater or less extent almost from the time of the occupancy of the House and the Senate wings of the Capitol. It is proper to state, however, that such investigations as have been made and such installations as have resulted from these investigations have been directed wholly to the introduction of more or less air into the legislative Chambers and the conditioning of the air so that there might be a suitably tempered air, both as to its humidity and temperature, had not been satisfactorily considered or the problem solved.

Accordingly, through the Public Health Service, there was organized the following committee, the chairman of which is Prof. C-E. A. Winslow, professor of public health, Yale University, New Haven, Conn. Other members are—

D. D. Kimball, consulting engineer, New York, N. Y.; F. I. Cooper, heating and ventilating engineer, Boston, Mass.; A. M. Feldman, consulting engineer, New York, N. Y.; R. E. Hall, engaged in ventilation of theaters, New York; F. R. Still, vice president American Blower Co., New York; Prof. A. C. Willard, University of Illinois; L. R. Thompson, surgeon in charge of Public Health Service, Washington, D. C.; David Lynn, Architect of the Capitol; Dr. R. R. Sayers, Chief Surgeon Bureau of Mines; Leonard Greenburg, sanitary engineer Public Health Service.

This committee met in Washington and fully considered all of the conditions connected with the ventilation and air conditioning of the Senate Chamber and the Hall of the House of Representatives, and after becoming acquainted with all of the facts necessary, they proceeded to formulate a series of resolutions, stating from their mature deliberations the conditions that should be properly met in the manufacture and installation of apparatus required to properly ventilate and condition the air of these two Chambers. This work occupied some time for the reason that the conditions of other large audience rooms and the temperatures and humidity considered necessary were taken into consideration in attempting to define such conditions as would be required to be met for the two Chambers of the Senate and House. Whereupon a circular letter was prepared setting forth the fundamental resolutions adopted by this committee and naming them items 1, 2, and 3. This circular letter was sent to a selected number of bidders, believed by the committee to be capable of manufacturing and installing suitable apparatus to meet the conditions to be satisfied in this work. The list selected was as follows:

Carrier Engineering Co., 750 Frelinghuysen Avenue, Newark, N. J.; Brunswick Kroeschell Co., New Brunswick, N. J.; Cooling & Air Conditioning Co., 31 Union Square, New York, N. Y.; York Manufacturing Co., 634 Munsey Building, Washington, D. C.; Wittemeier Machine Co., Chicago, Ill.

It has been deemed necessary to acquaint those interested in the subject of ventilation and air conditioning with the steps which have been taken in accordance with the suggestions of Mr. MADDEN to determine just what should be considered an ideal condition of ventilation, temperature, and humidity of these legislative Chambers, so that it might be understood that as far as possible it has been attempted to place this subject upon a proper scientific basis so that the subject of ventilation and air condition may be decisively settled.

The following circular letter was sent out by Mr. David Lynn, Architect of the Capitol:

ARCHITECT OF THE CAPITOL,
Washington, D. C., December 3, 1927.

VENTILATION AND AIR CONDITIONING OF THE SENATE CHAMBER AND THE HALL OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE UNITED STATES CAPITOL, WASHINGTON, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: You are respectfully invited to prepare plans, specifications, and estimates, in triplicate, such plans and specifications being prepared to describe the system proposed to ventilate the Senate Chamber and the Hall of the House of Representatives, these two sections to be considered as separate units, with separate plans and specifications and estimates of cost prepared for each unit.

The attention of prospective bidders is invited to the following item, which should govern the plans, specifications, and estimates to be submitted:

ITEM NO. 1

For summer conditions, the plans should be of sufficient capacity to be capable of maintaining in the Chambers during periods of maximum occupancy (which should be determined by the Architect of the Capitol) a temperature not in excess of 75°, with a relative humidity not in excess of 55 per cent with outside weather conditions of 95° dry bulb and 75° wet bulb. The plant should be capable of maintaining in the Chambers during the winter a temperature up to 75° with a relative humidity of 30 to 50 per cent. These conditions shall be produced without noticeable drafts and without noticeable odors in any part of either Chamber, as measured by a variation in CO_2 content in excess of four parts per 10,000 between different points in the Chamber. The matter of dust and bacteria is not provided for in these requirements, for the reason that it is not regarded as of importance, and, in any case, the operation of the plant will take care of this matter adequately.

ITEM NO. 2

Such conditions can, in our judgment, only be realized by a system operating on the downward principle—that is, with the air flowing from the ceiling toward and out through the floor—with careful provision for initial horizontal diffusion capable of delivering a maximum of 45 cubic feet of air per person per minute, and of variable capacity, through means of speed control of fans, to a minimum of 10 cubic feet of air per person per minute, both figures being based on the figures of maximum occupancy of the Chambers and with temperature and humidity control adequate to meet the range and limits stated above.

The system to be installed should be provided with a complete equipment of indicating and recording devices to give indication and record of temperature and humidities throughout the system and Chambers.

It is recommended that each contractor submitting a proposal for the installation of these two systems shall be required to submit complete installation or working plans showing all details of apparatus and equipment, including refrigeration equipment, dehumidifier equipment, fans, motors, controllers, duct work, and all auxiliary equipment, and a complete specification describing in detail the material, installation, and workmanship, and shall further give all required detail as to equipment, including number and size of units of refrigeration, capacity of same; operating speeds, cylinder displacement; operating pressures; operating temperatures; brake horsepower required per ton of refrigeration, with condensing water at 75–80, and 85° temperature and the method of cooling this condenser water; amount of water (in gallons per minute) required per ton of refrigeration at 75–80, and 85°; actual tonnage produced by each refrigerating machine with condensing water at 85°; capacity and dimensions of humidifiers and quantity of water for same; capacity and size of fans, motors, and pumps; size and location of all ducts and piping; duct and piping installation; means of temperature and humidity control for both winter and summer; method of air diffusion and method of varying quantities of air, including descriptions of system for reading and recording temperatures and humidities throughout the Chambers and ventilating systems; and such other details as the Architect of the Capitol may require. Each proposal for the installation of this equipment shall specifically indicate the character and extent of guaranties offered.

ITEM NO. 3

We believe that, in general, comfort will be most effectively secured in cold weather by maintaining in the Chambers a temperature between 66° and 70°, with a respective relative humidity of 50–40 per cent, and in warm weather by keeping this temperature 10 to 15° below the outdoor temperature, with a relative humidity not over 50 per cent.

If it is desired to maintain higher temperature in winter, the relative humidity may be decreased correspondingly to 30 per cent at 75°.

The temperature and humidities to be actually maintained shall be determined from time to time by the Committee on Rules of the Senate and by the Committee on Rules of the House of Representatives.

An estimate has been made for the contemplated work in the Senate Chamber, and an estimate for the amount required for the Hall of the House of Representatives will be presented to the next Seventieth Congress for action.

Intending bidders should inspect the two Legislative Chambers and acquaint themselves with the structural conditions of each Chamber, securing such information as will enable the preparation of the plans, specifications, and estimates. The information attached, stating the results to be required of the system of ventilation and air conditioning desired, has been prepared by a committee selected from the best informed authorities on the subjects included in the work to be performed, and the specifications must guarantee that the conditions desired can be obtained by the system specified. This committee will be given the opportunity to examine and pass upon the plans, specifications, and estimates submitted under this circular letter.

It is understood that the bidders shall especially guarantee that the Government shall be protected from any claims for damages arising from the use of any device which may infringe upon a patented device owned by other than the persons or persons submitting plans, specifications, and estimates.

Plans and specifications submitted must show conclusively a possible performance of the system proposed to adequately secure the resulting ventilation and air conditioning stated as necessary by the information prepared by the committee for the guidance of those submitting specifications and estimates of cost.

The Government will remove from the room where new air-conditioning machinery is to be installed any apparatus or stored articles which may interfere with the new installation and will cut all openings in floors and walls, whre necessary, for the new air ducts.

In existing air shafts which may be used as space for new air ducts, the Government will move to one side all steam, water, and air-carrying pipes and all wiring of every description.

The Government will remove all fans, heaters, and motors, the use of which will be discontinued, and where space occupied by them is needed for new duct work.

The Government will bring to points just within the room where new apparatus is to be installed steam at a maximum of 125 pounds gauge pressure, water in capacity needed, and direct electric current at 110 volts pressure or alternating electric current at 25 cycles and pressure up to 440 volts.

The estimates must show that they are based upon an intent to furnish all labor and material and install in place; and that the bidder agrees to, in the event of his estimates, plans, and specifications being accepted, enter into a contract, with such bond or securities as may be required for the performance of the contract in a satisfactory manner.

The specifications, plans, and estimates of cost must be inclosed in an envelope marked "Architect of the Capitol, United States Capitol, Washington, D. C.," and marked upon the lower left-hand corner of the envelope "Specifications, plans, and estimates, ventilation of the Senate and House Chambers, United States Capitol."

The bids will be publicly opened at 2 p. m. in the office of the Architect of the Capitol on January 20, 1928, and the right of the architect to reject any or all bids and to waive any informality in any bid is hereby reserved.

DAVID LYNN,
Architect of the Capitol.

I sincerely hope that the Committee on Appropriations, when we have under consideration the legislative appropriation bill, may consider this and make provision for this very necessary work to be done. [Applause.]

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

FARM RELIEF

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I imagine that our constituents back home do not differ from other constituents any more than we their representatives differ from one another. Yet, however different they may be, I imagine that upon several fundamentals, so far as legislation in this Congress is concerned, we would find all of them in agreement.

So far as waste and extravagance and economy are concerned, we would find them of one mind. In public affairs they want no waste, they want no extravagance, and they want sane economy. They do not want foolish economy. They want sane economy and sane expenditure of public money.

I imagine they would be in hearty agreement on the subject of affording some sort of definite relief to the producers of the country—to the farmers and stockmen—not something merely to be spent in their name. All of the money that Congress has spent, which it has been appropriating for the Agricultural Department, has been spent to increase production; and that is the very thing that the farmers are suffering from to-day. They suffer from increased production. None of the proposals that we have passed in behalf of agriculture in the way of farm relief has been to give to the farmer the benefit of that surplus. The McNary-Haugen bill did not propose to give the farmers the benefit of any profit that could be derived from the surplus when handled by the organization that we provided for. The profits that were to be derived from the holding and sale of surplus were not to be divided among the farmers. They were to get no part of it.

I take it also that our people would be in hearty accord and agreement upon the proposition that we must afford them better railroad facilities in transporting commodities; that is, lower freight rates. I think our tariffs are higher than they should be.

The producers in my section of the country frequently send their products to market, and the freight tariffs cost them more than they receive.

In such fundamentals it occurs to me that all of our constituents are of one mind, and that there should be some relief.

I do not know whether or not you gentlemen keep your ears close to the ground in respect to what your people are thinking about and how they feel on public subjects. There were 314,000 people in the last census in my district, the seventeenth district of Texas, and over 350,000 people now live there. Those 350,000 people living in my district to-day can speak collectively only through their political conventions. That is the only way in which they can voice their sentiments collectively. When the Democrats of my district speak, when they say, "We, the Democrats of the seventeenth congressional district," that means "We, the people of the seventeenth district," because in my district the people are practically all Democrats. There are a few Republicans, and I will say here that the few white ones down there in my district are splendid men, men of good judgment, men who are the very best of citizens. But there are very few of them, so I say that when the Democrats speak collectively in convention they speak for the people of my district. I want now to call your attention to how they expressed themselves on some public questions in the last convention in which they met in my district, on August 28, 1926. That is the last time they spoke as delegates selected from the conventions in all of the 19 counties in my district. They met in convention on August 28, 1926, and expressed themselves definitely on some of these important questions of legislation that we have had before Congress, and I now call your attention to some of their expressions. Among other things they resolved:

(3) That our junior Senator has been a luxury too costly and expensive to the people to be continued in office longer than his six years, there having been spent out of the public Treasury $65,984.61 in the contest over his seat, and on February 23, 1926, Senator MAYFIELD had the Senate pay him the additional sum of $30,500 as his own personal expenses.

(4) That we can not approve of the action of Senator MAYFIELD in voting February 28, 1925, to raise his own salary for the term of office to which he had already been elected.

(5) That we can not approve of the action of Senator MAYFIELD in supporting the Parker bill that deprived the American people of all voice and representation around the council table in railroad disputes.

(6) That we can not approve of the action of Senator MAYFIELD in supporting the Haugen bill, which would have wasted $375,000,000 to begin with, would have unjustly taxed southern cotton, and promised no real relief to southern farmers.

Those people are not much different from your people. They are the same kind of people; they are American citizens, interested in public questions. They have the right to express themselves on national legislation and national affairs.

And right here, on that Haugen bill, what are we going to do about farm relief this year? Are we going to let the Senate say to us that we can not pass in this House and get it through any measure except the so-called McNary-Haugen bill, and none other? Are we again going to be told that?

I have been here long enough to know that every agricultural bill that we pass, any farm relief measure that we pass here, will be known as the McNary-Haugen bill under our system. Every bill of that importance that comes from the Committee on Agriculture is going to bear the name of the chairman of the House committee and the name of the chairman of the Senate committee.

The tax bill that we passed here recently illustrates that. We all know as a matter of fact that it is a Jack Garner bill, but it is known as the Green measure because, forsooth, Mr. GREEN of Iowa is chairman of the committee. No matter whose impress is put upon the measure, it is known by the name of the chairman.

I remember when that McNary-Haugen bill was first introduced in 1924. If you will compare the 1924 bill with the 1927 bill of the same name you would hardly recognize the two as coming from the same source. If you compare the 1924 bill with the 1926 bill and then with the 1927 bill which we passed last year you will see that we forced many important changes to be made as the years have passed. Yet they were all known as McNary-Haugen bills.

The first bill that was introduced by Mr. HAUGEN in 1924 provided for no relief for cotton, one of the greatest agricultural commodities raised in this country. When I asked the distinguished chairman from Iowa why cotton was left out, he said the cotton producers did not want it in. They recognized that there was nothing definite in the way of relief for cotton in it. But in 1926, when he wanted his bill passed and knew that he had to get the cotton Representatives in line with him, enough of them to pass it, he put cotton in.

What did he then provide? He provided that there should be an equalization tax of $2 per bale, because he knew if you taxed the cotton farmers more than $2 a bale their Representatives would not stand for it and would not vote for the bill. Yet we realized at that time that an equalization fee of less than $5 or even $10 a bale on cotton would hardly accomplish anything beneficial for cotton. Yet they restricted it to $2 a bale, and put a provision in the bill that the board could raise it if they saw fit, and they would have raised it to $10 or $15 before they got through, we all know.

What else did they first provide in the McNary-Haugen bill? They provided that the farmer who failed to pay this equalization tax could be fined $5,000 and sent to a Federal prison for a year; that is, that the producer, the man whom they were seeking to help, could be thus penalized if he saw fit not to pay a tax on his commodity. Naturally some of us rebelled, and before the bill got through we forced that provision out of the bill. The 1927 bill did not retain that provision. It did not penalize the farmer. It did not propose to fine him $5,000 and send him to a Federal prison for a year.

There was another important change we caused by fighting against that first bill. The first bill was to waste $375,000,000; certainly that much. We caused the framers of that bill to reduce it $125,000,000 when they brought the 1927 bill in.

Why is it that we can not provide a bill here for the welfare of the farmers that will see to it that the profit which is derived from properly marketing their surplus is distributed back among the farmers who raised it? Whenever you bring a bill into this House of that character I think you will find every Representative of farmers here supporting it heartily. The other bill did not do it.

Why can we not get to work and pass the kind of a bill that our farmer friend from Kansas, Mr. Tincher, advocated—our farmer friend who used to be a leader on this floor for the administration? Whenever the administration was embarrassed or bothered, instead of calling on JIM BEGG, as they do now, they called on Tincher. They kept Tincher on the floor all the time to protect the administration, and especially to protect the farming interests.

You remember Tincher brought in here a bill which was a good, honest-to-God farmers' measure when he first introduced it. It was to do away with gambling in farm futures. It was to stop it altogether, and if that bill had been passed it would have benefited every farmer in the United States far more than the McNary-Haugen bill could have promised in any respect. But when Tincher got through with his bill, when the interests got through with Tincher's bill, it was not stock gambling in the daytime that was stopped but only gambling at night, when the gamblers were sleeping. [Laughter.]

I have introduced another bill here which would stop gambling in futures on cotton, grain, wool, and mohair in the daytime and in the nighttime, too. It will stop all such gambling in farm products. Will you support it? I hope you will.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LANKFORD].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia is recognized.

Mr. LANKFORD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I was very much interested in the speech made a few minutes ago by my friend from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] on the question of farm relief. There is no other matter of equal importance before us and the American Congress. We all depend on the farmers either directly or indirectly. My district is made up largely of farmers. It consists of 20 splendid rural counties, and I would rather help in the passage of a bill giving help to those wonderful people than to help in the passage of any other measure. If to-day I were to ask Members of Congress the question, Are you in favor of a farm relief bill? practically every man here would say "Yes," and yet when we come to consider a bill a great many people who would say that they are in favor of a farm relief bill turn aside and oppose the bill. We differ in our meaning when we say we are in favor of helping the farmer. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] hit the keynote just a little while ago when he said we were willing to help the farmer produce. We all agree on that, and a great many Members of Congress, when they say they are in favor of helping the farmer, only mean they are in favor of helping the farmer produce. Thus far and no further. The gambler is in favor of helping the farmer produce; the speculator is in favor of helping the farmer produce; those who steal a part of what the farmer earns are in favor of helping the farmer produce.

The real trouble comes about when we attempt to secure the passage of a bill to help the farmer sell his products for a better price and eliminate the unnecessary middlemen. The fight comes when we try to help the farmer sell his product to better advantage. Such a bill meets opposition on every hand.

We have established a great many experiment stations in this country by State legislation and by national enactment. Every one of those experiment stations experiments in helping the farmer produce more. Not a single one of them helps the farmer to sell his product to the consumer at a better price.

I have introduced a bill, which I do not propose to discuss very fully now, to appropriate money and authorize the Department of Agriculture to experiment in the sale of food and food products of the farmer directly from the producer to the consumer, leaving out the middleman. I do not expect very much support for that bill from Congress. There are too many Members in favor of the middleman and really against the farmer.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANKFORD. Yes.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. What are you going to do with the middleman?

Mr. LANKFORD. I would eliminate the unnecessary middleman if I could.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. What are you going to provide for him?

Mr. LANKFORD. I do not provide anything in this experiment for the middleman. I want the Department of Agriculture to experiment in selling the food from the producer to the consumer. I do not intend to discuss that bill very fully at present, but will gladly do so later. I am just saying, Mr. BLANTON, that the purpose of most of the experiment stations is to help the farmer produce more. We can get all the money we want to establish experiment stations to help the farmer produce more. The farmers' bulletins which are issued from time to time, and which we send out, are for that purpose. It is hard, in fact impossible, it seems, to get appropriations to help the farmers sell for better prices but easy to get help to boost production.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. CHINDBLOM). The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five additional minutes.

Mr. LANKFORD. Mr. Chairman, how much time did I use of the time originally allotted to me?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman was recognized for five minutes.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yielded the gentleman 20 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk advises the Chair that he understood it was 5 minutes, and the Clerk notified the Chair when the 5 minutes had been exhausted. The Chair regrets there was a misunderstanding. The gentleman has only consumed 5 minutes. If the original allowance was 20 minutes the gentleman is entitled to recognition for 15 minutes longer.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yielded the gentleman 20 minutes.

Mr. LANKFORD. Mr. Chairman, it is my purpose at another time to discuss more fully the bill which I introduced to authorize the Department of Agriculture to experiment in the sale of farm food products directly from the producer to the consumer, but at this time I want to talk a little along the lines of a bill which I have introduced to establish a farmers' finance corporation. I have occupied a rather embarassing position for many, many years as a Member of Congress in connection with farm relief measures. I have been unable during past Congresses to approve any bill introduced, and yet I was unable to draw a bill which would satisfy my convictions in this respect, and am now glad to offer a bill meeting my own approval. I have voted for the McNary-Haugen bill every time it has come up, not because I approved it as a whole, but because to my mind it was the best bill in sight and was really better than no bill at all, and I was glad to support it. I hoped it could be passed and its faults remedied from time to time. I have not heretofore favored in toto any bill because to my mind all of these bills failed in certain respects. To begin with, all of the bills heretofore introduced—and I say this with all kindness to those who have introduced them—failed to help the farmer directly. They all provided for the setting up of machinery, organizations, and so forth, and so on, through which we would attempt to help the farmer. Again, all of these bills, as the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] said a little while ago, provided certain machinery or organizations to buy all of the farmer's product when it was selling at a depressed price, thereby taking the farmer's product away from him at a loss to the farmer, with this organization all the while hoping to make a profit out of the farmer's product, after it had passed from the hands of the individual farmer. That would only add one more speculator to the already too large a list.

Mr. ARENTZ. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANKFORD. Yes.

Mr. ARENTZ. We have taken from under the provisions of the trust act the farmers' cooperative associations and we have passed the warehousing and classification act for cotton. That is not exactly the correct wording of the act, but that is what it means. You take a bale of cotton; you grade the cotton and put it in a warehouse; then you create a cooperative organization; and if you will add to that some finance corporation which will take care of the cotton that rests in the warehouse and market it in an orderly way it seems to me you will take care of cotton.

Mr. LANKFORD. I think my bill does that and goes much further than that in many very vital respects. I have been endeavoring, as I said, to work out some plan to help the individual farmer hold his cotton and get a better price for his cotton when the cotton does go up. I have tried to work out a plan to help the farmer directly in his attempt to hold his cotton. I have furthermore tried to work out a plan which would set up an organization of the farmers' friends, not his enemies, to handle his problems, and then I have been most anxious to work out a bill which would solve the overproduction problem.

The great objection to the McNary-Haugen bill and the other farm relief bills is that to my mind they provide no proper control of the overproduction problem. We all admit that if we help the farmer get a better price for his product, without some kind of control of production, the incentive is there to produce more, and as fast as he produces more to the extent of an unusually large surplus he tears down the machinery which we set up in his behalf; and every bill must necessarily have failure written on its face if it does not carry with it some method to control the overproduction of these basic commodities.

The McNary-Haugen bill attempts to control this by an equalization fee. I do not like the idea of an equalization fee, and I voted for the McNary-Haugen bill in spite of the equalization fee provision.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. LANKFORD. I will be glad to yield.

Mr. BLANTON. After you collect the equalization fee out of the commodity and raise a fund to take care of the surplus and hold it and market it, and after you have marketed it and made a big profit on it, why does not the McNary-Haugen bill distribute that profit back to the farmers who raised the commodity?

Mr. LANKFORD. That is a good objection to the bill and is one of the objections I had to it.

Mr. BLANTON. If they had proposed to distribute that profit back to the producers the bill would have been much stronger.

Mr. LANKFORD. That is one objection I had to the McNary-Haugen bill, even though I voted for it, and it is the objection I have to a great many of the other proposed farm-relief measures.

Let me now tell you what I have attempted to do to solve this problem. I have introduced a bill to create the farmers' finance corporation, and I do not care if they take my bill and call it the McNary-Haugen bill or anything else they please. I think the plan of my bill is good, and I want to see it enacted into law in behalf of the farmer.

Mr. BLANTON. If it ever comes out of the committee it will be reintroduced by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] and will be called the McNary-Haugen bill.

Mr. LANKFORD. And I would consider it an honor, and it would be a pleasure and a privilege to lend my help in putting into any bill provisions that would help the American farmer, regardless of what name the bill might go by. "A rose by any other name would smell as sweet."

My bill creating the farmers finance corporation provides for a corporation created somewhat along the lines of the War Finance Corporation. I used the first six or seven sections of the War Finance Corporation act as a basis for my bill, simply changing the wording from War Finance Corporation to farmers' finance corporation.

I provide in this bill that the farmers' finance corporation shall lend money through the banks of the country to the individual farmer at the average which the commodities brought for the last 10 years, provided those planting 75 per cent of the acreage of the commodity, cotton, wheat, corn, tobacco, or other basic products have signed a contract with each other, with the bank through which they do business, and with this corporation, binding them to let the cotton advisory council or the wheat advisory council or whatever commodity advisory council it may be, determine what reduction of acreage shall be made from year to year so as not to probably produce a surplus.

This contract must be signed before they get the relief. The relief goes directly to the individual farmer to help the individual farmer hold his product, and when the price goes up he still owns it and gets the increase in price. This contract must be signed by those planting 75 per cent of the acreage of the commodity before the law becomes binding or at least before operations begin as to that particular commodity.

Some people may say, "Oh, the farmers will not sign that contract." If the farmers will not sign the contract, then they receive no benefit under it. It is more or less of a 50-50 proposition.

Under my bill Congress would practically say to the American farmer that the great problem is overproduction, and we will help you become independent if you will work together for your own good.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANKFORD. With pleasure.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. I am very much interested in the statement made by the gentleman who wants to make possible no surplus of farm products in this country. Suppose there is a large and increasing production throughout the world, how is the gentleman going to keep the production of wheat from Australia, Russia, and South America, as well as other products of those countries, from flooding this country after you have fixed the price under your bill?

Mr. LANKFORD. So far as products being brought in from other countries is concerned, we keep products from other countries out of this country in behalf of the manufacturers, and I think we can do the same thing in behalf of the farmers.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. Why does not the gentleman say we would have to do this by a protective tariff?

Mr. LANKFORD. I am in favor of a protective tariff for those things which help my farmers when the Republicans are voting a protective tariff on everything that hurts my farmers. I favor a protective tariff on farm products, especially when there is a protective tariff provided by the party now in power on manufactured articles which the farmer must buy.

Mr. ROBSION of Kentucky. If my friend will permit, would not that be the only way you could keep out this surplus from the other countries of the world—by a protective tariff?

Mr. LANKFORD. Probably that would be true, and I would certainly favor that kind of tariff under those circumstances.

Mr. JONES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANKFORD. Yes.

Mr. JONES. A protective tariff would not enable the farmer to dispose of a surplus that he had in this country, would it?

Mr. LANKFORD. No; it would not do that.

Mr. JONES. It would not begin to solve that problem?

Mr. LANKFORD. Oh, no.

Mr. JONES. And on most stable farm commodities we produce a surplus in this country.

Mr. LANKFORD. Yes. However, I do not want to make a tariff speech at this time.

Mr. LEAVITT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANKFORD. Yes; but after this I must decline to yield further, as I want to explain my bill more in detail.

Mr. LEAVITT. Is it not true that practically all farm products are now under a protective tariff?

Mr. LANKFORD. But it is also true that you can not put a tariff on enough farm products to overcome the evil done the farmers by the tariff on the stuff he buys.

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman will permit, in respect of the question asked by my colleague from Texas [Mr. JONES], the debenture plan proposed by the National Grange would cover that matter.

Mr. JONES. I thoroughly agree with the gentleman and I would like to see that plan enacted into law.

Mr. LANKFORD. The debenture plan, to my mind, is too indirect. It seeks to help the man who has bought cotton, for instance. Let us help the grower and not the buyer. If I have time, I will refer to the debenture plan again before I resume my seat.

Mr. BLANTON. In the gentleman's proposed bill does it provide that any profits that are made from the final handling and marketing of that product are to be distributed back to the producer?

Mr. LANKFORD. My bill enables the farmer to hold any product until the price goes up so that he can get the increase in price. So, of course, he would get the benefit of the increase. That is one of the best provisions in my bill. Let me say this, for I will not have time to go through with the bill in detail, the plan I am presenting to-day for your consideration has in it the beginning of a scheme by which, to my mind, the farmers can work out their financial salvation. Is it not a good scheme, a good plan, a workable idea, to simply say to the American farmer, Here is your great problem—that of overproduction. We are willing to help you solve it, we are willing to help you market your crops in an orderly way, but before we do that we want you to do something in the matter of controlling production.

In other words, Mr. Chairman, my idea is to endeavor to control the production of basic commodities by a contract made by the farmers with each other and with the banks and with the organization providing that the Government gives them certain aid and assistance, and that they do certain things in their own behalf in return.

As far as I know that idea never has been put in the form of a bill heretofore.

Now, I want to say that after I introduced this bill as a separate bill (H. R. 77), I took the McNary-Haugen bill as title 1 and then put my bill in as title 2, and reintroduced the two in one as H. R. 7739. These bills can be passed as one bill. If the people growing cotton decide that they want to operate under my bill—that is, under title 2 of H. R. 7739—enabling the farmers to hold their product, there will be no necessity of going any further. The growers of wheat might want to operate under title 1 and there would be no necessity for their attempting to begin operations under title 2. My bill has a complete referendum in it. It requires that the contract shall run for two years, and unless 75 per cent of the farmers sign it it does not go into operation, and then 10 per cent more must sign within one year, making 85 per cent, and then 10 per cent more within the next two years, making it 95 per cent. If the farmers do not like the plan, the contracts are for only two years and they do not have to renew them.

Mr. SHREVE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANKFORD. I shall be glad to.

Mr. SHREVE. In the last analysis will the gentleman's bill limit production?

Mr. LANKFORD. My bill would help the farmers to enter into a contract with each other, the banks and the corporations controlling the production of a particular commodity. They would control it as a matter of contract, and not as a matter of law.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANKFORD. Yes.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Where is the money to come from?

Mr. LANKFORD. Just where it comes from in all of these bills, from the Government, by an appropriation for this purpose. My bill provides that the Government shall own the stock and put up the money just as the Government did in the War Finance Corporation.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. How much of an appropriation does the gentleman's bill provide?

Mr. LANKFORD. Five hundred million dollars.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Does the Government ever get it back?

Mr. LANKFORD. No; unless the corporation liquidates. If the corporation ever liquidates, the Government, owning the stock, would get the benefit of it.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Who pays the losses?

Mr. LANKFORD. Well, it would result just the same as in the War Finance Corporation. Let me say this: Many are willing to lose money in the shipping business. We are losing money and putting great burdens on the farmers, helping manufacturing interests; many are willing to spend money helping the railroads, but those same people say, "For God's sake, don't pass any legislation for the farmer; you might lose some money of the Government."

I am willing that money shall be spent in helping the farmer just as it is being lost in helping shipping, manufacturing, or the banking interests of the country. I do not believe the Government would lose any money on this proposition, because if the farmers control production within reasonable bounds they can control their own prices as manufacturers do and other concerns do to-day. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, let me say briefly before my time expires that my bill represents my best conclusions on the subject of farm relief after months and years of most careful study of the matter.

It is a most important subject and requires much time in order to discuss any bill fully. There are many features of my bill that would require much more time than I am now allotted.

I will be heard again and again by speech, extension of remarks, in appearances before the committees, and otherwise in behalf of my bill. I am sure it is a good plan and I want you to understand it and I am sure you will then agree with me.

If my bill does what I think it does, it is the best farm bill ever written.

I am sure a careful study of the bill will convince anyone that I am right. Here is what I claim it would do for the farmer, which the other bills either fail to do or do in an indefinite way:

My bill helps the farmer directly and not indirectly—puts the money in his own pocket instead of in the pocket of some one for him to be delivered to him after certain expenses are paid.

The farmers' finance corporation under my bill would loan the money to the farmer through the banks, letting the banks make 1 per cent, and getting the money to the individual farmer at 5 per cent or less. The loan would be made to the farmer and not to some one else for him who could charge him an unreasonable profit for getting it for him.

The loan being made to the individual farmer at the average which his product has sold for the last 10 years, the individual farmer would be able to hold his own cotton until it advanced in price and get the benefit of the increase instead of selling his commodity to some other organization, as provided in other bills, and thus losing the increase of price brought about by the holding of cotton or reduction of acreage.

The help of curtailment of acreage under my bill will inure to the benefit of the farmer who has held over his cotton because of the loan and he will also receive an increase of price on what he makes on the reduced acreage. He gets the increase on the hold over and on the new production, while under the other bills he would not help on the hold over, for he could not hold over but must sell, in most instances, to the organization helped by the Government or some one else.

My bill makes clear and definite the rights of the farmer under it. The other bills do not. Take the debenture plan, for instance; it would cost the Government much money in an effort to help the farmer by helping the exporter of cotton. I can not now discuss that plan in full. It would require an entire speech for that purpose, but all who understand that plan must admit that it would help the man or concern who buys the farmer's product when he goes to ship his commodity across the ocean. Would this help the farmer? Maybe it would. The question is, Would the benefit which the exporter gets ever ooze through to the farmer? I fear very little would. The help in this way is too indirect. I want direct help. I do not at all like to help the higher up on the theory that some of the help will eventually ooze through half a dozen pockets of the profiteers of the country to the farmers. Let us help the farmers and not other people, on the theory that perhaps the farmer will some time in some way get a little of the drippings from the fingers or pockets of the speculators.

Again my bill cuts out all red tape and only uses the banks which are already in existence and allows them a definite profit. The help under my bill is definite and anyone can tell any farmer exactly the help he will get if the bill goes into effect as to cotton or any other commodity.

Who can tell the farmer what help he will get under the McNary-Haugen bill? We can more easily tell him what he will lose. All we can hope for is that he will gain more than he will lose.

Who can tell the farmer who grows cotton how much money arising from the debenture plan will ooze through the pockets of those who have bought the farmer's cotton and that it will happen to fall where the farmer can get it?

Who can tell the farmer how much help he will get under some of the other so-called farm relief bills which set up expensive machinery to buy the farmers' products at a loss to the farmers and hold these products, not for a profit to the farmer who has sold his commodity but for a profit to the organization? How much will the farmer get when the next year after he has cut his acreage and cotton starts up and this cotton which has been held over not by the farmer but by the organization under the terms of the law is dumped back on the market to break the price?

My bill would help the farmer curtail production by mutual contract for the benefit of the farmer. Some of the other bills would attempt to make the farmer curtail by the harsh punishment of financial loss in order to run up the price of what they had bought from the farmer.

My bill authorizes the appointment of the advisory commodity council by the governors of the States producing the particular commodity to be handled rather than by the President of the United States. This would put the control of production and marketing in the hands of the friends of the farmers. The governors of the cotton-growing States, for instance, could select better men for the cotton growers than could be selected by the President.

I know right now that some one will say that all Federal officers will have to be appointed by the President or some one selected by him if they are not elective. I have thought of this phase of the matter and am convinced that under my bill the advisory council would not be Federal officers, but would only be officers called into being by a contract and only recognized as officials helping carry out the contract for the control of production and marketing, and so forth. I have no fear on this account, and shall be very glad to argue this phase of the matter more fully later.

Again my bill is good because it is only an offer to the farmers. They can refuse it if they do not like it. It does not at all force anything on them they may not like.

But I must conclude. I shall argue various features of my bill again from time to time.

In conclusion let me say that in my humble judgment my bill would put the control of the farmer's great problems in the hands of his friends, not his enemies; would help the farmer directly not indirectly; provides a complete solution of the overproduction problem; would enable the farmer within reasonable bounds to name his own price for his commodity; would put him for the first time on a parity with other enterprises and industries. [Applause.]

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 40 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ACKERMAN].

Mr. ACKERMAN. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, as has been explained by Chairman SHREVE, this bill, making appropriations for the Departments of State, Justice, Commerce, and Labor for the fiscal year 1929, carries appropriations amounting to $89,047,985.14. It covers a great variety of items embracing a multitude of subjects. In preparing it for submission to the whole committee great credit must be accorded to the chairman of the subcommittee, Mr. SHREVE, as well as to the Messrs. OLIVER and GRIFFIN, who spent a large part of last summer in visiting by rail, by water, by motor, and by airplane not only the entire boundary line of the United States so as to have first-hand information as regards border patrol, but the needs of steamboat inspection and coast survey work, the needs of the Federal reformatories, the problems of Alaska and other outlying possessions, and many other of the Government's activities. All the items for this work came before the subcommittee. They normally elicit a thousand pages of hearings. This year the testimony crowds 1,200 pages.

By reason of the great care that Subchairman SHREVE manifests on all occasions, a full picture is secured of the departmental activities for all who desire to read the hearings built up by the appearance and testimony of those who justify the amounts which have been suggested by the Budget for the conduct of the various bureaus.

I shall not, of course, trespass upon the ground that the other members of the committee have discussed, but as I have been graciously permitted this time I shall call attention to a few items in which I have become interested.

Since 1922 we have enjoyed practically uninterrupted prosperity. In 1926 our national income reached $89,000,000,000. This amount is an increase of 33 per cent over 1920. What the figures for 1927 shall be can only be estimated at this time, but it appears that on the whole the average will be maintained and the outlook for 1928 is most promising and high authorities are so optimistic that it would seem to border on the fantastic to quote them. There is but one factor which may tend to lower it, and the President referred to it in his message to this Congress.

He said, after pointing out that—

> The country as a whole has had a prosperity never exceeded—

That—

> Some parts of agriculture and industry have lagged; some localities have suffered from storm and flood. But such losses have been absorbed without serious detriment to our great economic structure.

My opinion as the reason we were able to absorb these losses without any serious effects is because of existing conditions reared upon fundamentally sound principles both as to Government and individual enterprise, the continuance of the protective tariff, and the abstention of the Government in business.

This bill, perhaps more than any other, appropriates money which is to be used in protecting, maintaining, and strengthening our economic structure through cooperation with agencies of production and industry in general.

It is of this cooperation and the accomplishments and achievements which have flowed from it in the past that I would like to speak. My remarks must necessarily be only on some of the more outstanding instances. The field is so broad and the activities so diversified that to go into all of them would consume much more time than I have at my disposal.

Before getting into the explanation, or citation, if you please, of these activities, I would ask you to keep in mind and associate very largely with them the satisfactory condition of the American public. It is estimated there are 28,000,000 families in the United States, and that 13,000,000 of them own their homes. This represents a huge investment on the part of the home owners and those who have houses for renting purposes. The conservation of this property is not by any means the least of our responsibilities as legislators, and it can best be done by keeping our country prosperous and at peace. The living standards of the people, the character of their homes, depend in no small measure on the smooth functioning of a great group of related industries.

One of the great bureaus in the Department of Commerce is that of the Bureau of Standards, which was established as a branch of the Treasury Department by the act approved March 3, 1901. It was transferred to the Department of Commerce and Labor upon the establsihment of that department in 1903. The organic act provided for the purchase of a site for the bureau and the erection of laboratories. Under this authority a site of 8 acres was selected on Connecticut Avenue, and two laboratories now known as the North and South Buildings were constructed. From time to time Congress has appropriated funds for additions to the site and for additional laboratories until now the bureau's grounds have a total of about 43 acres, and its plant consists of 10 major and 7 minor buildings. In addition, a power-plant building is under construction, which it is expected will be completed by next spring. The personnel of the bureau has grown from 14 in 1901 to 839 in 1927.

One of the basic functions of the Bureau of Standards is to establish and maintain the national standards of quantitative measurement. The bureau is the custodian of the country's official standards of measurement. When necessary it constructs, tests, and calibrates new standards, and compares the measuring apparatus used in scientific investigations, and in engineering, manufacturing, and commerce, with the official standards. The statutes authorize the bureau to conduct scientific investigations of problems connected with the development and application of standards, and to determine the properties and characteristics of different materials, such as the thermal expansion of dental materials; the fluidity of lubricating oils; the melting point of metals; the boiling point of liquids; the conductivity of insulating materials; the tensile strength of steel; and the like. Generally speaking, this work is limited to data which are of urgent importance to scientific or manufacturing interests and are not readily obtainable elsewhere. While there is invariably an immediate and practical objective, yet facts and principles are often discovered which are of great value as contributions to the general fund of scientific knowledge.

Essentially the Bureau of Standards is a scientific and technical laboratory for service to the industries of the country and the various departments of the Government. Some 350 specialized scientists trained in physics, chemistry, and engineering are at work on problems involving the quality of materials and the testing of the commodities of commerce. According to information given me by Dr. George H. Burgess, the Director of the Bureau of Standards, in making a tour of inspection of the bureau's buildings one is impressed with the number of completely equipped small-scale manufacturing plants which form part of the facilities of many of the sections. Thus, in the metallurgical division will be found a foundry, heat-treating plant, rolling mill, forging press, wire-drawing outfit, and so forth. The textile section includes a complete cotton mill, the paper section has everything necessary for producing paper of any kind in sheets up to 25 inches wide, the rubber section has its mill and vulcanizing plant, and the leather section its miniature tannery. The glass section is particularly noteworthy, because here will be found one of the finest plants for producing optical glass in the United States. In this particular case the laboratory is of necessity a production plant, for it is only by making optical glass in considerable quantities that the difficult technique can be improved.

After inspecting these plants the visitor realizes that it is often necessary for the laboratory workers to turn plant superintendent. The question, then, naturally arises, how successful is the scientific man when he takes up the problems of manufacturing?

The work of the Bureau of Standards may help us to answer this question. Let us review briefly the recent accomplishments of some of the scientific sections, beginning with optical glass. I am informed that prior to 1914 not one pound of optical glass was made in the United States. Although we had some of the finest lens makers in the world, they had all worked with foreign glass. When the war came our supply of this essential material was cut off and several laboratories in this country started research work, with the object of learning to make optical glass. Among these laboratories was the Bureau of Standards.

The bureau started this investigation in what was then its Pittsburgh laboratory. The whole process from the raw materials to the finished product had to be worked out, because the foreign glassmakers had already jealously guarded their secrets. Even the process of making the refractory crucibles or pots in which the materials are melted had to be developed. In this work the bureau cooperated with other research laboratories and with glass-making plants, and as the result of these cooperative efforts, a good grade of optical glass was turned out by 1917, when the United States entered the war.

The glass section of the bureau has been making optical glass ever since. During the fiscal year 1927 approximately 21,000 pounds of glass of four different kinds were made, and 21,441 lens blanks of various sizes were turned over to the optical shop of the Navy Department to be used in the construction of instruments. In 1923 a 12-inch telescope objective of 12½ feet focal length was made, the entire work from melting the raw ingredients to figuring the lens having been done by the bureau. Last May an even more ambitious piece of work was started. At that time there was cast by a special process a glass disk for reflecting telescope. The disk measures 70 inches in diameter and is 12½ inches thick. At the present time it is in a specially constructed annealing furnace where it is being slowly cooled and from which it will not be removed till next February. Of course, it is impossible to state at this time whether the job will prove a success, but if so, it will be a piece of work the like of which has never been attempted in this country and which has been successfully accomplished but a few times abroad. In this case a scientific bureau may be said to have set the pace for the regular manufacturers.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. ACKERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. TILSON. Has any of this optical glass been sold to the public?

Mr. ACKERMAN. I understand that 21,000 of the lens blanks have been turned over to the optical shop of the Navy Department.

For some time the bureau has been studying the properties of high-speed steels used for making cutting tools. An important part of the work is a study of the effect of various impurities on the performance of the finished tool. In order to secure results of any value it is necessary first to make up other tools containing known kinds and amounts of impurities. The whole process of manufacturing high-speed tools is a difficult one, and commercial toolmakers insist that this grade of steel can only be produced after long experience and with a specially equipped plant. Nevertheless the Washington Navy Yard and the bureau working together have made quantities of high-speed tools, beginning with raw materials and ending with the tool ready for service. In tests of the tools on actual lathes, turning up heavy forgings in the Naval Gun Factory, the Government-made tools have stood up as well as any commercial tools on the market. Of course, the Bureau of Standards has no intention of going into the steel business, but when it had to make tools in order to conduct an important investigation it was able to do the job in a thoroughly satisfactory manner.

Very pure platinum is needed in many lines of work at the bureau. This is melted and purified by special processes, drawn into wire, and spun into crucibles. So successful has this work been that the bureau is in possession of platinum much purer than any that can be bought from regular dealers; in fact such impurities as are present exist in such small amounts that they can only be detected by means of the spectroscope. Chemical analysis will not reveal them.

While on the subject of metallurgy it should be remembered that the bureau operates a small foundry, where many special castings are made for the bureau's instrument shop and even for other branches of the Government. As in other fields the bureau does not expect to compete with commercial foundries, but it takes up work which they are not at all anxious to attempt. Many peculiar alloys and very pure metals are handled, and in practically all cases valuable data are secured on the behavior of metals and on foundry practice.

During the war munitions were made in hundreds of plants scattered all over the country. In order to have all the pieces fit together at the point of assembly it was necessary to use a great many standard gauges for controlling the dimensions of machined parts. The shop gauges, in turn, had to be based on precise master standards, known as gauge blocks. Up till the time of the war all the gauge blocks in use were produced by a single firm in Sweden. Naturally, the supply ran short, and a serious situation was impending when the bureau came to the rescue. An Army officer, Major Hoke, developed at the bureau a special process for making these blocks far more quickly and cheaply than ever before. A shop was fitted up in one of the buildings equipped with special machinery, and soon American-made gauge blocks were available for the military services and for ordnance manufacturers. Many sets were made by the bureau, and, in addition, the method was turned over to American toolmakers, who were able to supply a satisfactory product on a commercial basis.

Portable metal spraying plants were developed and constructed by the bureau for the Navy Department and the process was brought to a practical point and was actually used in several different ways.

As we mentioned at the start, the bureau has always cooperated closely with manufacturers, and whenever possible it has not only experimented with production on a small scale in its semicommercial plants but has secured the cooperation of industries to try out the processes under commercial conditions. An interesting illustration of what may be accomplished by this kind of cooperative work is found in the dextrose industry.

For over 40 years the corn-products industries sought to discover a commercially practicable method for producing chemically pure glucose, a white crystalline product similar in appearance to granulated sugar. Some sort of a pure, cheap carbohydrate food, similar to sugar but without its sweetening power, was greatly needed in the condensed milk, ice cream, baking, and other industries. As the result of a long series of laboratory experiments, followed by experience in a semicommercial plant, the bureau discovered how to crystallize pure dextrose from its water solution. The commercial success of the project was known to hinge on this accomplishment. The bureau secured the cooperation of a manufacturer and sent a member of its staff to a large sugar refinery, where at the first attempt he succeeded in throwing down 4,000 pounds of pure dextrose. This first successful production took place only a little more than four years ago. To-day several million dollars are invested in dextrose refineries in this country and abroad. During 1926 this industry produced over 200,000,000 pounds of crystalline dextrose, valued at about $10,000,000.

It is also believed that there are great possibilities for the recovery of gums, sugars, and cellulose from the waste products of the farm. A preliminary survey has been made in the fields of cotton, peanuts, and cornstalks. The bureau has several tons of cornstalks on hand at the Iowa Agricultural College and expects to begin at once the processing of these stalks. Chemical work on peanut shells has demonstrated what conditions are best for hydrolysis of shells and has produced a mixture of organic acids, which is now being analyzed.

Wall board has been made from the insoluble residue. Cotton burrs and cottonseed hulls have been analyzed by regular methods of organic analysis and the bureau is now analyzing the constituent parts—fat, crude fiber, and ash.

Many other examples of what has been accomplished when a scientist turns manufacturer might be given, but the ones cited prove what can be done along this line. They could be duplicated by consulting the records of many other research laboratories within and outside the Government service.

So far as the Bureau of Standards is concerned, it does not claim to have accomplished these successful results in the manufacture of materials single handed. It has been greatly helped by the cooperation of the industries themselves. It does believe, however, that the laboratory man with an unprejudiced point of view has often been able to suggest improvements that have escaped the notice of those concerned purely with the commercial side of the work, and has been able to demonstrate the value of scientific theories by applying them to actual production methods.

Just here I would like to discuss a matter in connection with the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce. The bureau had prepared for me a statement showing a comparison of exports and imports for the last six and a half years, with the yearly average of postwar years, using the value of the dollar at the present time at 66⅔ cents, in order to bring the value of the postwar dollar to that of the pre-war dollar. I insert this table and call the attention of the committee to the fact that in the postwar period from January 1921, to June 30, 1927, there were $4,486,226,000 yearly average worth of exports for that period. The exports to the 12 principal countries comprising 63 per cent of our entire exports, or $2,787,173,000—and valued at $1,858,117,000 at 66⅔ cents per dollar, as compared with the pre-war average from 1910 to 1914, were 17 per cent greater than the pre-war average exports.

The 12 countries referred to are the United Kingdom, Germany, Belgium, France, Italy, Greece, the Netherlands, Denmark, Norway, Sweden, and Canada.

Our imports, using the same postwar average and the value of the dollar and the pre-war average, shows that they have increased 7 per cent, thus showing that trade does increase as far as imports are concerned, even though the protective tariff is alleged to hamper imports.

Increased protection against invasion of our domestic markets by certain classes of foreign goods is essential. We must assist our producers to find an increased sale for their goods at home as well as abroad. We should insist on American materials being used by the Government at all times, the prices and quality being the same. Other nations have sent commissions here to study conditions, to learn more about our products, our processes, and methods, to the end that they may profit by our experiences. We are getting stiffer competition from foreign manufacturers and must be prepared to meet it.

Because standards of living in America are higher than in other parts of the world, production and distribution costs are relatively higher. To help maintain the present volume of this country's export sales efforts need be extended toward increasing the demand abroad for articles manufactured here.

The British have done some notable work along this line, expending, according to a statement of an official of the British Government, more than £20,000 sterling for the translation, printing, and distribution of publications in Spanish, French, Italian, and Portuguese extolling the virtues of British-made goods. At the time this statement was made a campaign was launched to set aside some £50,000 to continue the work on a broader scale.

We, in our Department of Commerce, have doubled our appropriations as a whole, the appropriation in 1922 being $17,262,060 and in 1928, $36,627,450. In this estimate for last year and the coming one is an appropriation for investigations designed to discover uses for waste farm products, to which I alluded when discussing the Bureau of Standards.

The Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce maintains local offices in 23 cities—

Atlanta, Boston, Chicago, Detroit, Des Moines, Galveston, Houston, Jacksonville (Fla.), Kansas City, Louisville, Los Angeles, Memphis, Minneapolis, Mobile, New Orleans, New York, Norfolk, Philadelphia, Portland (Oreg.), St. Louis, San Francisco, Seattle, Wilmington (Del.).

These offices give aid and advice to the business interests in their respective communities in connection with sales and export problems, when necessary, of course, referring inquiries to the bureau at Washington. They also serve as distributing centers for bureau publications, seeking to place trade information directly in the hands of the persons most vitally interested. Through the cooperation of the local chambers of commerce offices are also maintained, practically without expense to the Government, at 34 important cities, making 57 offices in all. The bureau's sales information reports have grown from 11,684 inquiries in 1921 to 65,970 inquiries in 1926, an increase of over 550 per cent.

The item in this bill for the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce is $4,162,357, while in 1919 it was only $554,120, a 700 per cent increase. Compare this with the amounts appropriated by other governments for trade-promotive activities and governmental aids to manufacturers and exporters:

France, 24,202,096 francs = $968,000.
Canada, $575,000 = $575,000.
Union of South Africa, £25,000 = $125,000.
Italy, 4,000,000 lira = $200,000.
Japan, 1,961,923 yen = $980,000.

Aside from its purely trade and commerce activities in the generally accepted sense of those terms, the Department of Commerce has under its control far-flung agencies for the protection of navigation, according to information furnished me by the Director of the Coast and Geodetic Survey, Col. E. Lester Jones.

This survey has been rendering public service of tremendous practical importance for the past 111 years. Year by year both the volume and the importance of this service increases and, coincident with this, more and more efficient and economical methods are devised in order to keep pace with the increased demands made upon the bureau by the public.

The Coast and Geodetic Survey is charged with producing charts of the coastal waters of the United States and its possessions for the aid and protection of shipping entering our ports. These charts are indispensable to commerce, to economic development, and to the flow of commodities. As commerce increases, the demand for maritime charts and for the nautical publications of the bureau increases in direct proportion.

During the past year this bureau produced 246,836 charts—an increase of about 15,000 over the preceding year. This was the largest production for any year in its history with the exception of the period of the World War when, of course, the demand was unprecedented. Efficiency and economy of operation are strikingly emphasized in the fact that last year almost as many charts were produced as during the war, and yet the bureau was operating with less than its normal personnel in its chart division.

During 1927 the bureau increased its output of nautical publications very materially over the previous year. The distribution of its Coast Pilots, for example, showed an increase of 24 per cent, while the distribution of its Current Tables showed an increase of 26 per cent.

These increases are tangible evidence not only of national prosperity, as reflected in commercial growth, but also that the Coast and Geodetic Survey is doing its full share in promoting that prosperity.

In addition to its production of maritime charts, this bureau also has charge of executing control surveys in the interior of the country. It has been so successful in this branch of its work that it is internationally recognized as the greatest geodetic organization in the world. Its geodetic or control surveys are necessary in making all detailed surveys and topographic maps. They are indispensable in engineering projects, road building, and power development. Undertaken primarily for the purpose of checking the accuracy of nautical charts, the geodetic work of the bureau has developed to the point where engineers and surveyors everywhere are making extensive use of it in their local projects. As one single example of the importance of this work, no comprehensive plan of water-power development or flood control is feasible until after the Coast and Geodetic Survey or some other agency has executed the necessary leveling surveys.

One of the outstanding accomplishments of the past year was the hydrographic survey work done along the coasts of Oregon and Washington and in southeastern Alaska, where three of the survey's ships surveyed an area of 6,500 square miles during a season of about seven months. This unusual feat was made possible through the use of modern survey ships and through using a new echo sounding apparatus developed during the past two years by a number of cooperating agencies of which the survey was one of the most active.

This apparatus measures ocean depths in terms of time required for a sound wave to travel from near the surface of the water to the bottom of the ocean and be echoed back to the ship. After extensive experiments and tests the apparatus has been perfected to the point where it was used with the greatest success during the past year.

With this apparatus it is possible to survey more than twice as much area per day as would be possible by any other means. Thus the Coast and Geodetic Survey has been able to double its output on this class of work, and since no more expense is involved the unit cost of the work is cut squarely in two.

While the primary purpose of developing this apparatus was to speed up hydrographic surveys, the bureau has made an important contribution to mariners everywhere by its participation in development work along this line. This apparatus is useful not only in survey work but also to help vessels to locate their position at any time in thick weather. Safety at sea has thus been enhanced and the survey has added another chapter to its history of promoting the safety of maritime travel.

There has been of late years a decided increase in the demand for tide and current surveys of important harbors adjacent to metropolitan centers. Any survey of this character is of decided value to the mariner, who must have accurate knowledge of the effect of currents on his ship. Of equal or perhaps even more importance is the value of such surveys to engineers who are concerned with problems of sewage disposal, harbor improvements, bridge construction, and so forth.

The Coast and Geodetic Survey has already made tide and current surveys of New York Harbor, San Francisco Harbor, Delaware Bay and River, Boston and Portsmouth, and southeastern Alaska. During the past year such a survey was inaugurated of Chesapeake Bay and its tributaries. During the present year it is hoped to finish this survey.

The Coast and Geodetic Survey has also designed one of the most wonderful machines devised by man—the tide-predicting machine. By the simple setting of a number of wheels and dials, the turning of the crank foretells the times and heights of high and low waters at any place in the world and for any year, past or future. As an indication of the progress which the survey is continually making it is interesting to note that recently this machine has also been adapted to the prediction of currents in important waterways and harbors, likewise of great value to the mariner.

An added duty of the bureau, imposed upon it during the past year, is the production of airway strip maps for aviators. With the development of commercial aviation, this service will be of increasing value to the people. The problem of the aviator is in large measure the same as the problem of the navigator, and although the duty of producing airway maps has added to the already heavy burdens of the survey it was inevitable that the pioneer chart-making agency of the Government should be delegated to perform this important duty.

These are some of the high spots in the service which the Coast and Geodetic Survey, the oldest scientific bureau in the Government, is rendering to the people of the United States. It has the confidence and respect of the public, and it is ever striving to so maintain its service that it will continue to be worthy of that confidence and respect.

The Bureau of Lighthouses is another "off-land" function performed by the Department of Commerce. During the past year the great Mississippi River flood placed an extra load on this business. In April and May the vessels and men of the Lighthouse Service cooperated in rescue work and made a notable record in maintaining the lights in their charge under great difficulties.

According to information given me by the Director of the Bureau of Lighthouses, at the end of the year 1926 the Lighthouse Service was maintaining a total of 18,363 aids to marine navigation. Although nearly 1,000 new aids were established during the year, the discontinuance of aids is kept under investigation as the original necessity for their maintenance ceases. Consequently 700 aids of various classes were discontinued during the year, making a net increase of 273 aids for the year. Of the total, 6,577 are lighted and 9,054 are floating.

There were 1,286 miles of airways lighted during the year, and work on 694 additional miles of airways was under contract. The total number of airway aids in commission was 755, including 616 aids formerly maintained by the Post Office Department on the transcontinental airway, which was transferred to the jurisdiction of the Department of Commerce on July 1, 1927.

Among the improvements in aids to marine navigation which have been made during the year the following may be mentioned: Eighty-one lights were changed from fixed to flashing, giving them a much more distinctive character; the illuminant of 7 lights was changed to incandescent oil vapor; also 80 lights (including 15 buoys) were changed to acetylene; and 13 lights changed to electric, producing a considerable increase in brightness. In addition to the 12 radiobeacons already mentioned, 17 sound fog signals were either established or improved for providing more powerful apparatus.

Progress has been continued in the establishment of automatic lights. During the year 54 new lights of this character were established, and 28 lights were changed from attended to automatic. The total number of automatic lights in the Lighthouse Service at the end of the year was 2,033, not including some partially automatic, and consisting of 1,203 lights on fixed structures and 830 lights on buoys. Also there are at present 14 automatically operated fog bells in service.

Upward of 90 instances were reported during the year where members of the Lighthouse Service effected rescues or aided vessels or persons in distress. Many of these acts were especially meritorious and at great personal risk to the lighthouse employees, and in such cases the employees concerned were individually commended by the Secretary of Commerce. A gold medal was awarded by the Secretary of the Treasury to the captain of the lighthouse steamer Columbine in recognition of gallant conduct in rescue work near San Juan Harbor, P. R. The keepers of a lighthouse on the Oregon coast were commended for heroic conduct in the rescue and first-aid treatment of a young man who had fallen over a cliff, 80 feet to the rocks below, and was seriously injured. The scene of the accident was 2 miles from the lighthouse and had to be reached at night by a narrow trail, 8 to 12 inches wide, along the face of the rock cliff above the surf.

According to information from the Patent Office, during the fiscal year 1927 there were 89,360 applications for patents, reissues, and designs received. In addition to 17,503 trade-mark applications, as well as 3,550 applications for renewal of trade-mark registrations, 3,370 label and print applications, 208,841 amendments to patent applications, 6,569 amendments to design applications, and 23,757 amendments to trade-mark, label, and print applications were applied for. These are only a part of the bureaus under the Department of Commerce. Much could be said about the others and the public services they are rendering.

Just at this time the public is much interested in aeronautics because of the great achievements of Colonel Lindbergh and our other airmen. In nearly all of the notable and history-making flights the aviators had the assistance of the Bureau of Aeronautics as well as the Bureau of Standards and more indirectly the radio division.

The Bureau of the Census is one with which the public has been acquainted for generations, and its publications carry a wonderful amount of information, statistical and otherwise, on nearly every phase of human endeavor.

The Bureau of Fisheries, the Bureau of Navigation, the Steamboat Inspection Service, and the Bureau of Mines are other agencies functioning for the well being and safety of the public.

Further time does not permit of going into all the interesting details of these bureaus but, if anyone has the time to peruse even a portion of the hearings, in my opinion, the opportunity will have been employed to their advantage. [Applause.]

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, I now yield two minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR].

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD upon the subject of the Greek refugee settlement provision.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. LEHLBACH). The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Chairman, when in Athens last summer I went through one of the large Greek settlements where refugees have been brought back from Turkey. About 1,400,000 Greeks in all were brought back, and something over $50,000,000 to date expended by the commission. To show how coincidences may occur, within an hour I received a letter from the president of the commission, Mr. Charles B. Eddy, the first communication I have had from him for six months, in which he says that they have had a settlement in Geneva of the American claims with Greece and that $12,000,000 additional has been loaned by the American Government for the use of Greek refugees.

It is not possible for all Members of Congress to visit countries of Europe that are still suffering from the effects of the World War or from general economic depression. It is equally impossible at long range fully to comprehend conditions in those countries, both internal and external.

Expense, time, and lack of opportunity generally prohibits us from getting such information first hand, but I believe in no other way can a reasonably clear understanding of European problems be reached. It is especially true of some of the smaller countries and of those not ordinarily visited by the tourist. Four years ago I spent several months in Russia, Poland, Georgia, and Armenia, off the beaten path, and last summer I visited as far south and east as Greece and Turkey and as far north as Trondjhem, in the Arctic Circle. In no other way can one learn from personal knowledge just how others live.

Their problems, their aspirations, and their future is of great moment to them and often to us. Generally speaking, the southern countries of Europe have not yet forgotten the World War. More gaily uniformed soldiers wearing swords and side arms were seen on the streets of Belgrade, Yugoslavia, during my brief visit in that country than would be found in all American cities combined in a year's time. At Bulgaria's border, when crossing over from Turkey, soldiers with fixed bayonets marched on either side of our car while their customs officers went through the train looking for trouble and trouble makers. These people have not yet recovered from the last war, yet peace seems farther removed than a quarter of a century ago. New boundaries made by the Versailles treaty have not brought peace.

Hatreds, jealousies, and fears dating back for centuries can not be smothered when on all sides people of suspicious nationalities patrol the borders between neighboring nations, but after such trips we discover that these people of Europe, who help make up our American civilization, when thrown into the melting pot on this side of the Atlantic become strong citizens.

In Greece the precious passport I held was inspected by five different functionaries, from deck hands to fierce-looking descendants of the men who once whipped Xerxes. This occurred before we were allowed to pass through the gates of Piræus, the port of Athens.

It is not my purpose to attempt a prosaic account of European travels even in the outlying districts, because many Members have felt the call in the past and others will cover the same ground in the future, possibly far more profitably, but I desire briefly to express the gratitude every American must feel toward American ambassadors, ministers, and consuls in Europe who make it possible for us to see and learn things first-hand. Overrun with American tourists, undoubtedly they individually and collectively sigh for respite, but I wish to record my appreciation of the kindness and courtesies invariably extended by our diplomatic and commercial representatives in every country visited and for their active aid in meeting foreign officials. Even foreign officials, who are long-suffering because of drafts made upon their time, with rare exceptions were always courteous and helpful.

Any one of a dozen of the countries visited would afford a text for remarks affecting present conditions, political and economic, but I am leaving that task for others better able to perform, while I submit a few brief observations regarding a sorely distressed country that over 20 centuries ago was a world center.

The American Government and the Greek Government are both fortunate to have at this time a resident official in Athens with the unusual experience and ability of American Minister Skinner. I believe he is the oldest American diplomatic official in length of service in the State Department. That in itself would be a guarantee of ability to handle successfully the many complex and perplexing problems that beset the Greeks and our relations with that country. In like manner, Gardner Richardson, our commercial attaché, is an unusual representative, whose efforts have largely increased trade relations between the two countries. These Americans and others are seeking to aid the Greek Government through its officials to meet present economic difficulties, complicated with political disturbances, that confront that people to-day. One of its stupendous problems relates to an army of over 1,000,000 refugees.

Every Greek refugee settlement is now caring for many thousands of refugees who suffered from Turkish persecutions, and this work, under the League of Nations, is now handled by a capable commission headed by Charles B. Eddy, president, an American. The Greek problem is one of vast magnitude because of lack of resources to meet the demands made by the situation and the innumerable difficulties that have beset those handling the relief work.

Before studying the Greek Government's refugee situation I called at the Near East relief headquarters at Athens, where help, though necessarily extremely limited in character, is being given to Greek orphans. Previously, four years ago, I had been through Near East relief work over in the Caucasus at Tiflis, Georgia, and also at Alexandropol down in Armenia, where 12,000 little orphans were paraded that day for us, dressed in their best clothes, a fine body of children who exhibited by their appearance the care and self-help instruction given by their American teachers. Domestic science and manual training were popular courses down in Armenia. In Kiev and elsewhere we visited Jewish relief work and in Moscow the Friends have a strong organization that affords relief to thousands of needy Russians. All these combined, however, make little impression compared with the Greek relief problem because of the latter's immensity and the additional fact that a vast army of refugees of all ages, sexes, and conditions must be cared for until they can become self-sustaining.

Only through an extensive organization, financed and managed by a great community fund necessarily advanced by outside governments, could this Greek relief work be successfully accomplished. Much more needs to be done and pressing demands will continue for a long time to come but to the splendid members of the organization who everywhere responded willingly and cheerfully is due the grateful thanks of the world that is interested in this fine humanitarian work. I say this at the outset because what little I have to offer, based on my own personal examination, is unqualifiedly in commendation of the relief work now in the hands of the League of Nations. By its extension of credit like that previously given to Austria and other countries the league secured loans for the Greek Government from English and American sources aggregating upward of $50,000,000, and this sum for which the already heavily burdened government is responsible is a fund that has kept hundreds of thousands of Greek refugees from starvation.

I do not intend to discuss massacres, murders, and other violence alleged to have been practiced by the Turks against the Greeks which have a basis of fact according to fairly trustworthy evidence. There are controverted issues, however, wherein it is alleged in Turkey that both Greeks and Turks were responsible for what occurred in Smyrna and elsewhere. After discussing the matter briefly with various people in Constantinople, including Turkish and American officials, with Admiral Bristol and others, I am satisfied that two sides may be presented in any case of the Greeks against the Turks, but it is not so important now to determine the degree of responsibility for what occurred at Smyrna or elsewhere. The work of giving protection and aid to Greek refugees is an outstanding problem that has aroused the sympathy of the world, and it is that splendid work to which I would briefly refer.

To the average person modern Greece is assumed to be without any particular pride in its past or hope for the future. Yet students of history, of philosophy, and of the arts even in this material age find in Grecian history that which saved to us a higher civilization at a time when the world hesitated between progress and reaction. Its soldiers, sailors, statesmen, and philosophers once led the world.

In his recent illuminating story of philosophy, Durant recalls for us things well worth remembering when introducing his great characters with their surroundings. He says:

> If you look at a map of Europe you will observe that Greece is a skeletonlike hand stretching its crooked fingers out into the Mediterranean Sea. South of it lies the great island of Crete from which those grasping fingers captured, in the second millenium before Christ, the beginning of civilization and culture. To the east across the Ægean Sea lies Asia Minor, quiet and apathetic now, but throbbing in pre-Platonic days with industry, commerce, and speculation.
>
> To the west across the Ionian, Italy stands like a leaning tower in the sea and Sicily and Spain, each in those days with thriving Greek colonies; and at the end the Pillars of Hercules (which we call Gibraltar) that somber portal through which no ancient mariner dared to pass * * *. Look at the map and observe the position of Athens; it is the farthest east of the larger cities of Greece. It was favorably placed to be the door through which the Greek passed out to the busy cities of Asia Minor and through which those elder cities sent their luxuries and their culture to adolescent Greece. It had an admirable port, Piræus, where countless vessels might find a haven from the rough water of the sea, and it had a great maritime fleet.
> In 490–470 B. C., Sparta and Athens, forgetting their jealousies and joining their forces, fought off the effort of the Persians under Darius and Xerxes to turn Greece into a colony of an Asiatic empire. In this struggle of youthful Europe against the senile East, Sparta provided the army and Athens the navy * * *. Thereafter Sparta relapsed into agricultural seclusion and stagnation while Athens became a busy mart and port, the meeting place of many races of men and of diverse cults and customs whose contact and rivalry begot comparison, analysis, and thought.

With this introduction the writer in the development of his subject explains why Greece, the center of commerce and culture became likewise the center of the world's philosophy, of science, art, and thought. Historians have depicted the glories of ancient Athens and the wealth and power of Greece. After more than a score of centuries we find that the once proud, powerful race that led the world is now a small, humbled people confronted with heavy burdens that might well stagger a great prosperous country. If we owe any debt to Greece, that a score of centuries ago blazed the way of progress, ours is the opportunity to recognize that fact and to meet such obligation in this twentieth century of world prosperity which we enjoy.

Back in the fifth and fourth centuries B. C., when Athens was in the height of her glory, Agora was the center of that city, and of Grecian activities. Her temples, statuary, and paintings are described by historians to have been beyond comparison in that day and age. Buried far below the surface of the earth for centuries archæoligists have long attempted to bring to light evidencies of those ancient glories.

Various countries have sought to join in the effort to recover these treasures, but after plans failed to materialize it remained for Americans to finance the scheme, and contracts have now been given to that end. The expense will reach several million dollars, and for years to come the attention of archaeologists the world over will be directed to these excavations to be conducted by Americans in the heart of Athens.

When I was there last summer arrangements were about completed, and these involved the removal of hundreds of homes and shops now standing in the area to be excavated. This work in itself is of outstanding importance to the little country that was once a world power, but the recovery of these relics and ancient remains to my mind is of far less value to the world than the saving of lives and upbuilding of over a million Greek refugees who have suddenly been thrust upon the war-exhausted mother country. Whether due to national hatred by the Turks, religious persecutions, or one of the extraordinary horrors of war, by whatever name called, the burning and massacres in Smyrna and persecutions in other parts of Turkey have brought to Greek shores within the last five years a vast horde of miserable, poverty-stricken creatures numbering over fourteen hundred thousand souls.

Their tale of suffering is one of the horrors of modern times. With that I shall not linger, but the story of their gradual regeneration is not so well known. That work, to my mind, is of infinitely more importance than the resurrection of all the buried temples of old Greece, for living temples are being rebuilt in that country to-day by hands outstretched from all over the world working under the direction of the League of Nations.

To indicate the size of the task I quote from a pamphlet published by the World Alliance at Athens, 1925. The indictment from Greek sources in one paragraph alleges:

> During the World War the Turks "first stripped of all belongings and then deported 88,485 Greeks of Thrace, 144,559 of West Asia Minor, and 257,019 of Pontus. * * * This half million of old men, women, and children driven across mountains and plains by Turkish gendarmes and harried at every step by brigands and bloodthirsty Turkish peasantry were practically wiped out by massacre, hunger, cold, and fatigue. * * * The Greek Government lent its aid for the return of the deported population to their homes and for assistance toward their reestablishment. * * * Of the 490,000 persons, 121,000 returned to their homesteads unassisted, while 15,000 more were repatriated through the aid of committees. There remained 355,000 deportees of whom no news could be obtained.

A long list of counts alleges many acts of cruelty, but the above charges have been briefly stated in order to indicate one phase of the problem rather than to set forth the causes that produced it.

The League of Nations through its officials undertook to relieve this distress and in a pamphlet of over 200 pages entitled "Greek Refugee Settlement (Geneva, 1926)" it briefly presents the task:

> The problem presented by the influx of 1,400,000 Greek refugees into a country small in extent, whose population numbered approximately 5,000,000. * * * On the humanitarian side imagination can not compass the event. Only those can understand who have seen destitution, misery, disease, and death in all their possible forms, and the scale of this disaster was so unprecedented as to demand even from such persons a new vision.

The League of Nations established the refugees settlement commission in 1923. When I was in Greece last summer I went through one of the settlements near Piræus, a few miles from Athens. We were accompanied by the Greek refugee settlement commission, including Charles B. Eddy, its president, an American citizen, Sir John Simpson, of England, and Mr. Pallis, a Greek citizen educated at Oxford.

These men who composed the commission were followed on our tour of inspection throughout the settlement by a throng of those whom they were seeking to relieve. Groups of men, women, and children welcomed them on every hand as we passed through the dirt hovels or small shacks built by the refugees. We visited the small frame hospitals, and the little crude homes where thousands yet to be provided for were huddled together, but dirt floors were swept, a homemade chair and table often seen, and so far as able to do so the inhabitants kept their places scrupulously clean. I believe about 50,000 refugees were in this one settlement, which was partially wiped out by a fire after we left last summer, but I was impressed by the evidences of self-help and gratitude expressed by this large city of persecuted poverty-stricken refugees.

Although the commission that accompanied us was greeted with warmth, the poverty and destitution of these refugees seen on every hand makes the problem of relief one not easily described nor comprehended. Orphans, little mothers, and feeble old people were noted everywhere. One of the most pathetic figures was a young mother, scantily dressed, sitting in a small hovel or "shack" about 8 feet square that seemed all the room and home she possessed. On the dirt floor of this "room" stood a box, and on the box rested a small, rough, wood coffin that held the remains of an infant. One small lighted candle at the head of the coffin was the mother's only company. A pitiful, cowering figure, she sat there with her dead and her grief. Scenes of sickness, suffering, and death are so common with these refugees that death has no terrors, but none of the wonderful paintings seen in all the galleries of Europe left to the mind such a lasting impression as that of the sorrowing mother in the hovel on a back street of the Piræus refugee camp. And that was only one of many sad scenes.

A pamphlet issued by the refugee commission dated Athens, May 25, 1927, about the time of our arrival, gives a brief description of the work carried on by the commission. Total expenditures to date had then reached £8,882,191 sterling, which with other items listed as assets set off against liabilities amounted to £10,895,238 to date or $53,059,309 expended for relief work. The statement covering many pages with charts discloses the size of the task and character of relief afforded. Items with amounts advanced included advances for farmers, forage, agricultural implements, plowing animals, sheep and goats, horses, and numerous other items. Thirty-five districts received relief given to thousands of families in different districts who were given the minimum amount that would get them by with their pressing needs.

It sounds unimportant to say the town of Salonica now contains 170,000 town refugees in addition to its normal population or that Macedonia and Thrace have 300,000 refugees who are now receiving help from the commission; but after going with this serious-minded commission through passageways, often hardly a yard wide, between long rows of mud hovels, and then through the new districts, learning from observation their amazing accomplishments, I felt that in Christianizing labors that directly affect civilization, such work, performed by this splendid organization practically within the shadows of the world-famous acropolis, returns some reward to the people who once led the civilized world and, more than all, others made ours an enlightened world fit to live in.

No more than a pen picture of the problem can be offered here, but this refugee work marks a phase of the League of Nations activities little understood by the world at large. Second only to that discovery is the further fact that high-minded, capable men have been pressed into service who are gradually bringing order out of chaos and saving thousands of lives by their tireless energy.

To appreciate the size of the problem, let us suppose that in the United States after a long, disastrous war in which a large proportion of the male population had been killed, the country was suddenly called upon to absorb and provide for over 30,000,000 destitute people in an area about one-quarter the size of our own country and in a country that had been farmed in places for nearly 20 centuries.

Greece had approximately 5,000,000 inhabitants after the World War. The refugees concentrated in Greece during the last five or six years, according to the report, includes over 1,000,000 who came from Asia Minor, 190,000 from Eastern Thrace, 70,000 from the Caucasus, 70,000 from Constantinople, and 30,000 from Bulgaria.

Of the 1,400,000 Greek refugees landing in Greece during 1922 and 1923 a comparatively small number estimated at about 50,000 have left the country. A further number estimated around 175,000 have been absorbed by the local population of Athens and other towns, but those needing assistance, when we were there, according to estimates, numbered around 1,200,000 or 300,000 families of four persons each.

Attacking the problem of housing, the commission, acting for the League of Nations, aided by the Greek Government, built 22,337 houses, wooden huts, and hospital buildings by 1926. This number has since been increased, although the fire of 1927 destroyed a portion of the Greek refugee settlement near Athens.

To provide some means of self-support, the refugees have been given or sold on credit an extremely limited supply of seed, implements, cattle, and other supplies as stated. A limited budget prevents the commission from giving much needful aid, so that hardship necessarily continues to exist, but sickness with medical supplies and attendance was on a genuine relief scale when we were there. The hospitals were small, temporary, frame structures but clean and well conducted. Nurses were in attendance and, needless to say, they did not lack for patients.

From those engaged in relief work we learned that the reverence of the Greek for memories relating to his religion or his country is unexampled. No relic, no sanctuary, however ruined, is ever abandoned. There is no chapel, even if perched on the top of a high promontory to which he does not go at least once in the year to burn candles and to celebrate the feast of the Saint.

Although crushed by war and by dissensions that came from national disasters these Greeks are facing the future with confidence. Some of their Government officials stressed the necessity of additional loans that were needed in order to enable the Government to become rehabilitated.

Large new drainage and irrigation works have been undertaken by a company now operating in northern Greece, but promised loans, not yet realized, have halted much of the reconstruction that will enable the country to meet its responsibilities and to take its proper place among the family of nations. In this connection let me say the Greek officials handling the Government's finances are able men and have well maintained the Government's credit.

It was while in Greece that we first learned of floods in the Mississippi Valley. When our great, wealthy Nation is called on to cope with a flood disaster, the loss of life, reaching about 200, although serious, is slight in comparison with the frightful Greek calamity, and the disproportionate problem presented is apparent. Yet our home flood problem is nation-wide in its sympathy.

No minimizing of the Mississippi flood-control situation is needed to emphasize the stupendous size of the Greek refugees relief work. In our own case we have undertaken in a proper legislative way to cope with the situation, with unbounded resources to meet the situation. Our Government has generously aided Russia, Austria, Germany, and other peoples in recent years who have suffered from wars, famine, or other calamities. Grateful acknowledgments for such aid have come from officials of such governments speaking for their people, but in no country the world over, not even in what the propagandist terms "Darkest Russia" or desolated Armenia, will be found such destitute conditions as now exist in Greece, the once world-famous center of civilization. No dole system is possible from an impoverished Government, nor is that character of relief suggested by those conducting the relief work. Every effort is being exerted to aid pressing necessities and to make the refugees self-supporting.

In that service the oft-criticized League of Nations has taken up a humanitarian work that makes this agency the good Samaritan of Europe and to a limited extent a balance wheel in world affairs.

With these few words I have imperfectly attempted to describe the Greek problem that first of all requires immediate and constructive relief work for over a million people who have been thrown upon the homeland—a people destitute and helpless. That recovery and rehabilitation of the historic country carrying this heavy burden in addition to the effects of a disastrous war would discourage many people.

The Greeks have faced the situation with a courage and confidence that challenges the admiration of the world.

I attach a letter received January 5, 1928, which has a direct reference to the work of the commission and to the methods of financing that must occur to meet the needs of the refugee work. It was written by Chairman Eddy, of the commission, scarcely two weeks ago and gives a hopeful picture of meeting urgent need through the $12,000,000 loan advanced by our own Government. The letter reads:

THE REFUGEE SETTLEMENT COMMISSION,
Athens, December 22, 1927.

The Hon. JAMES E. FREAR,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C., U. S. A.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN FREAR: When I was in Geneva last June I gave instructions that there should be sent to you various publications relating to Greece and other reconstruction projects sponsored by the League of Nations. I hope these various documents were received and that you found them interesting.

I am writing now because of the great interest I take, as chairman of the refugee settlement commission, in the fact that an agreement has been reached by Greece with the Treasury Department relating to the settlement of the debt of Greece to the United States. As part of this settlement, it is provided that the sum of approximately $12,100,000 will be advanced to Greece for use in completing the settlement of the refugees. It is particularly agreeable to me to know that one of the provisions of the agreement was that this sum should be spent by our commission.

I was in Geneva when the news of the settlement was received. Needless to say that it made a very strong and favorable impression upon all concerned.

The work of the commission has been proceeding since you were here, but naturally somewhat slowly, as the funds of the commission were near exhaustion. With the new credits which will be available from the United States loan and an additional £500,000 which will be available from a loan floated in the financial markets, it will be possible for the commission to make further progress with its work.

Hoping that you still retain your interest in this part of the world, and wishing you the compliments of the season, I am,

Faithfully yours,

CHARLES B. EDDY.

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SIMMONS].

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska?

There was no objection.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman, I desire at this time to become the spokesman for the Middle Western section of the country by quoting for the benefit of the Members of the House an editorial from the Omaha Bee-News of Saturday, December 24, 1927, dealing with the subject of the development and growth of river navigation and general internal improvements.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I insert an editorial from the Omaha Bee-News of Saturday, December 24, 1927, dealing with the subject of the development and growth of river navigation and general internal improvements, which is as follows:

MID WEST MUST BE ON GUARD

Now comes the flood control bill. As reported by the committee, it provides for the total cost to be paid out of national funds. The President in his message urged that one-fifth of the cost should be charged against the land to be benefited.

The resulting debate in Congress between these two points of view will inevitably bring into discussion the problem of the Panama Canal, inland waterway development, and irrigation in the semiarid lands of the West and Middle West.

The question first to be considered is:

"Why is there a flood problem in the lower Mississippi Valley?"

The answer is:

"Because cities and towns and farms are located on the natural flood plain of the great river. The river has been spreading out over that flood plain for ages, long before man came to build cities and towns and lay out farms. The people in these cities and towns and on these farms are defying nature when they build on the Mississippi flood plain. They have gone there with their eyes open, they know that the river overflows, but the land is so rich they have been willing to bear the cost of keeping the river back, keeping it within the levees they have built."

Then comes the great flood; the river climbs over the highest levees and inundates the cities and the towns and the farms that have been pushed out onto the flood plain—that have encroached upon the land that, since time immemorial, has periodically been covered by the Father of Waters.

Under the stress of the disaster following this last great flood those who have encroached upon the natural flood plain of the Mississippi River come to Congress demanding relief.

Stripped of the tragedy of the flood and of the losses that the flood brought with it, here is what the people of the lower Mississippi River demand:

"We have built our cities and our towns and located our farms right to the very edge of the river at low water. We have spent millions of dollars in building levees, yet every year we must build these levees higher. In spite of the millions we have spent, the river is still the master; the river still overflows the lowlands and drowns us out. We want the Nation to pay the cost of the battle from now on."

President Coolidge says that if these lowlands are valuable, if they are worth preserving, worth protecting, then the people who own these lands should at least pay for one-fifth of the cost of protecting them. The flood control bill now before Congress, as reported by the committee, provides that the people who own these lands shall pay nothing; that the people of the Nation shall pay it all.

Thus the issue is joined. The Omaha Bee-News has already called attention to this situation. What are we in the Middle West going to have to say about it? In the semiarid section of the Middle West, whenever water is put onto the land through irrigation, the people who own that land pay the entire cost of the project; they pay the entire cost of maintaining it. In the last analysis, what is the difference between the position of the man on an irrigated farm who wants water on his land and the man on a lowland farm who wants the water kept off?

The Representatives in Congress from the lower Mississippi States and from the semiarid regions of the Middle West must bear in mind that this flood control bill is destined to set a precedent. If it is right to tax the whole Nation for the entire cost of keeping water off the land—or, for that matter, to tax them for four-fifths of the cost—then the farmer on irrigated land has a right to demand the same thing for putting water on his farm—the principle must work both ways.

The Representatives from the Middle West will and should demand that the flood-control program include reservoirs on the upper reaches of the rivers that pour their waters into the Mississippi lowlands. These reservoirs are necessary to a real program of flood control.

In the arguments advanced by the Representatives from the southern Mississippi River States they call attention to the fact that at one time levees only 4 feet high sufficed to protect New Orleans from the floods, whereas to-day levees 60 feet high are needed in some sections. Thus the levee system has largely defeated itself through building up the bottom of the river and making higher levees necessary.

A real flood-control plan, therefore, calls for reservoirs on the upper Missouri and on the upper reaches of other tributary rivers to hold the floods back. Therefore, too, these reservoirs should be built out of funds taken from the National Treasury.

The Middle West agreed to tax itself for the building of the Panama Canal. The Middle West is now suffering from the low long-haul freight rates that the canal gives those living in the coast sections. As an offset to these rates the Middle West is demanding that the inland waterways system be completed as rapidly as possible, and that these inland waterways be paid for out of national taxation.

These two things offset each other. There is an agreement that the inland waterways be paid for out of the National Treasury. There should also be an agreement that the building of reservoirs shall be a part of the flood-control plan, and that these reservoirs be paid for out of national funds.

Any plan to saddle the cost of protecting the lowlands in the Mississippi River flood basin onto the Nation as a whole should be fought by Representatives of the Middle West unless those plans include reservoirs that shall also be paid for out of national funds.

Any other plan would mean the saddling of millions of dollars of the flood costs, as well as the saddling of the Panama Canal costs, on the Middle West, without any corresponding benefit to the people who live in the inland empire.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LEHLBACH, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 8269) making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice and for the judiciary, and for the Departments of Commerce and Labor, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1929, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

CONSERVATION OF FISHERIES RESOURCES

Mr. WHITEHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I wish to refer for a moment to the appropriation bill for the Department of Commerce, which includes the Bureau of Fisheries, and in that connection to insert an address delivered by the superintendent of the bureau on June 6, 1927, at Independence, Va., on the conservation of our fishery resources. This address was not only very interesting but very instructive. I ask unanimous consent that the address may be inserted in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing the address referred to. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WHITEHEAD. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the following address of Mr. E. C. Fearnow, of the United States Bureau of Fisheries, made at Independence, Va., June 6, 1927:

Mr. FEARNOW. Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, I appreciate the kind expressions just made by your chairman and your Congressman in regard to the work of the Bureau of Fisheries and am glad to see so much interest manifested by the people of this section of the Nation in the "conservation of our fisheries resources," about which I will speak to you this morning.

Virginia offers an excellent field for fish propagation and should be made into a paradise for the sportsman. You have the salt-water fishes and migratory species on the eastern coast, with natural breeding grounds for the large-mouth black bass, blue gill, and crappie. In the mountains of Carroll and Grayson Counties the waters are ideal for the cold-water fishes, such as brook trout and rainbow trout. The Shenandoah River is the home for the much-sought-for small-mouth black bass, while the headwaters of many of its tributaries offer a congenial environment for brook trout. As practically every Temperate Zone plant thrives in Virginia, thus permitting a diversity of crops, so do divers species of fish thrive in the waters of the State. Such a valuable natural asset should be developed to the limit. Mountain streams of 60° Fahrenheit, such as exist in Carroll and Grayson Counties, ought to be teeming with trout. What is the reason why the numerous plants of fish are not producing maximum results? In the first place, you need a system of conservation such as has been outlined, as no amount of fish planting can compensate for fish taken out of streams where promiscuous and indiscriminate fishing is allowed. In the second place, you need large-sized fish instead of fry. The Bureau of Fisheries has come to the conclusion that fry are not producing the best results, and in order to furnish large-sized fish it is cooperating with various organizations in the rearing of trout to the fingerling stage.

The Federal trout hatcheries are equipped for incubating large numbers of eggs, but they do not have the facilities for rearing young fish until they are 3 or 4 inches long. It is generally conceded that 4-inch fish have an excellent chance to survive, while a large number of the fry planted in streams inhabited by large fish simply serve as food for the predatory species.

The Bureau of Fisheries is trying to find means for rearing its output of trout to the fingerling stage and is asking organizations and individuals who have suitable sites for rearing fish to cooperate to the extent of furnishing sites and food for 10,000 to 40,000 trout until they are large enough to care for themselves in open waters. Many organizations throughout the country are now successfully rearing trout in nurseries on the cooperative basis. The fry are furnished by the Government during April or May free of charge. The organization rears them until October, when they are planted in near-by waters. The bureau furnishes an experienced fish culturist to give advice in regard to the care of the fish, and in October an employee experienced in fish distribution is sent to direct the planting of the output in suitable waters.

Cooperative trout nurseries are being considered at Galax, Independence, and Troutdale.

While nearly all fishes are remarkably prolific there is a great variation in this respect among the different species. For example, at the Federal fish hatchery at Neosho, Mo., a bream 1¼ pounds in weight produced over 2,000 eggs and a 4-pound black bass about 9,000. At the Cape Vincent, N. Y., fish hatchery a 1½-pound yellow perch yielded 25,000 eggs and a normal-sized pike perch was found to contain 250,000. An 80-pound codfish spawned at one of the Federal fish hatcheries in Massachusetts produced 3,250,000 eggs, while instances have been recorded of the production of 9,000,000 eggs from a single cod of large size. The highest record for sturgeon appears to be 7,000,000 eggs.

In view of this great profusion it would seem to the uninitiated that the future of the fisheries might safely be left to work itself out by natural processes. As a matter of fact, however, the great waste which goes on in connection with other forms of life is greatly intensified among the fishes. If one-tenth of the fish eggs annually deposited were to result in fully matured fish there would be no need to resort to artificial methods for the conservation and improvement of our fisheries.

The first heavy drain upon the supply is immediately after the eggs have been deposited, as many of them never come in contact with the fertilizing medium and thus fail to develop. Others in enormous numbers are consumed by many enemies, including fish, crustacea, insects, and birds. In view of the many vicissitudes to which the eggs are subjected at all stages of their development, it is not likely that more than 25 per cent of those deposited ever hatch. Further, it is estimated that of the fry produced not more than 25 per cent live to attain maturity, even in waters receiving adequate protection; and in the case of small streams and lakes where unrestricted fishing is allowed, especially seining and gigging, it is doubtful if even 1 per cent of the fry hatched in these waters ever survive to the age of maturity. Though powerful, the capacity of the waters for the production of fish life is not without limit, and we have been too prone to regard the fisheries of our country as a free for all harvest, reaping where nothing has been sown.

REASONS FOR DISAPPEARANCE OF FISH

In primeval times our streams were well stocked with desirable species of fishes, but the balance so admirably maintained by the unhindered working of natural laws has been destroyed by the activities attending civilized life. Before this country was settled, when Indians were the sole fishermen, they were satisfied to take only enough fish to fill immediate needs. There was then no thought of gain or of preserving the flesh and shipping it to distant points. With the rapid increase of the population all this has been changed, and especially since the automobile has been adopted as a common means of transportation, opening as it has to easy access and consequent depletion vast numbers of streams and lakes in all sections of the United States which a comparatively few years ago were regarded as inaccessible. The altered conditions and the increasing requirements of civilization are constantly making it more difficult to maintain good fishing in public waters.

The early settlers were driven by force of circumstances to pursue a policy of destruction, and this to a great extent explains the present scarcity of fish and game, as the conditions comprising a favorable environment for wild life had to be sacrificed. Timbered lands were converted into fields for the raising of crops, and with the destruction of the forests the water supply was so greatly reduced that many streams formerly favorable to trout and bass were thereby unfitted for the maintenance of desirable forms of fish life. In the cutting of the forests many lands were cleared that might to much better advantage been left undisturbed, as their subsequent use for agriculture has demonstrated.

Many of our best streams have become so polluted through the discharge therein of refuse from manufacturing plants that game fish will no longer survive in them. High dams for hydroelectric plants have been built, excluding anadromous fishes from their natural spawning areas in the headwaters of coastal streams. Nets are laid out to the channels of rivers from either side, making it impossible for shad and herring to pursue their normally sinuous course upstream. There is also to be reckoned with the numerous individuals who fish the year around, including the spawning period, at which time fish are tame and can be easily caught. The catching of a bass during the breeding season may mean the loss of from 3,000 to 6,000 fry.

The conditions described demand prompt remedial action if we are to retain some of our more desirable species of fish. Though great, the difficulties to be overcome are not insurmountable. It would seem that the ingenuity which can plan a great dam might devise means for fish to pass over it. It would also seem that both the commercial fisherman and the angler might be taught to use without abusing the resources of our country. In keeping with our remarkable progress along commercial lines, we should see to it that our important aquatic life is protected. Up to this time the great difficulty has been that all available resources are applied to matters involving immediate pecuniary gain, leaving neither time nor attention to devote to the work of conservation.

Deforestation on a large scale has so changed the flow of our streams as to convert them into torrents during the season of heavy precipitation and into stagnant pools in the dry period of the year. It is plainly apparent that it will be necessary to adopt measures for holding back the waters of streams through the medium of the numerous lakes located on adjoining fish and game preserves, and also by reforesting the lands in the vicinity of their headwaters.

VALUE OF PROPAGATION WORK OVERESTIMATED

The delay in adopting constructive measures for the conservation of fish life is probably to be attributed largely to the discovery of the artificial method of propagating fish eggs. With means at hand for artificially hatching fish it has become the opinion of many that conservation work is superfluous; that every stream, lake, and pond would soon be teeming with fish as a result of the work done at the Federal and State hatcheries. There could be no greater mistake. While the importance of the discovery can not be disputed, experience has demonstrated beyond a doubt that artificial propagation, unaided, can not compensate for the large numbers of fish annually taken from our streams and lakes. Moreover, no method has yet been devised which will permit of the successful manipulation of eggs of such nest-building species as the black basses. In view of these facts it is apparent that a practical system of conservation will have to be adopted as an aid in maintaining in our waters the salmons, trouts, basses, and other desirable species of fish. While the Federal Government and the States can furnish fish to serve as a brood stock, they can not hope to maintain good fishing by such means, but must have the active cooperation of organizations and individuals in protecting the fish placed therein. The public should not expect to catch fish that have been planted in their waters before they have had time to attain maturity and reproduce. Neither should it insist on the planting of fish in localities where the prevailing sentiment is unfavorable to the enforcement of adequate laws for the protection of fish and game.

It would, of course, be nice if the Government could keep plenty of fish in every body of water and they could be taken out whenever desired without any restrictions. It would also be convenient to have our farm yards and fields kept stocked with poultry and livestock by the Government. However, such paternalism is neither practicable nor in accord with American ideas. Although the Government does raise livestock, it is done with the sole view of improving the quality and it is never distributed indiscriminately. It would appear that certain individuals are prone to rely too much on the annual planting of fish and are losing sight entirely of the equally important work of protecting and conserving the stock already in the waters.

FISH CONSERVATION

It is recognized that it will always be necessary to propagate and distribute fish for maintaining the supply in public waters, but to insure efficient results from such work a system of fish conservation so thorough that it will go to the very root of the difficulties encountered at the present time should be put into practical operation; a system that will enlist the active cooperation of every association and every angler. It is generally understood that our waters are deficient in fish life; that many streams, owing to pollution, are unsuitable for the clear-water species; that migratory fishes are being excluded by high dams and other barriers from their natural spawning grounds; and that physical conditions of some streams have so changed in recent years that indigenous fishes no longer find in them a congenial environment.

The problem is to make two or more fish grow where only one is growing and, if possible, make them grow in waters where they do not now exist. Apparently the sportsmen are willing to assist in the execution of any feasible plan of fish conservation that may be adopted. The letters that have come in from different sections of the country indicate that they are impatient to begin work of rehabilitating overfished waters but are in doubt as to the proper course to pursue. The trouble seems to be that there is no system of conservation in operation that is generally acceptable to the extent that all organizations are willing to risk its adoption. The plan decided upon must be so simple and so clear as to make its feasability self-evident.

In their efforts to solve the problem many sportsmen are suggesting fish hatcheries, having in mind the fish-cultural stations operated under Federal or State authority or by private management, where fish are either artificially hatched in troughs and jars or bred in a series of ponds under more or less natural conditions. Now, what is needed in the great majority of cases is not a hatchery with all its attendant problems, but the application of some practical method for conserving and multiplying the fish already in the waters. In a great many instances good advice is needed more than a stock of fish. Restocking should not be resorted to unless a state of almost actual depletion exists, and not then until the cause of the depletion has been ascertained and eliminated. So long as the basis of a brood stock exists in a body of water there is an opportunity to build up its fishing. It is an economic waste to permit adult fish to be caught promiscuously and depend solely on plants of small fish to maintain the supply. Such a procedure is like killing all the hens and depending upon the incubator to produce chickens, losing sight of the necessity of the mature fowls for the production of eggs. There can be no better time than the present to advocate the inauguration of some simple and effective method for conserving and increasing the supply of fish in public waters.

THE HABITS OF FISH

We know very little of the habits of fish, especially of such inland species as the bass and the bluegill. It would be a valuable aid to the conservationist to know whether or not fish travel great distances up or down stream, what influences them in such movements—whether it is the water temperature, the food supply, or some other cause. If it were a settled fact that fish planted at a given point in a stream would remain near that point under certain conditions we might strive to produce those conditions in fish refuges and feel confident that the fish placed in them would not wander far beyond the limits of the refuge. We should then be free to apply our energies to the raising of fish in streams without going to the expense of constructing inclosures for brood stock and could use the ponds that are too small to maintain food fish for the production of minnows to serve as a food supply for stocking the refuges.

A system of tagging fish similar to the method pursued in the work with salmon and the marine fishes might be successfully employed in studying the habits of fishes of our inland waters. Fingerling fish with small tags clasped either to the dorsal or ventral fin are released at various places and a careful record made of the points of deposit. A few years afterwards rewards are offered for the tags with information as to where the fish bearing them were taken. The recovery of several hundred tags with data as to points of capture, the season of the year they were taken, and other relevant facts would furnish sufficient data on which to base scientific conclusions in the formation of a policy of fish conservation.

SURVEY OF STREAMS AND LAKES

In order to determine just what is needed to increase the supply of fish in any body of water the logical course to pursue is to conduct an ecological survey and thus be in a position to rectify any faulty condition of the water that may exist. It may be that it is polluted, that it is deficient in food, or it may simply need restocking. There are remedies for all these defects. Refuse from factories, the common cause of pollution, can be disposed of at a profit by manufacturers. Minnows can be raised by the million and released in the streams and lakes, and depleted waters can be restocked with fish propagated at the hatcheries.

The same judgment is required in raising fish that must be exercised in raising plants and livestock. It is a paying investment in agriculture to have the soil tested when there is doubt as to what is needed to produce a desired crop. In fish culture we have in the past been content with restocking and have paid little or no attention to stream conditions. As a result considerable effort has been wasted and we have failed to accomplish much permanent good. In order to make them produce the maximum amount of food our streams and lakes need attention the same as our fields. After exhausting the soil of eastern farms many of the owners moved westward. Now, they are coming back and reclaiming the soil they left and are making it fruitful to a truly remarkable extent. Our streams have been neglected as the soil of our eastern farms was neglected, but it is not too late to reclaim them if immediate action is taken.

FOOD FOR FISH AN IMPORTANT REQUISITE

Streams and lakes which otherwise form a suitable environment for fish are frequently found to be deficient in a food supply. Plants feed on the gases inimical to fish life and turn these gases into the oxygen so essential to it. Plants attract insects which constitute a most desirable natural food for fish. The black bass has a ravenous appetite for live food, and if he can not get it from other living organisms around him he will prey upon his own kind.

Some 8 or 10 years ago a man in Ohio wrote the Bureau of Fisheries that with the view of attracting insect life to his pond he had placed over it an electric light; that since its installation the large bass in the pond frequently jumped a foot or more out of the water to catch insects. Later this method of attracting insects was adopted by the Kansas fisheries authorities and has proved quite successful. Electric wires were strung over a system of ponds where channel catfish are reared and a number of bulbs suspended near the water, a single push button controlling the system. The lights were found to attract myriads of insects, many of which strike the water and are quickly snapped up by numerous small catfish. Fed in this way it is said that channel catfish grow twice as large as those subsisting on the ordinary food found in the water with the addition of clam and cornmeal porridge, etc. Any method that will attract insects to waters where fish are being raised may be considered desirable.

In order to provide a source of food supply for young fish, goldfish breeders near Frederick, Md., draw the water from their breeding ponds in the fall, manure and plow the soil, omitting potash, and with the approach of the breeding season in the spring they transfer the brood fish from their winter quarters to these ponds to spawn.

Dr. G. C. Embody, of Cornell University, who has conducted some interesting experiments in cultivating live food for fish, breeds mosquitoes in a system of pools and releases the larvae in ponds to be eaten by small fish. He is able by this means to hold the mosquitoes under complete control.

Nearly all of the bait minnows belong to the Cyprinidæ, a large family of vegetation-feeding fish which includes the carp. These minnows afford a practical means of quickly converting plant life into live food for fish, and in cases where the food problem must be reckoned with it is advisable to stock small ponds in the environs of streams and lakes with such desirable minnows as the shiner and sand perch and use their progeny as fish food.

The time will doubtless come when we shall find it feasible to produce the lower forms of life in large quantities to serve as a natural food for bass and trout and when every cubic foot of water will be utilized to add to the human food supply. This is the prevailing condition to-day in Europe, where aquaculture is practiced on a large scale and salable plants and fish are raised in the same body of water.

REFUGES AND BREEDING GROUNDS

Lakes or ponds where selected individuals can be protected and the young allowed to escape into adjacent streams would doubtless furnish the necessary protection to the brood stock of our game fishes. To hold brood fish in streams not subject to severe freshets 10 or 20 acres could be fenced off with poultry netting of a mesh small enough to retain the adults but large enough to permit the small fish to escape into the open waters. The brood stock could be released each year and new stock selected from the stream, the pound being moved occasionally to insure a reasonable supply of natural food at all times.

Of course, if a lake of 10 acres or more could be constructed on waste land, thereby adding to the water area of a stream, it would prove ideal for the breeding of fish. It is usually quite expensive, however, to develop a project of this kind even where natural conditions are favorable. On account of the expense involved most of the lakes constructed for fish culture have been comparatively small, and for that reason they have not been highly successful financially. Experience has shown that bass require large water areas and that it is practically useless to attempt to raise them in small inclosures.

Fish refuges, lakes, and ponds should be placed under the supervision of a responsible person to insure against the illegal removal of their occupants. Waters should be carefully studied to determine which ones can be used most effectively as breeding grounds. The term "fish refuge" implies a section of a stream that has been set aside for breeding grounds on account of its favorable environment.

A NOVEL METHOD OF OBTAINING BROOD FISH

That popular game fish, the black bass, and also other species, may be caught with hook and line and transported to a reasonable distance. If hooked in the mouth and the hook carefully removed, the fish are not wounded to the extent that they will not make good breeders, but if a fish swallows the hook its vital parts are liable to be injured in the process of removing it. A pail of shallow water is all that is necessary for conveying fish a reasonable distance, as a large fish—especially a bass—will keep the water agitated sufficiently to provide the necessary aeration for a trip of a few hours duration. In fact, a 4-pound bass would not need more than 2 gallons of water in a vessel 12 or 14 inches in diameter to insure its successful transportation for a few hours and possibly longer, provided the water temperature was not too high.

Would it be too much to ask fisheries organizations to cooperate in obtaining brood stock, each angler to furnish two selected individuals for breeders at the beginning of a season, such fish to be placed in an ideal environment for the renewal of the supply in a stream? The idea entails infinite possibilities and seems worthy of a trial. The matter of obtaining brood bass, crappie, and bluegill has constituted a serious problem at practically every hatchery in the United States, whether operated by the Federal Government, a State, or by private individuals.

IMPROVING THE SPECIES

Since fish will not thrive if held for more than a few years in ponds it follows that there is little opportunity to improve the species at a permanently established fish-cultural station, and it is not always possible to secure new stock when needed. Even goldfish breeders find it necessary to exchange stock and purchase new breeders frequently in order to maintain or improve the quality of their fish. Fish deteriorate or run out similar to sheep or other animals if left too long in a limited area.

At the beginning of a season the fish possessing the highest aggregate of good points should be selected to breed from. Brewer's law of selection can be advantageously applied in the breeding of fish in streams. The relative value of the species may also be changed and the form modified to suit the taste of anglers. We breed our best animals by selection, and is it not reasonable to infer from this fact that by annually selecting the largest and gamest bass for breeders we might eventually produce a superbass, one that would furnish an undreamed-of kick?

PRACTICAL FISH CONSERVATION

Many anglers are in the game for the sport it furnishes. Frequently they catch fish, take their measurements, enlarge on the measurements a little, and return the fish to the waters only to be caught by other anglers who may not be so considerate. It is believed that the average angler would be willing to contribute an occasional fish from his catch to assist in maintaining the brood stock, thereby furthering the great work of conservation. The plan in brief calls upon the anglers of the country to turn over a few adult fish for the purpose of maintaining the supply in the waters and thus assist in one of the most difficult problems connected with the propagation of black bass. The States would be asked to set aside pounds or refuges where the fish could be adequately protected until after the close of the breeding season, when they would be released. The selection of sites for such refuges would require an expert knowledge of aquatic biology and the question of a food supply and immunity of the site from the natural enemies of fish would also have to be given careful study, but consider the results that might be attained from such a course. Under favorable conditions one brood bass will produce from 6,000 to 8,000 fry and in a refuge, with proper care, one-third of these should attain legal size for catching. If by systematically pursuing such a course one fisherman can increase the supply of bass by 2,500 or even 500 individuals annually would this not prove a solution of the bass problem? As eggs of commercial fish are purchased from fishermen, it would be perfectly feasible to pay the angler a fixed price for any brood stock obtained from him.

Summing up the proposition, we have provided for (1) selected brood stock obtained without robbing the streams; (2) ponds, lakes, or refuges where all fishing is prohibited; (3) open waters with fishing allowed under well-regulated restrictions. The entire plan could be placed on an established basis by one organization working in cooperation with either the Federal or a State Government.

After being in constant use for two or three years, fish refuges could be thrown open for public fishing, but before doing this new refuges should be started at other points, so that the work of conservation might proceed uninterruptedly. Planning in this way a new refuge would be established each year and an old one thrown open for public fishing, thereby insuring the continuance of good fishing.

Fisheries organizations, rod and gun clubs, and conservation associations, including in their membership business men, professional men, and mechanics, banded together for the protection and propagation of wild life, annually collect large sums of money which they use in the improvement of local streams and lakes, purchase of birds for the stocking of game preserves, food for wild birds, etc. To many an organization of this kind the Federal Government and also the States are indebted, not only for material assistance rendered in the stocking of public waters but for developing and fostering a sentiment favoring the enforcement of the fisheries laws. Fisheries organizations are in a position to render incalculable aid in carrying out the conservation scheme outlined, as they would have no difficulty in assembling sufficient brood fish every year for the maintenance of the local supply.

BENEFITS DERIVED FROM ANGLING

Fishing is engaged in by more of our population than is hunting, probably for the reason that it is at its height during the vacation period, and, besides, women and children who do not wish to hunt often go fishing. The apostolic calling, therefore, possesses more lure than the pastime of Nimrod. Fishing attracts people to isolated sections that they would otherwise not visit.

The benefits derived from fishing can not be estimated. Some States have attempted to place a value on their inland fisheries, taking into consideration the financial returns that accrue annually from the sale of fishing tackle, railroad transportation, hotel receipts from tourists, and commercial value of the product, all of which amount to millions of dollars. These values, however, are estimated in dollars and cents and the unknown quantity which is the most important of all is the bringing of the population into contact with nature at a time when nature is at her best and the tired business man at his worst. The inspiration received from fishing and its effect on the social and economic life of the country is more than the value of the product taken. Fishermen learn patience, as fish can not be forced to take the bait. Most fishermen are true conservationists, fishing for the recreation and paying very little attention to the value of the product taken. Indeed, many of them return the fish to the waters from which they were taken.

I have a great deal of confidence in and respect for the angler. It has been said that fishermen are a good-for-nothing class, but it is not true. Angling is one of the most wholesome recreations and anglers are the most patient and considerate class of people we have. As the milk woman said to Walton, "They be such civil and quiet men." The angler gets a thrill that comes in no other way. He feels the very heartbeats of nature, and nature is at her best when fishing is good. Fish can not be prodded, can not be coaxed; you just have to sit there and wait. If you have patience, the reward is yours.

"Oh, it's lovely when they're running
And they're hungry and they're fine,
And they strike and keep on tugging
On your bait and on your line;
But the fellow that's worth praising
And that has the record right
Is the lad that keeps on fishing
When—the—fish—don't—bite."

It was fishing that gave us our first actual experience with life, its ups and downs, its successes and failures. We have learned to keep on fishing, even though the fish do not bite, and this persistence instilled into us in youth has enabled us to continue on hoping for success and sometimes attaining it when otherwise we might give up. I believe it is for the reason that fishermen are open-minded that they have figured so largely in progressive movements in the history of the world. They have learned how to bear with adversity and take advantage of an opportune moment.

"Who bides his time and fevers not
In the hot race that none achieves,
Shall wear cool-wreathen laurel, wrought
With crimson berries in the leaves;
And he shall reign a goodly king,
And sway his hand o'er every clime,
With peace writ on his signet ring,
Who bides his time."

As a pastime and character builder angling has no equal; so every youth should have an opportunity to experience the pleasures and adversities of fishing.

I take the view that good fishing is the culmination of a number of conditions that are essential for agriculture, manufacturing, and other lines of industry; that it is the resultant of conditions ideal for the conservation of our resources, the key to conservation. The conditions favorable for fish life in streams are conducive to a liberal supply of game on land. The requirements for good fishing are unpolluted waters, an even flow, and plenty of natural food. Forests and lakes, the prime essentials for land mammals and migratory birds, are needed to produce the conditions favorable for fish; so good fishing is the star to which the conservationist can safely hitch his wagon. Conditions that will replenish waters with desirable forms of fish life will benefit the country as a whole. The system that will produce the results must combine conservation with common sense, practical science with practical fish culture, and have the support of the various game and fisheries organizations of the country. Under such a system will the hunter bring in bags of game and the angler strings of fish. The future of fish and game rests largely with the sportsmen.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

FRIDAY, January 6, 1928

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Infinite God, whose throne is in the hearts of Thy loving children, wherever they are found, we thank Thee that place nor time can not separate us from Thy love. May we meditate upon Thy providences with grateful feelings, exalted hopes, and great thoughts. Allow us not to be cradled in illusions, but help us to look up and discover the golden crown which hovers above. O river of God's mercy! It is the blessing which feeds the world and by its might we shall yet find our paradise. Bless us with an irresistible yearning that sends us beyond the narrow boundaries of self and stretches our vision under wider skies. Teach us that he who overcomes self treads the world under foot. In the name of Jesus. Amen.

REUEL SMALL

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one minute.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, in many of our newspapers we find a column, or a part of a column, telling what happened 15, 20, 25, or 30 years ago. I do not anticipate that this will become the practice in our publication, the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD; but to-day I wish to refer to something which occurred just 30 years ago. In doing so I shall speak of the long and faithful service of one of the most respected employees of this House. Let me read an excerpt from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of Thursday, January 6, 1898:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Thursday, January 6, 1898.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

RESIGNATION AND APPOINTMENT OF OFFICIAL REPORTER OF DEBATES

The SPEAKER (Thomas B. Reed, of Maine). The Chair has been notified that Mr. Andrew Devine, one of the official reporters of debates of the House of Representatives, resigns his position; and the Chair therefore appoints Mr. Reuel Small, of Deering, Me., to be an official reporter of debates in his place.

[Applause.]

To-day Mr. Small completes 30 years of honorable, faithful, and efficient service for the House of Representatives. It is a record of which anyone might well be proud. So I have asked the indulgence of the House for one minute to make this statement in order to call it to the attention of the membership and so that it may appear in the RECORD. [Applause.]

THE "S-4" DISASTER

Mr. BLACK of New York. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLACK of New York. I understand that the Butler resolution with reference to the S-4 will be reported to-morrow. I would like to know whether it will be in order for a Member to offer an amendment to that resolution from the floor of the House.

The SPEAKER. Of course, the resolution will be brought up by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL], who will be in charge of it, and he may at any time move the previous question.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Otherwise it would be in order?

The SPEAKER. It would be in order with the consent of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, may I make a statement?

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, while there has been no definite arrangement made for the consideration of that resolution it is not the purpose of the gentleman from New York, who will present the resolution, to cut off debate or any reasonable amendment which the Members of the House may want to offer. [Applause.] It is an open resolution and it is up to you gentlemen to do what you want in regard to it. [Applause.]

SHOULD THE DEBT SETTLEMENTS BE REVISED?

Mr. ANDREW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting the address I made last week before the American Economic Association here in Washington.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ANDREW. Mr. Speaker, with the consent of the House, I incorporate in the RECORD an address which I made before the American Economic Association in Washington on December 29, 1927, on the subject "Should the debt settlements be revised?" which is as follows:

In attempting to-night to present to you my conception of the debt-settlement problems, I am bound by limits of time to confine myself to particular aspects of the subject, and in doing so I may run somewhat counter to a popular tradition of what is appropriate to an "economist's" discussion of an "economic" subject. For the aspects of this question which seem to me of dominating importance are not of commerce and finance but of ethics and expediency.

The commercial and financial aspects of these settlements have been the subject of considerable investigation. Numerous studies have been made of the future capacity of the debtor countries to pay, of the possibility of transferring such large sums from Europe to the United States, and of the probable influence of these transfers upon our industry and trade. Whether or not the future incomes of all of the countries concerned will allow them to provide the sums involved, and whether these sums can be moved across the sea are questions which I do not intend to discuss. Both are not improbably within the range of human possibility, but both depend upon factors and contingencies which no one can with certainty foresee. And prophecy has been well described as the most gratuitous form of error.

EFFECT UPON AMERICAN BUSINESS

As for the effects of these payments upon our own business, there is doubtless truth in the contention that since we are asking Europe to pay us an amount in the aggregate four times the value of all of the gold in the rest of the world, these payments will have to be made in commodities or services, and this will have some effect upon our foreign trade. Such large and long-continued payments—totaling $22,000,000,000—through their influence upon the exchanges and the relative price levels of the countries concerned, will tend to make the foreign market for some of our products less profitable, while encouraging foreign competition in certain lines at home. The tendency will operate upon, and be felt by particular businesses, whether it is recognized as such or not. As the years go by, if the payments continue to be made, we may expect to hear increasing complaints of the limited export market for certain of our surplus products, and more insistent demands for higher protection in particular industries. But the ultimate causes of such conditions are always hard to disentangle and their connection with the debt payments will never be open to proof.

More easy to recognize is the consideration significantly expressed by Secretary Mellon a year or two ago, that the prosperity of Europe is worth more to the United States in dollars and cents than the repayment of all of the war loans put together. But the United States is interested in a prosperous Europe, not merely as a market for the surplus output of our farms and factories although that has a bearing upon our own prosperity, and not merely as a stabilizing influence upon business throughout the world, although that likewise is important for our own business. The prosperity of Europe is of even greater concern to the United States because of the possible contagion of unrest and revolution which discontent in Europe might foster and because of the crucial importance to all of the western world of continued peace, and of orderly political and social progress. In so far as the burden of these war-born payments retards the return of the Old World to normal economic and political conditions, the money which we may receive will be debased with a pernicious alloy. But here again we have to do with imponderables—factors impossible to weigh—and I shall not dwell upon them.

WHAT CONGRESS HAS LEARNED

No satisfactory verdict upon the war-loan settlements can be found by merely attempting to determine where the balance of financial or governmental advantage lies. The factors that are involved are not all of a sort that can be reduced to figures and tables and balanced by ordinary methods of bookkeeping. This in fact is what Congress discovered five years ago (in February, 1923) when they set aside all other considerations and instructed the World War Debt Funding Commission to arrange future settlements upon whatever terms the commission believed to be "just." The year before (in February, 1922) Congress seemed to have thought otherwise. In creating the commission at that time, and delegating to it authority to negotiate settlements with the nations to which we had extended credits, they had hemmed around that authority with various restrictions. The commission was to grant to no government a rate of interest below 4½ per cent, to allow no funding to mature more than 25 years later (not later than 1947), and to permit no reduction of any part of the sums in question.

The Congress which established the commission and which had so limited its freedom of action was very different in personnel from the Congress that had originally authorized the credits. It was separated by two elections and a political landslide from the war-time Congress. A large proportion of its Members had had no part in the war-loan legislation, were but vaguely conversant with the circumstances surrounding the origin of the loans, and were more optimistic than informed as to the possibilities of their repayment. Before a single settlement had been negotiated the limitations which they had imposed upon the commission were recognized to be impracticable, and the first and only settlement submitted by the commission under the 1922 law—that with Great Britain—did not conform at all with the prescribed terms.

CONGRESS ONLY WANTED JUSTICE

Nevertheless, both Houses of Congress approved that settlement with little opposition and scarcely any discussion. The vote in the House stood more than 6 to 1 in favor of it (291 for to 44 against). The Senate indorsed it by a majority of more than 5 to 1 (70 for to 13 against). This vote in itself indicated that Congress was not wedded to the terms it had named but was ready to allow great latitude in handling the problem. This was still more clearly evidenced by the fact that forthwith all of the previously enacted restrictions upon the commission's authority were removed, and the commission was given carte blanche to negotiate succeeding settlements upon one condition, and one condition only—that they should believe the terms to be "just." After February, 1923, there were to be no more legislative proscriptions as to rates of interest and dates of maturity, or even as to the reduction or cancellation of the debts. Congress told the commission to go ahead with the other settlements and only asked from that time on that the settlements should be "just."

Whatever the commission has recommended in each of the dozen subsequent settlements has been approved without much debate by immense majorities in both Houses. Congress has never modified the slightest detail of any proposal that the commission has made. It has never added a comma, changed an article, dotted an "i," or crossed a "t." Congress ratified the Belgian settlement, which varied still more widely from the original proscriptions, by a majority of more than 12 to 1 in the House and nearly 3 to 1 in the Senate. And even the settlement with Italy, which was far less exigent than any of the others, was indorsed in the House by a vote of 257 to 133 and in the Senate by a vote of 54 to 33. It can not be fairly said that the Debt Funding Commission after February, 1923, were in any way constrained by the attitude of Congress to drive stiff bargains with any of our war-time partners. On the contrary, there is every reason to believe that if the commission had recommended settlements of a character much more generous Congress would have accepted them just the same. This may be said to have been partly due to their high regard for the personnel of the commission and partly to the fact that they were not in a position to know anything beyond what they were told about the complicated calculations having to do with economic conditions in distant countries and a remote future upon which the settlements were based. But, above all, the ready acquiescence of Congress must be credited to the anxiety of the majority of Members, irrespective of party, to get this thorny question out of the way.

COMMISSION'S FORMULAS OF JUSTICE

The act of February 28, 1923, as we have seen, gave to the Debt Funding Commission a single mandate, with large discretionary power in its interpretation. They were to make settlements with other governments upon such terms as they "may believe to be just." In construing this mandate the commission at an early date arrived at a method of procedure which greatly simplified their subsequent labor. They boiled down and standardized what they "believed to be just" into three general formulas, which thereafter had only to be applied to particular cases, a task that could be largely delegated to one or two of their members or to some of their assistants.

The three formulas and their explanation, so far as reasons for them are discernible, were the following:

First. To quote the words of the chairman, Secretary Mellon, the commission felt that "repayment of principal is essential in order that the debtor might feel that it had paid its debt in full (sic) and that we might know that we had our capital returned to us (sic). The commission felt, therefore, that no funding should be made which did not repay the principal, and thus we have maintained the integrity of international obligations" (sic). (Combined annual reports of debt commission, p. 289.)

Second. They felt that the repayments of principal should in every case be distributed over 62 years, no matter what the character of the debt and no matter what its size, whether it amounted to one million or several thousand millions of dollars. Just why the number "62" should have been chosen has never been clearly disclosed. It seems to have been due to the belief that this was the smallest number of years in which the largest of our war partners' accounts, reaching well into the billions, could be acquitted "in full," which Mr. Mellon had said was "essential." Why the identical period should have been uniformly applied to the settlement of each and every account was also never explained. The standardization of maturity dates, to be sure, solved automatically one of the problems involved with every country and reduced by so much the labor of making particular settlements, but obviously it resulted in absurd arrangements for some of the smaller accounts. To name only a single example, one of the ex-enemy governments which borrowed after the war a sum of less than $2,000,000 will be paying the United States until the year 1985 annual driblets that never reach as high as $80,000.

Third. They felt that the rates of interest to be paid during these 62 years should be determined by estimates of each country's "capacity to pay." "It is felt," said the report of the commission for 1925, "that the lack of capacity of a government * * * can be readily met by appropriate adjustment or modification of the rates of interest to be paid during the period of repayment of principal. And in examining the capacity of payment the commission looks not only at the immediate capacity but estimates, so far as it is able to do so, the future development of the nations concerned." Quoting again from the same report: "The adjustments made with each government must be measured by the ability of the particular government to put aside and transfer to the United States the payments called for under the funding agreement." (Combined annual reports, p. 38.) The same conception was made even more clear in a statement referring to the French negotiations: "We believe it is fully recognized by the commission that the only (sic) basis of negotiations fair to both peoples is the principal of the capacity of France to pay." (Statement of Oct. 1, 1925.)

Reduced to its lowest terms, then, the commission held that the sole rule for "just" settlements was to demand from our principal war partners as much as they would be able to pay of capital, plus interest, between now and 1985 (or 1987), and, so far as the other countries were concerned, to stretch their payments over a similar number of years without regard either to the character of their borrowings or to their particular ability to settle more promptly. The rule of "capacity to pay," in other words, was to be applied to the major settlements, but not to be bothered about in dealing with the others.

TREASURY APPLIED THESE FORMULAS

Having formulated these general criteria of the terms which they "believed to be just," and so far as their statements, reports, and speeches disclose, these were the only criteria which they regarded as worthy of attention, the commission as a whole was not obliged to participate in the actual negotiations which for the most part were conductd by Treasury officials. "In applying these principles," as the report for 1925 states, "the commission, through its experts and through the foreign representatives of the State and Commerce Departments, has assembled and studied the economic and financial data available regarding each of the foreign debtors."

With this information before it, the commission has been able to examine critically similar data presented by the representatives of the several governments in their debt-settlement negotiations and to estimate, with as reasonable accuracy as conditions permit, the capacity of payment of the particular government. (Combined annual reports, p. 38.) There is reason to believe that even in certain of the most important settlements several, and probably the majority, of the members of the commission not only had little to do with the actual negotiations, but had never heard any discussion of the points at issue or even seen the representative of the allied nation until the agreements were presented to the commission as a completed whole for acceptance and signature.

It is not to be doubted that those charged with the actual negotiations faithfully executed to the best of their ability the dictates of the commission. They not only treated the principal war-loan accounts according to the rules and practices customary in settlements with insolvent business firms but, according to the commission's instructions, they went considerably further than that, and extracted from the bankrupt governments pledges of capacity payment for several generations. Secretary Mellon was probably well within the truth when he asserted, "We have, I believe, made for the United States the most favorable settlements that could be obtained short of force." (Combined annual reports, p. 302.) But whether or not the commission's policy correctly interpreted the instruction of Congress to arrange "just" terms, that is to say, whether or not in formulating the tests of such terms the commission took proper account of all of the factors that justice demands, is another story.

ARE ALL LOANS ALIKE?

Unquestionably the difficulties in the way of determining "just" settlements were greatly simplified by resting on the sure ground of the letter of the law and not venturing into the less clearly marked fields of equity. It was far easier to argue that loans are loans and that contracts are contracts, and to demand "the due and forfeit of the bond" than to try and search justice in the borderlands of reason and conscience outside of the written law. Yet no thoughtful person would claim that all loans are alike in the binding force of their obligation. If during a great conflagration a citizen loaned fire extinguishers to his neighbors to use in putting out a fire which threatened his home as well as theirs, few would assert that the debt so contracted entails the same moral obligation upon the neighbors as would be entailed had they purchased these extinguishers on credit in the normal course of trade.

Loans, to be sure, are loans, but if the extinguishers that he lent were destroyed in saving the city he would scarcely feel warranted in demanding from his neighbors, particularly if they had suffered far greater losses than his own, their repayment with all of the interest they might be able to pay for interminable years. And similarly, if a country were engaged in a war which it was itself helpless to prosecute, and it loaned to other countries engaged in the same conflict the guns, shells, uniforms, chemicals, food, and other necessaries of war which they used in combating the common enemy, and these things were consumed in the process, although loans are loans, some will question whether the lending country would be justified in demanding from its partners, especially if they had made vastly greater sacrifices in the conflict than its own, the payment of all that they might be able to pay for several generations.

During the Civil War many northern men drafted for the Union Army considered themselves for one reason or another unprepared to serve and offered money to others to go in their stead. Sometimes such money was offered in the form of loans to meet the substitute's expenses or to provide for his family while he was at the front. When the war ended, if the veteran returned impoverished and disabled, perhaps minus an arm or a leg or a foot, although loans are loans, it would be rather generally agreed, I presume, that the lender was somewhat cold-blooded who insisted upon "the most favorable settlement that could be obtained short of force."

Not unlike is the case of a government at war, which, unprepared for most of its time in the war to put men in the field, placed money at the disposal of other governments to enable their sons to continue fighting and to feed and clothe these men's families while they fought.

If, when the war ended, some of these governments in consequence found themselves bankrupt, with millions of widows and orphans and mutilated victims to support, and many hundred thousand homes, farms, and factories to rebuild, although loans are loans, many, I am sure, would doubt whether the government which, by lending money had spared its own men, could justly ask that the principal of all of its loans be repaid with all of the interest its partners might muster during more than threescore years.

WHY OUR WAR LOANS WERE MADE

Yet this is exactly what happened between the United States and its war partners and which the Debt Funding Commission believed to be just. No one who remembers the circumstances surrounding the origin of our allied loans, or who has read the laws which authorized them, or the speeches about them in Congress at the time, can believe that they were created for any other purpose than to enable the United States to carry on by proxy its own battles, in which it was unable for more than a year to participate in any other substantial way.

If these loans brought benefit to Belgium and France and the other allies that benefit was only incidental and was not the purpose of the loans. During the years before we engaged in war no one had ever thought of our Government's extending credit to any of these countries, no matter what their straits, and our people would rightfully have resented any such suggestion. But in April, 1917, Congress independently and in recognition of our own manifold grievances had decided that we must fight if we were to preserve the rights and property and lives of our citizens and the integrity of our territory. The President had pledged to the task "our lives and our fortunes, everything that we are and everything that we have." Then suddenly we awakened to the fact that we had no Army to place in the field, and that even with prodigious effort we could not hope to have one for more than a year. The loans that Congress immediately decided to make were not a contribution to the allied cause. It is scarcely correct to describe them as our contribution to the common cause. They were, strictly speaking, our contribution to our own cause, and the most substantial contribution that we were able to make to that cause during all but 4 of the 19 months that we were in the war. Their sole object was clearly stated in the opening words of the authorizing act. These credits were to be extended to the allied governments "for the purpose of more effectually providing for the national security and defense—meaning our own security and defense—and prosecuting the war"—meaning, of course, our own war.

WHAT THE 1917 CONGRESS SAID OF THEM

No other thought was ever mentioned in any of the speeches when the bill was before the Senate and the House. Said Mr. Mann in the House, "We are not prepared to fight with our Army * * *. The only way left is to help finance those nations who are fighting our enemy." Said Mr. MADDEN, "We are not prepared to furnish the men to-day, and somebody else is prepared to furnish the men if we furnish the money." Said Mr. Kitchin, chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, who introduced the measure in the House, "We will be fighting with our money our battles." Said Senator SMOOT, "I think that every dollar that will be expended under the provisions of this bill, * * * will be for the benefit of the United States, whether spent by us or by the Allies." Said Senator McCumber, "While we are recognizing that we are putting $7,000,000,000 into the battle, we must not fail to recognize that we are not as yet putting in a single one of our American soldiers, while blood is being poured out by our allies in unstinted measure." Said Senator SIMMONS, who introduced the bill and explained its purport in the Senate, "Let us do this in the spirit of men * * * who are entering into it without thought of profits, without thought of financial loss, * * * without thought of the sacrifice, but ready and willing to make every sacrifice."

I shall not tax your patience with further quotations, but what was said by all of the leaders in the Senate and House without exception, by men of the East, West, North, and South, by Republicans and Democrats alike, coincided in regarding the use of our credit as a fortunate means of escape from the embarrassment of having engaged in a war which, because of our unpreparedness, we were otherwise unable to carry on. The credits, which it was understood would for the most part be expended for supplies in the United States, were not treated in the discussion as ordinary loans, much less as investments. With the conflagration raging at our doors the Congressmen and Senators of 1917 were little concerned with how or when or whether these supplies would be returned. Doubt was expressed as to whether the credits would ever be repaid, and indifference was declared both by Democratic and Republican leaders as to their repayment, and these doubts and declarations of indifference were not seriously challenged. Facing the necessity of instant action those in charge of the bill seem to have selected the form of a loan without deliberation as the quickest and simplest way to distribute our supplies among our several war partners where they would be most effective. They were not concerned with terms, but only with how they could encourage and aid our associates to go on with the war, since this was the one and only way in which we were prepared to take a part.

It is easy enough to-day, overlooking these facts, to point to the specific terms of the act adopted with so little deliberation during the first anxious fortnight after Congress declared war. It is easy to point to the promissory notes signed by allied ambassadors agreeing to pay on demand the dollars that were placed at their disposal (terms, by the way, which no one at the time expected to be met). The task of Mr. Mellon and his commission in devising formulas for settlements was greatly simplified and facilitated by confining their attention to the literal text of these documents.

THE EQUITIES IN THE CASE

Determination of justice, however, is by no means so simple a matter. It sometimes requires that we look beyond the letter of the bond. The lender of fire apparatus to whom allusion has been made might have a technical right to be reimbursed by his neighbors, and the war-time draftee might have a legal claim on the substitute whom he "hired" by a loan. Yet conscience and reason might justify neither the one nor the other in pressing his claim. The loan of material in a catastrophe to protect both lender and borrower from mortal danger is essentially different from an ordinary business loan no matter what the Debt Commission may say. It differs not only in its nature and purpose but in the moral obligation that is entailed as well. A loan to hire some one else to risk his life in the war of one's country when it was the lender's manifest place to offer himself, is likewise not assimilable to the loans of industry and trade.

The loans extended by the United States to its war partners partook of the character of both of these examples. They were made in a moment of imminent catastrophe with the intention of protecting the lender rather than the borrower from peril. They may have rendered inestimable service to the borrowing governments, but their primary purpose was to help the United States win the war in which it was engaged and to help in holding the line of battle against this country's enemies. Under the terms of their authorization these loans could not be granted for any other object, and from the first loan to the last, even those made after the armistice every dollar that was lent was spent for purposes approved by our Treasury as contributing to that end. (Cf. article by Assistant Secretary Rathbone in Foreign Affairs, April, 1925, pp. 397–398.)

Moreover these loans were used, if not to induce, at least to aid others to risk their lives in our stead. During 14 months between our declaration of war and the beginning of our participation France alone lost 270,000 dead and nearly half a million wounded fighting what then were our battles as well as her own. How many were killed or mutilated during the same period in the armies of England and Belgium and Italy I can not say, but not improbably their casualties in the aggregate were equal to those of France, which would mean that our partners in the war gave half a million lives and saw a million of their men disabled in holding the enemy back while the war was our war and we were taking no part in its sacrifices and dangers. We furnished the uniforms which these men wore, the rifles that they carried, the shells that they fired, the food and tobacco which they consumed, and we sent them food and clothing for their wives and children. That is to say, we sold these things to their Governments at double and treble their normal prices and lent them the money with which to pay.

THE COMMISSION'S OVERSIGHT

In arranging for the settlement of such loans, the Congress of the United States, with a spirit of wisdom and fairness, instructed the Debt Funding Commission to devise such terms as they believed "to be just," and Congress, trusting that they had done so, rapidly and blindly accepted the commission's recommendations with little scrutiny and without the slightest change. Careful study of the commission's reports reveals, however, no evidence that the commission devoted any attention to the equities that were involved. It shows only that they followed the easiest way, rested their case on the letter of the law, demanded "the due and forfeit of the bond," and reduced the tedium of their labors by standardizing the supposed requirements of justice into a simple formula. So far as settlements with our leading partners in the war were concerned, this formula, as we have seen, demanded repayment of the principal of their borrowings in full, together with as much interest as it was estimated that these countries might be capable of paying during 62 years, in addition to interest for the 8 or 9 years already elapsed.

There may be those who believe that such settlements will stand, but I have too much confidence in the judgment and conscience of the American people to be of their number.

THE AIR-MAIL FLYERS

Mr. ARENTZ. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nevada asks unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ARENTZ. Mr. Speaker and my colleagues, in the giving of the distinguished-service flying cross to the Army and Navy flyers we have all received a thrill of pleasure and felt keen pride in the achievement of each individual. I have asked unanimous consent of the House for two minutes this morning for the purpose of telling you about another group of flyers, the air-mail flyers—men, many of whom started in the service in 1918 and continued in it until September, 1927, when the service was discontinued as a strictly governmental agency because it was thrown under the contract system. I wish to advise you that during this period, from 1918 to 1927, there were 32 fatalities among the air-mail pilots and 9 among mechanics who flew with them. These 32 fatalities, or crashes, occurred after an average of 381,000 miles had been flown; in other words, for each crash 381,000 miles were flown by these air-mail pilots. These men flew night and day, during good weather and bad weather, over mountain passes and over deserts. If any group of men were pioneers in this important branch of service and pioneers in a wonderful work, these men were. I intend to introduce a resolution this day requesting that a joint committee of the House and Senate be appointed to investigate the wonderful work of these air-mail pilots and to inquire into the best form of memorial for these 32 air pilots who met their death in line of duty and also to provide for some suitable form of recognition in the shape of a medal and citation to each pilot in a long list who were pioneers of a high order in this new field of transportation.

We can not give them the flying cross, because this decoration can only be given to men in the Army or the Navy or the Marine Corps. If we give them any recognition whatsoever, it must take some other form than that of the flying cross.

I want to ask the Members of the House to consider this matter seriously and when this resolution comes before the House to give it the whole-hearted support I believe it deserves. The committee, when appointed, will, I am sure, give serious thought to the question, so that in the end we can create a suitable memorial, a monument, somewhere along the transcontinental airway for these brave men who gave their lives in a great cause, in an endeavor that has meant so much in the progress of aviation. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, I thank you. [Applause.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, a question for information. I am one of those who is heartily in sympathy with the effort to keep extraneous matter from being reproduced in the RECORD. I understand it is now quite generally the policy of the House, however, to permit the publication in the RECORD of the remarks of Members of the House even if made outside of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman addressing the Chair?

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. Oh, yes.

The SPEAKER. The Chair regrets he did not get the purport of the gentleman's question.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. Well, it seems that yesterday we were discussing the request of a Member for permission to reproduce in the RECORD a statement made by one of our ambassadors to a foreign court, and the objection was raised that the remarks were not made by a Member of the House, but in view of the fact that the gentleman occupies a distinguished position in the Government, why, no objection was filed, but several Members stated it would be their policy to object to everything of the kind in the future unless the words had been uttered by a Member of the House. My question, for information, is this: A few days ago I gave to the Denver Post an interview on public questions. This interview does not contain all of my words. The splendid reporter who took the interview injected some of his own and made my talk much better than it otherwise might have been. [Laughter.] I now want to know if I would be transgressing the general, unwritten rule of the House as to such publications if I should ask permission to have that interview inserted, including the splendid words interjected by the erudite interviewer? So often the reporters improve the remarks of statesmen by interjection of their own better words.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can only say he will recognize the gentleman for that purpose.

Mr. HOWARD of Nebraska. I will make the request some other time. [Laughter.]

REFERENCE OF BILLS

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to change the reference of two bills. The bill H. R. 3542 and the bill H. R. 8074 were referred to the Committee on Appropriations, when the reference should have been to the Committee on Claims. Both chairmen agree to the change of reference, and therefore the change will be made.

DEPARTMENTS OF STATE, JUSTICE, COMMERCE, AND LABOR APPROPRIATION BILL, FISCAL YEAR 1929

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8269) making appropriations for the Department of State, Department of Justice, Departments of Commerce and Labor.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, may I have the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. SHREVE. Certainly.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I think the agreement about the control of time made yesterday only applied to yesterday. Had not the gentleman better have an agreement about that?

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Speaker, I will ask unanimous consent that control of the time to-day be placed in the hands of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER] and myself, to be equally divided.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object only for the purpose of asking a question. Will this bill be read under the five-minute rule before Monday?

Mr. SHREVE. I think so. I am not prepared to say, because a number of gentlemen on both sides of the House desire to make some remarks.

Mr. BLANTON. There will be another matter up to-morrow by agreement.

Mr. SHREVE. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. And this bill will not come up to-morrow?

Mr. SHREVE. I am not prepared to say that. If the time is not all consumed to-morrow with the other bill, I shall expect to get this bill up.

Mr. BLANTON. But it is the gentleman's intention to read it under the five-minute rule as soon as possible?

Mr. SHREVE. Yes; as soon as possible.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. LEHLBACH in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SIMMONS].

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the House to the success we are having in Nebraska with the development of the dairy industry. Nebraska is a land blessed with sunshine more than many of the leading dairy States of the Union. Likewise it is a State that is blessed with a soil adapted to the raising of those crops that are necessary in the production of dairy products. It is populated with an industrious, law-abiding citizenship.

I quote now from the Nebraska Farmer of December 17, 1927, regarding the success we are having in Nebraska in the development of cooperative cheese factories and cooperative dairy associations. The people of my home county, Scottsbluff, were the first Nebraskans to begin the cooperative manufacturing of cheese.

The farmers scattered about the region who supplied milk for the first cheese factory found the venture so successful that more cooperative cheese factories were organized. Now there are five of these farmer-owned cheese factories, all within a radius of 25 miles from Scottsbluff.

Prices paid the farmer dairymen for the milk sold to the factories have been good, averaging 10 to 20 cents more per pound for butterfat than for milk marketed in the ordinary way, according to county agricultural agent Phil Sheldon. Thus a demand has been created for good dairy cows and the North Platte Dairy Development Association is the result. Purchasing the cows from high quality herds and extending the payment for the animals over a period of three years are the chief functions of the association.

It is possible to keep three dairy cows producing 30 pounds of butterfat each per month on an acre of sweet clover pasture. At the average price of butterfat which is being paid in that locality this would mean an income of more than $100 per acre for sweet clover pastured by dairy cows.

A farmer, if he is situated to keep two or three dairy cows, is usually not in a position to take a long trip into some other State to buy them. The North Platte Dairy Development Association solves this problem by buying for many farmers collectively. The demand for good dairy cows in Nebraska far exceeds the supply, and it is necessary to go some distance to buy them, usually Wisconsin. The cost of making the purchases is greatly reduced for each farmer by the association which buys in large numbers.

More than that, the association gives farmers an opportunity to extend payment for most of the purchase price over a period of three years, enabling many to buy good cows who otherwise would be unable to do so. The farmer must pay at least one-fourth of the purchase price down. The remainder is paid in monthly installments with 7 per cent interest charged for the loan. In other words, the farmer pays at the rate of $111.60 for every $100 worth of cattle purchased. The monthly payments amount to $3.10 per month per $100 worth of purchase. The principal is gradually diminished while the interest is being paid at the same time.

The monthly payments are so small that, unless faced with the most serious adversities, the farmer should have little trouble in meeting them. In fact, the principle of the scheme is that the milk checks from the cows will be large enough to cover the payments and give the farmer a good return for his labor besides. The interest rate is not unusually high when it is considered that there is some risk, especially if some of the cows are lost.

An eastern company, which buys the cheese output from the five cooperative factories, keeps a purchasing agent at the central warehouse near Gering throughout the year. Cheese from the factories is assembled there and shipped east by the purchasers.

The cheese factories pay 7 per cent on the capital invested and the remainder of the profits goes back to the milk patrons. This makes the price paid for butterfat higher than almost anywhere else in the State almost all of the time.

Mr. Eben Warner is president of the North Platte Dairy Development Association, and he was largely responsible for its organization and for raising the capital with which to finance it. Phil Sheldon, Scottsbluff County agricultural agent, is secretary of the association, and he, too, had a large part in its establishment. The association is financed for $100,000 and is capable of handling a tremendous increase in the dairying of the region.

The success of dairying in Nebraska is evidenced by its mushroomlike growth in the past few years. In 1921 Nebraska ranked sixth among all other States in butter production, while in 1926 the State's rating was fourth. The production of American whole-milk cheese has increased from 61,000 pounds in 1921 to 720,000 pounds in 1926. In all, there are about a dozen plants now producing cheese in Nebraska and during the past season this phase of dairy manufacture seemed to pay better returns to the producers than any other.

Another factor in favor of dairying, as it is being developed in the North Platte Valley, is that conversion of the more bulky crops into cheese or butter greatly reduces the freight bills. The cost of long hauls of the bulky feed crops knocks out much of the profits, while the concentrated dairy products can be marketed with better returns for the farmers.

Nebraska is producing great herds of fine dairy cattle. I quote from an article in the Holstein-Friesian World of October 22, 1927, by W. P. Snyder, superintendent of the North Platte substation of the University of Nebraska, concerning the remarkable showing made by a dairy herd developed by him at that place:

As an illustration of the manner in which the black and white breed is invading the old-time "short-grass country," and also as an illustration of the general advancement of the breed, you may be interested in a report of the progress made by the University of Nebraska North Platte Substation herd. This substation is located 300 miles west of the Missouri River in a region where the buffalo held dominion in the memory of our older neighbors. Two of that breed to-day are looking through the fence in wonder, and we trust in admiration rather than in envy, at Beauty Girl and her worthy mates. But these two are kept only as reminders of the past and as examples of the highest point nature, unassisted by man, reached in developing a dairy animal or a beef animal on the western plains. The Holsteins, Herefords, and Shorthorns in the pastures adjoining the one occupied exclusively by Bill, the buffalo, and Lucretia, his mate, exemplify the results of nature's efforts in developing dairy animals and beef animals when she has brought to her assistance the scientific knowledge and practical skill of the modern husbandman.

On September 15, 1927, there were in the University of Nebraska North Platte Substation Holstein herd 26 females, on which the Holstein-Friesian Advanced Registry Association had reported semiofficial 365-day records. The only other females in the herd are the 15-year-old foundation cow "Topsy," six heifers in their first lactation periods, and younger heifers. "Topsy" was never on yearly test. No females have been sold from the herd during the past year and no female has been purchased since the purchase of the original foundation cows, about 13 years ago.

The average of the highest milk records of each of the 26 equals 20,000 pounds. The average of the highest 365-day butter records of 16 exceeds 1,000 pounds. The average of the highest 7-day butter records of 21 exceeds 30 pounds. There are 10 in the herd, each of which has a 365-day butter record in excess of 1,000 pounds. One of these is a heifer still on test. A conservative estimate of her production for the year gives an average for the 10 of 1,127 pounds. Two more heifers will join the 1,000-pound group before January 1, 1928, barring accident.

The average of the highest butter records of the 26, 6 being made as full-age cows, 7 as 4-year-olds, 3 as 3-year-olds, 4 as senior 2, and 6 as junior 2-year-olds, and allowing a fair estimate on 4 heifers still on test, is 959 pounds.

The splendid progress made by the breed and the breeders was brought to my notice recently by Prof. A. L. Haecker, when he stated that the 10 Nebraska State records held by cows which are in this small herd to-day would all have been world records at the time he established the University of Nebraska Holstein herd 30 years ago.

All but two of these animals trace in this herd to the four heifers, all by one sire and from closely related dams, purchased on the inspection and approval of Prof. J. H. Frandsen in Michigan in 1913. At that time Professor Frandsen was in charge of the University of Nebraska Department of Dairy Husbandry. All but one trace through King Gerben Lincoln, or Varsity Derby Matador, university-bred sires, in this herd, to the grand Nebraska foundation cow, Katy Gerben Lincoln, selected in the early days by Prof. A. L. Haecker.

There is only 1 animal among the 26 that was not sired by a University of Nebraska bred bull. Only five names appear in the list of sires of the 26 females, and two of these only once each. This close-line breeding explains the unusual uniformity of type and production prevailing throughout the herd.

Our friends tell us these records are unusually high. They may be "spoofing" me. I am a beef-cattle man. If it be true that these records are exceptional, we must give the credit to the splendid foundation stock, the consistent selection of prepotent sires, and to the wonderfully invigorating western Nebraska air and the vitamin-laden alfalfa grown here. Everything connected with the herd is home grown. Only one cow not bred and developed here; the bulls now in use born here; the men developed, if not born here, and the alfalfa, silage, corn, bran, and beet pulp grown here. The little oil and cottonseed meal that we feed is kindly grown for us by our neighbors to the north and to the south.

The fact that every cow that has produced 1,000 or more pounds of butter in a year is in the herd to-day and that every cow that has produced 30 or more pounds of butter in 7 days is in the herd to-day excepting "Rose," who died at 15 years of age, and four sold as producing cows, we attribute to the open-air treatment, and of course to the short period covered by our yearly testing work. The first 365-day S. O. test was finished in 1922. The cows are in the stanchions only while being milked, regardless of weather. In the summer, excepting a few on careful test, the cows are all subject to the direct rays of the sun and also the bites of the flies. In the winter they go at will into an open shed. The alfalfa is always fed outside in the open. Silage and grain are fed at milking time.

We have endeavored to employ methods of handling this herd that may be adopted profitably by the better class of dairymen throughout this sun-kissed region.

That these cattle are not kept under hothouse conditions and that the average of the herd records could be increased by better care is shown by the fact that a junior 4-year-old heifer, N P Topsy King Piebe, when taken from the herd and protected from the heat of the sun during the midday and from the flies, quickly increased her milk flow 25 per cent. She had been on test 286 days. Her production on that date, September 1, was 18,585 pounds of milk and 850 pounds of butter. We estimated her year's production at 1,050 pounds of butter. It is readily seen that a 25 per cent increase carried through the summer would mean very much at the end.

We endeavor to sell the bulls, as far as at all practical, among the dairy farmers of our own territory at prices which the present state of development of the herds of these farmers warrant them in paying. We have deviated from this plan only twice within the past year, once when a proven sire went east to head the University of West Virginia herd and again when a young sire went west to head the University of Wyoming herd. Ten years ago we had difficulty in selling the bulls among our home people at any price, but now the difficulty is not in selling but in deciding on the price. Our patrons insist that we tell them what they should pay. This makes us in a way both buyer and seller. The problem is difficult especially when a high-record calf is reaching serviceable age.

The Holstein cow has demonstrated her adaptability to conditions existing in this region and has won the high regard of our people by her size, vigor, beauty, and high production. We know that other dairy breeds have their points of merit, but to-day we are writing of Holsteins.

Commenting upon the records of this herd the Lincoln (Nebr.) Daily Star stated editorially:

At this time when Nebraska farmers are making such progress in rebuilding their dairy herds, the significance of such work can be fully appreciated by contemplating those figures. It costs no more to keep cows of real blood, and consequently of real production, than it does the scrub variety. There has been no lavish outlay of money to provide barns for the blooded stock at the North Platte experiment farm. The herd there is housed in barns of comparatively cheap construction. Most of the feed comes from the fields of the farm maintained in connection with the station. The methods employed there are precisely the same as may be found on hundreds of Nebraska farms, where excellent results are being obtained.

The development of dairying in Nebraska does provide a hope for the future. To-day the State has jumped into third place in the value of her dairy products. With a production of 100,000,000 pounds of butter and butterfat in 1926 it is not improbable that Nebraska farms will produce 120,000,000 pounds in 1927. That is worth more than any crop produced in Nebraska, with the sole exception of corn.

[Applause.]

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN].

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, it has been a pleasure to me to listen to the speech of the distinguished gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SIMMONS] on the dairying industry in that great State. His remarks have prompted me, without preparation or access to statistics, to call attention to one of the most marvelous dairying developments, for the length of time, that has occurred in the history of this Republic, and that is the development now taking place in the lime-belt district of northeastern Mississippi which I have the honor to represent.

Our experience there abundantly sustains the contention that the South ought to, and no doubt will, become the greatest dairying country in the world.

Lindbergh's flight to Paris or his good-will expedition to Central America has not been more revolutionary in execution or effect than the invasion of that section of Mississippi by the great milk-condensing companies and cheese plants within the last three years. They have aroused our people to a realization of the possibilities of an industry that is changing the one-crop system, putting the farmer on a monthly pay roll, doubling his yearly income, furnishing a ready and convenient market for his products, reducing his fertilizer bill, enriching his land, and inspiring him with hope for and confidence in a lasting, permanent prosperity surpassing anything the South has yet seen.

Three years ago the large milk condensaries of the North began to look for new fields where an abundant milk supply could be obtained the year round. They sent their representatives to northeastern Mississippi, into that lime-belt area that was known throughout the country during Civil War days as the "granary of the Confederacy." They found what Henry Grady once described as a gentle climate above a fertile soil that yields to the husbandman every product of the Temperate Zone.

In addition to fields of cotton, well cultivated, producing from 10,000 to 35,000 bales to the county—every bale of which contains 1,000 pounds of cottonseed, which furnishes the richest and cheapest cow feed in the world—they found vast fields of corn, which gave that section its designation during the Civil War and brought it a baptism of blood and fire in the Federals' attempt to destroy that great source of Confederate supplies.

Fields of alfalfa, as fine as was ever grown in the irrigated districts of California or on the plains of Nebraska, rolling prairies furnishing an unlimited supply of the finest hay and grazing lands for herds of dairy cattle—which to their surprise our people already possessed—were astonishing revelations to those men who were seeking new localities in which to expand their crowded industries. Coupled with all this, they noted a grazing season of eight or nine months in the year, wonderful pastures, containing every variety of grass known to the cattle industry—pastures that are green when the ground in Nebraska, Minnesota, and Wisconsin is frozen as hard as a rock or covered with a sheet of snow, and the farmers in those States are feeding their cows cotton seed meal produced in Mississippi—and an ample supply of moisture that it does not require an act of Congress or an appropriation from the Federal Treasury to supply, but comes as the gift of God in the form of an abundant rainfall equitably distributed throughout the year; and great herds of the finest dairy cows to be found on this continent, more free from cattle tuberculosis, according to Government reports, than the cattle of any other section of the United States. They found practically every community threaded with hard surfaced highways, affording ample facilities for transportation.

The only thing lacking was a market. The rapidly expanding creameries could not keep pace with the increase in milk production, and were therefore unable to furnish a ready market for all of the milk supplied. The condensaries and cheese plants have supplied that market, and are bringing it to the very door of every farmer in the territory.

First, the Borden people went to Oktibbeha County and established their plant at Starkville with the understanding that they would receive 40,000 pounds of milk a day. In less than 18 months they were receiving 160,000 pounds a day, and had increased the capacity of their plant three times, while at the same time the creamery at that place became more prosperous than it had ever been before. They have now gone over to Macon in the adjoining county of Noxubee, one of the most fertile prairie counties in the South, and are there constructing another large plant with every assurance that the result will be as satisfactory as the first.

The Carnation people then came to Tupelo, in Lee County, where they found equally as favorable conditions prevailing. And, in addition, they found that 93 per cent of the farmers of that county were white people, that 95 per cent of the people of the county lived on hard-surfaced roads leading to Tupelo, the county site, and connecting there with two transcontinental highways that cross in that city. They found that while people in other sections of the country were clamoring for reclamation legislation, those people had reclaimed their own land. Thirty-four drainage districts had already been organized, the bonds sold, the canals cut, the land put in cultivation, and the bonds now being retired. A splendid school system, with 22 consolidated schools in the county, nearly all with splendid brick buildings, with trucks transporting the children to and from school, amply supplied with able instructors, afforded educational facilities second to none.

The Carnation plant at Tupelo had its formal opening on May 12 last year, with the expressed hope of securing 60,000 pounds of milk a day at the end of the first year, and passed that mark within less than 90 days.

The people of Monroe County raised the money themselves and built their own condensary at Aberdeen, where they now have a plant that is furnishing a market to the farmers of that county equal to that enjoyed by the people of Oktibbeha and Lee. They have done this in the face of the fact that Monroe County was going through the excitement of bringing in the first commercially producing gas wells south of the Mason and Dixon line and east of the Mississippi River.

At Columbus, in Lowndes County, preparations are going rapidly forward for the construction of a large cheese plant, another one is under construction at Billups, and another one is to be constructed at Artesia—all in the same county. The distinguished chairman of this committee [Mr. SHREVE] once resided in Lowndes County, and he will bear witness that richer prairie lands—or lands better suited to dairying—are not to be found in the United States.

Another large condensary is being located just across the line at Tuscaloosa, the home of the distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER].

The Pet people have placed one of their condensaries at Kosciusko, and cheese plants have been established at Louisville, Houston, Durant, Yazoo City, and other points throughout Mississippi. Negotiations are under way for plants at Corinth, Amory, Iuka, Belmont, Booneville, Okolona, and many other points in the State, while several large condensaries have been located just north of us in the State of Tennessee.

This is but the beginning of the inevitable movement of the great dairying industry to the South, where conditions are most favorable for its development and permanent prosperity.

At the rate we are going, it will be only a matter of a short time till practically every farmer in northeastern Mississippi will be on a milk route, thus bringing the market right to his door and putting him on a monthly pay roll. Add that to his cotton crop, as well as his feed crops of corn, hay, and cottonseed, and you will understand why it is that northeastern Mississippi is attracting nation-wide attention and bidding fair to become one of the greatest dairying sections of the world. [Applause.]

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, this speech just delivered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. RANKIN] was made without the slightest notice, and made at my request, because I recognize that no one has contributed more to agricultural development than has Mr. RANKIN. I know the interest that he has shown in soliciting these condensaries and cheese factories to locate in that section, and I am sure the House has enjoyed the statement that he has made. [Applause.]

Mr. LOWREY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANKIN. Yes.

Mr. LOWREY. Mr. Chairman, I very heartily approve and highly appreciate the gentleman's splendid statement about his district, but he has omitted one of the greatest assets that his district has, and that is that it lies just across the county line from the second district of Mississippi, and the thing goes upward as you go from the first to the second.

Mr. RANKIN. Like Moses, Mr. Chairman, he is just in sight of the promised land.

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 40 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. DAVENPORT].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is recognized for 40 minutes.

Mr. DAVENPORT. Mr. Chairman, I think I shall not need 40 minutes. What I have to say is addressed to the point of appropriations for the Department of State.

I had hoped that when I should first speak in this House it might be upon a theme or problem some phase of which I had made myself thoroughly informed about by rigid inquiry. But it so happens that what I have to offer the House now is rather a ground for an appeal for early inquiry into certain suspicions which have been aroused in me concerning the sound organization and efficiency of the Department of State at its heart here in the city of Washington. What I have to say is to be no dramatic attack upon persons, no destructive brick throwing at traditional ideals. I challenge a system the responsibility for which is first of all with the American people themselves, their long-time lack of thought and care about international affairs, their willingness to applaud and appreciate the institutions and the policies which make for material national welfare immediately within our own borders, while forgetful to too great a degree that the world has become one, that the problems called foreign are every whit as vast in their national import as any purely domestic matter or policy possibly could be. How to avoid misundertanding, ill will, aggression, war, personal suffering, vast economic loss; how to gain good will, good understanding, friendly cooperation, prosperity, peace—these questions are so close to us now that international affairs have become national in a sense in which they never were before in our history.

Almost down to the world catastrophe of 1914 the Secretary of State was far from being an overburdened man, and glorious old Assistant Secretary Adee could carry the historical continuity of the department under his hat. But that day is gone by never to return. Foreign nations are all our next-door neighbors, and we are suddenly the greatest economic and political entity that the world ever saw. We are developing a vast reservoir of capital. We are financing the world. We have eleven billions invested in foreign countries now and are adding to it at the rate of a billion a year. A billion in the last few years has gone into a reviving and hard-working Germany. Capital is flowing into South America, which is normally our field, at a terrific rate. And nothing can stop it anywhere.

Citizens go with it. International law and order and sound and free international relations and highly intelligent international leadership in Washington are the breath of life to American business. Business associations are coming to see that, while it is important to work with the Department of Commerce, continuing prosperity and safety in the international field depend fundamentally upon the Department of State. When the shipper gets into trouble, when cargoes are seized, when foreign governments undertake to lay down rules and to countenance practices which cause forfeiture of the rights of our people or encroach upon ordinary privileges, the Department of State is the place to which the trouble victim goes for relief. The Department of State furnishes the approach to the foreign government, and upon the intelligence and skill and good spirit with which the case is presented depends the likelihood of a remedy; and this entirely aside from the use of force and in an entirely different arena. The French Government alters its tariff relations with the United States. Instantly the Department of State is the center upon which all lines converge. Everybody hastens there to see what is to be done about it; what representations can be made to France. And as the result of the immediate and energetic work of the Department of State the French Government changes its position, agrees to enter into negotiations for a friendly commercial treaty, giving advantageous rates to American business in the meantime, being persuaded by the Department of State that in the end this is best for the interests of both countries.

The Department of State occupies or should occupy in modern life the place of preeminence among departments. It holds a peculiar relation to the Executive. It is the right arm of the President in dealing with foreign countries. It is the only department which makes no report to Congress.

The Department of State is charged with maintaining peace, with keeping the boat from rocking, with getting rid of many strained relations which eventually may result in war. Its great function is to prevent war. War is the failure of diplomacy. The Department of State is the first line of defense. It is par excellence the department of peace. If this department is feebly organized, if it has deteriorated into a parlous condition, then the country is in danger as from the decline of no great department of government whatsoever.

Now, what are the facts? In the beginning we were alive as a nation to the great need of skillful leadership in foreign affairs, and we were not obliged to depend widely upon untrained diplomats or a white-spat corps. The experiences of the Colonies with foreign countries had developed a keenness of international relation which was reflected in the ready minds of men like Franklin and Adams, when the time came for diplomatic service and decision of the first magnitude. Franklin went to France because there was nobody in America so fitted to go to France, and Franklin was successful in France because he was an old salt at the business and knew all the sea lanes and reefs of diplomacy. For 16 years before the Revolution he had handled in London by negotiation and persuasion the foreign affairs of Pennsylvania and New Jersey and Georgia and Massachusetts.

As the nineteenth century waxed and we became more and more free from the commercial as well as the political entanglements of the Old World, and more and more aloof in national mind, we lost to some degree our keenness of interest and diplomatic edge in foreign affairs. Diplomatic and consular positions became the mere spoil of victorious parties. Edward Livingston, the great Secretary of State in President Jackson's day, was the first clear voice to be heard in the attempt to arouse the country from its lethargy and carelessness about its foreign affairs. The immediate effect of Livingston's demand for consular reorganization and reform appears to have been to invite attention more definitely to the jobs, to intensify the raid on the Foreign Service, and to multiply existing abuses and inefficiencies. It was not until nearly a quarter of a century had passed—in 1856—that an important act of Congress undertook the first real regulation of the diplomatic and consular systems of the United States. The act of 1856 established the range of diplomatic stipends, put the highest grade of consular officers upon a salary basis and prohibited them from engaging in private trade, established a system of accounting and bonding, and prepared the entering wedge for the merit system by creating a corps of consular pupils of peculiar fitness and qualification to be certified to by the Secretary of State and the President. It also put the force of law behind orders and instructions of the President to diplomatic and consular officers, so far as these orders did not contravene the Constitution or any existing statute of the United States. And then came the Civil War, and following it a long period of indifference to international affairs, except when for a brief moment they might seem to be about to involve us; an attitude of the public mind reflected in Congress and continuing well up to the end of the century and the war with Spain. In 1895 President Cleveland issued an Executive order providing for a system of examination and transfer and promotion of consuls and commercial agents in order to produce a better qualified body of officials. The order died with Cleveland's administration, and the vision of a better day came again with Theodore Roosevelt in 1906. The new act of that year, grading and classifying the posts in the Consular Service, gave the President his opportunity. The merit system was established by Executive order with the punch of power, and inspection, bonding, and accounting rid the consular ranks of irregular practices which had been a shame upon our foreign relations for a hundred years.

Suddenly the business interests of the country rallied to the support of the Roosevelt consular order, and following three years of successful operation President Taft issued similar instructions for the Diplomatic Service below the grade of minister. The rising tide of public opinion, both in Congress and out, now began to demand the enactment of a still more flexible statute, providing for greater mobility of personnel and the overt recognition in law of the merit principle inherent in the executive orders of Roosevelt and Taft. And so came the act of February 5, 1915, to fulfill these plain requirements of a better apprehension of the needs of the country in foreign affairs. Thereafter men were not tied to positions, but could be transferred from post to post according to their qualifications and the interests of the service.

And then the Great War and the recognition by all thoughtful men that, irrespective of the degree of our direct participation in any international organization, the foreign affairs of the world were creeping up very close to us and were increasing significantly in magnitude. Our foreign affairs are now full of economic questions such as never faced us before. And they have vast electrical political factors and consequences. Whether we wish it or not, we are in the front rank of preeminence in foreign affairs, and we can not retire to the rear. We have no choice but to meet the new responsibilities and obligations. We will meet them in our own way, but we must meet them.

Among those who saw clearly that only a beginning had yet been made in providing an adequate department of leadership and protection in foreign affairs, and high on the roll of honor is the name of the Hon. John Jacob Rogers, of Massachusetts, whose influence still abides in both intangible and tangible form in this House. [Applause.] (Representative EDITH NOURSE ROGERS is the widow of former Congressman Rogers.) The Rogers Act of 1924 laid for the first time in this country the foundation for new vigor and hope in the foreign-service area of the Department of State. It is too early to estimate the good that will eventually be accomplished. A new scale of salaries ranging from $1,500 to $9,000 is ordered by the Rogers Act, in actual practice beginning at $2,500. Before this most consuls and diplomatic secretaries were unable to eke out an existence on the meager stipend of the statute. The inevitable result in embassies and legations was the reign of the white-spat corps, so clearly emotionalized for us the other day in the speech of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN]. I am not able to join with him in excoriation of Sheldon Whitehouse, of the embassy at Paris, who seems to have been delightfully hospitable to the "mayor of the greatest city in the world," if authoritative rumor may be credited. And as for the detectives who stalked the mayor, they were actually assigned by the French police on the suggestion of a friend of the mayor who was managing his Paris movements. What the French did was exactly what is done usually for persons of prominence in the city of Paris upon request.

But the white-spat corps, so fittingly and feelingly described the other day by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN], is a reality at least in some cases in the outer courts of certain diplomatic offices of the United States. And such cases will be there until within a generation, under the new regulations of the Rogers Act, a more efficient type of young manhood, beginning between the ages of 21 and 35, shall have become trained and experienced and shall have climbed up into the responsible positions of the Nation in the purely Foreign Service. In the meantime the white-spat corps, with higher pay under the Rogers Act, in some cases disport themselves with what appears to be disdain for their countrymen and with a blasé inefficiency in their daily vocations. They are the same men for the most part who before the better salaries of the act of 1924 lived on a private income earned one or two generations back, whose lives were organized by their fathers before them, who were provided without labor with the equipment of their class, a trip through college, a coonskin coat, the establishment in business. This class, which we have hitherto had to dip into for the lesser diplomats, have never had to exert themselves. With them it is bad form to appear like the active salesmen of their fathers' business. They must not be too wide-awake or too earnest or too interested in anything. And that is the way they act when they get into the distinction of the Diplomatic Service. This I conceive to be the genesis of the spirit of the diplomatic white-spat corps.

The Rogers Act is not only slowly training a new and better body of diplomatic and consular officers but in the end it should greatly democratize our personal contacts with foreign affairs. There is no longer a hard and fast line between the diplomatic and consular office, but young men are moved from one to the other. They must take the training in consular hard knocks as well as in the soft, smooth ways of the social salon.

The Foreign Service of the country can not be made both efficient and democratic too soon, because we are no longer dealing with monarchs and dynasties but with peoples on the march. If our diplomats succeed in the future, it will be because they understand and appreciate and in the right sense sympathize with the human and economic and racial interests of the countries to which they are accredited, and are sincerely in earnest to carry the good will and good understanding of America to the peoples beyond our borders. The only young men fit to represent us in foreign parts are those who are in sympathy with advancing democracy throughout the world and whose character and ability match the advancing prestige of the United States among the nations. [Applause.] In other words, a Lindbergh everywhere on guard.

A great foreign office and its representatives abroad must now be expert in the psychology of other peoples. A very distinguished international statesman in this country once said to me that most of our troubles in South America had been the result of the lack of understanding on the part of our foreign representatives of the human nature of the people of the Southern Hemisphere.

Take the Latin-American field in which we have so many perplexing and disquieting problems. We are interested there as no government on earth is. We are coming to see that the secret of successful relations with Latin America is the personal equation. Morrow and Lindbergh are diplomats par excellence because they are masters of the art of human nature. Their sympathy is sincere to impress upon the Mexican people and other Latin-American peoples the good understanding and good will of their countrymen. The Latin Americans are an entirely different race of people from ours. Their whole approach to government is diametrically opposed to ours. The Latin American will determine very much what he will do about a certain matter by whether he likes you or not. We determine what we will do mainly by what we think of the principle involved. A traveling salesman from the United States goes to Latin America and stops off between steamers and tries to sell, and frequently does not succeed. The French or German salesman stops off for two or three weeks, goes into the shop of the merchant, exchanges formal greetings, inquires about the wife and children, and goes out again. By and by he comes back and there are other pleasant expressions. Days go by before anything is said about selling merchandise, but when all conventionalities are finally met, the Latin American is ready to talk business.

The same principle of the sympathetic and understanding mind is applicable to ambassadors, ministers, and consuls—to deal with foreign peoples as they want to be dealt with, with time and patience and good temper and kindliness and the spending of some money. We have been niggardly about representation and entertainment allowances for our foreign representatives, and have frequently thereby lost in caste and influence in the foreign field. Under the statute of 1924 entertainment expenses may go to ambassadors and ministers, but they have never yet been provided. As a matter of fact, they are probably not so useful in the hands of ambassadors and ministers as the same sums would be in the hands of the lower range of officials. [Applause.]

The Committee on Appropriations has knowledge of these things and in its new bill has gone further than ever before in meeting the needs of the present hour. The main difficulty seems to be with the Budget office. The Budget office appears not to be able to look upon the Department of State as a producing organization. Keeping the world peace for America seems not a tangible thing to market. If a cut in the Department of Commerce appropriations is imminent, the Secretary is able to say, "All right. Which lighthouse will you have wink out to-night?" The shippers or their clients will wail before the throne. The bankers will support the Treasury demands and the farmers will not listen to a decline in the agricultural appropriations. But the best things the Department of State may do for the country they can not tell about; if they tell about them, they can never do them again. Any day there may be a decision of policy that involves millions. A mistake in the Department of State is more costly than anywhere else. It is only when we come to think of the leadership and activities of the Department of State as fraught with graver consequences to the American people for weal or woe than any other mere department whatever, it is only when we see that the decisions made there pave the way to war or peace, to prosperity and happiness, or to vast economic and personal loss, that we approach in the right way the subject of the care which Congress should exercise over the personnel and the needs of the foreign office of the United States. And from such inquiry as I have so far been able to make, I believe it to be the view of most well-informed people, inside the department and out, that the Foreign Office of the United States, in spite of the advance of the Rogers Act, is still a long way from sound organization and safe functioning for the American people.

In the first place the Rogers Act applies only to representatives of our foreign affairs abroad. Whatever reorganization and better salary classification and democratization may ultimately do for the Foreign Service, the field of the Department of State at home in Washington is as yet untouched. And here is the brain center of our foreign affairs. Here they tell the Foreign Service what to think and what to do, after being fed with the facts by the Foreign Service. But here men engaged upon foreign affairs are underpaid and overburdened because their offices are undermanned; in spite of all that a number of devoted and able men in the department can do, they are always sitting over dynamite, things being as they are, usually critical somewhere in the affairs of the world. Salaries in the department at home are still on the old-time basis. Young men are brought in from the higher schools of the country and started at $1,320 a year. The natural tendency is for a bright young man to get a little experience at the expense of the Government and go out into private practice to profit by it. A few utterly devoted souls hang on, together with those who can do no better elsewhere, and in the course of 15 or 20 years of faithful or inefficient service, as the case may be, attain to the maximum salary of $6,000 a year, and this in the city of Washington!

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Certainly.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. If the gentleman's indictment against the Bureau of the Budget is well founded, it applies with equal force as to many matters referred to Congress itself. So far as the subcommittee handling appropriations for the Department of State is concerned, there have been no protests filed with reference to the appropriations made, and if the gentleman can point out the number of men who have resigned in the last few years on account of small pay, either from clerical or other positions, I should like to have him do so in the extension of his remarks.

Mr. DAVENPORT. Yes.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. The Foreign Service is important, but the Foreign Service under the Rogers Act has been given what was asked for at that time. This committee in the pending bill has increased appropriations $175,000 in order to add to the pay of the Foreign Service, and we gave $60,000 to provide for additional clerks to aid the Foreign Service in supplying information to the Department of Commerce. We have also provided for the building of homes for them abroad, and building in a way that perhaps no other country has yet undertaken. In a tropical country we select large areas, and they are so improved as to be free from tropical diseases which so many have suffered from; and if the gentleman will read the hearings in reference to the building program, I think he will find that if we have neglected any department it has not been the Department of State. It has fared very well.

Mr. DAVENPORT. I will say to the gentleman that if he will wait until I am through he will see to what point my criticism turns. It is not with respect to the Foreign Service so much as to the department at home. I shall try to make that clear before I get through.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Certainly.

Mr. LINTHICUM. In response to the statement of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER], I may say that two of the ablest young men in the department, Mr. Richardson and Mr. Dalton, resigned within the last two years because they could not get a living out of the salary paid. They are both Marylanders.

Mr. DAVENPORT. Yes; and the turnover of the Department of State in the last year has been 19 per cent. In the department in the city of Washington the salaries still range from $1,320 to $6,000 as chief of division.

I am reliably informed that a responsible officer of the State Department has long been in the habit of getting up at 5 o'clock Monday morning to do the family washing, and he does not like the job, either. I say, more honor to him for doing it and more shame to the Government of the United States for permitting good minds in the most critical and vital department of the Government to be harried to such a degree by inadequate provision for ordinary material needs. [Applause.]

In the act of 1906 there is an absurd limitation of $1,000 a year on the salaries of foreign clerks in the Department of State. The Department of Commerce is hampered by no such statute. The result is that the Department of Commerce is drawing these young men, who come to be good consular clerks, away from the Department of State.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Congress itself imposed that limitation, I think somewhat unwisely. The committee will bring it to the attention of Congress and it is probable that the Department of State will be allowed to employ at such rates as they think wise.

Mr. DAVENPORT. The State Department at home has six chiefs of division, one for western Europe, one for eastern Europe, one for the Near East, one for the Far East, one for Latin America, and one for Mexico. Each one of them advises the Secretary of State about his particular geographic area, and it is upon his skill and wisdom in the interpretation of events that the Secretary relies. These chiefs for the most part are no longer bred at home. It has become very difficult in the department to develop a personnel from the lower to the higher offices. The human stuff does not stay there to be trained. It gets out to earn a sufficient amount of honest daily bread to feed its family. The turnover for the Department of State in Washington for the single fiscal year 1927 is 19 per cent.

It is necessary therefore to recruit these chiefs of division from the Foreign Service. For the year 1928 we have robbed the Foreign Service of 51 good men, taking them from their geographic areas abroad, and perhaps they do not go at all into the appropriate geographic division in which they are expert when they get to Washington. During the recent very troubled times with Mexico, we have had at the head of the Mexican division a man of good ability but little expert knowledge of Mexico. These men who are brought in from the foreign field to rejuvenate the department at home may remain, under the statute, only four years. Then they must get away again to some field which happens to be open. There is a man named Kelly in the Department of State right now who knows more about Russia than anybody in the United States. He is invaluable in an area which requires intimate knowledge and great skill, and the department can not replace him, but he must leave soon and he may go to Java or Bombay. When diplomacy fails and war comes, the buck passes from the Department of State to the Departments of War and the Navy, and their organization expenditures are vastly inflated, while those of the Department of State comparatively recede. When peace comes again, the War and the Navy are deflated; but it may very well be that the Department of State, with the tremendously enlarged foreign responsibilities of a peace time like the present, is seriously injured if the theory is that it should share in the deflation. There is something to be said for occasionally bringing home men from the foreign field in order that Washington may feel the fresh vigor of their information and imagination, but there is nothing to be said for the present frequently employed method of using them when they get here.

What shall we think of the good sense of a government which goes only half way with its plans for the reform of its foreign office, and permits men with relatively subordinate positions in the Foreign Service, with salaries of $7,000 to $9,000 a year, to be brought home to advise and assist their superior officers who have salaries of considerably less amount? Is it not a fair field for heartburnings and subconscious jealousies and general decay of initiative and hope?

Above the chiefs of division, who are now necessarily and usually brought in from abroad, are the four Assistant Secretaries of State and the Undersecretary of State. They are the chief group of authoritative officers in the department, with salaries of $7,500 a year and grave responsibilities. They make the decisions and issue the orders to the Foreign Service. And the system subjects them to constant demoralization. They are always getting out and getting into the larger salaries and larger freedom, each within his own domain, of the relatively subordinate Foreign Service. Wright, Harrison, Grew, Wilson, Phillips, Assistant Secretaries and heads of the information and trades division, not far apart, catapulted into the larger rewards of the Foreign Service. They themselves, having given orders and grown experienced in doing it, go out to take orders from the relative inexperience which in too many cases must fill their places. From the standpoint of efficient business organization the system in the State Department is as topsy-turvy as Alice ever found Wonderland.

The Solicitor of the Department of State is counsel for the American people in international affairs. His function is that of handling the claims of citizens of the United States against foreign governments and of nationals of foreign countries against the United States. He interprets the rights of the United States and of its nationals under all international agreements. He is the legal expert in international arbitrations, and is responsible for the drafting of treaties. I have heard those whose experience justified their opinion say that there are probably not more than half a dozen persons in the United States thoroughly competent for this position. The solicitor should be the leading international lawyer in the Union. We have a good one now. He gets $7,000 a year. He gets it because that is the way he is classified, along with other solicitors of other departments, where the making of sound contracts in ordinary matters is the daily pursuit of men who perhaps can be somewhat easily procured in the market for $7,000 a year. A great corporation in New York City could not be made to believe that it was receiving wise advice unless in the case of a man competent to attack such problems as those of the Solicitor in the State Department, the salary was at least fifty or one hundred thousand dollars a year. The Government could probably have held the now famous John Bassett Moore if they could have paid him a living salary. He came to Washington as a $1,200 clerk; then got $1,800; then as Third Assistant Secretary, $2,500. Then he left. Then he came back again as counselor for the State Department. Then he was out again.

The present solicitor has 22 assistants. His salary can not go any higher, because under the classification act the top salary is paid to Assistant Secretaries; that is, $7,500. And so there the solicitor sticks, held to his office and the guidance of his 22 assistants. The British counsel, Sir Cecil Hurst, is always abroad on every important need, in constant touch with the chancellories of the world.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Yes.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Can the gentleman tell us what the British solicitor gets?

Mr. DAVENPORT. I can not; but it is no doubt more than $7,000. It is more probably £7,000.

And there is another great danger, it seems to me, that will let us in sooner or later for some real trouble; that is, the tendency on the part of other departments which have interests abroad, to get as far into the field themselves as they can with their own foreign service. I dare say there should be Treasury agents abroad, and no doubt there should be reporting and investigating abroad by agents of the Department of Commerce. But the responsibility and the decisions should head up in one place—that is, the Department of State—and the general policy should be fixed there in advance.

On the evening of March 31, 1927, the Assistant Secretary of Labor sent over to the Department of State an order which the Department of Labor had issued, going into effect April 1, restraining all alien commuters coming across the Canadian border daily to work in the United States, unless they could produce immigration visas. This matter had been allowed to run along from July 1, 1924, when the new immigration law went into effect, with nothing said about it. Indeed, the Secretary of Labor wrote a letter to the mayor of Windsor, Canada, that no change of policy was contemplated. Then out of the blue came this order. Legally the Secretary of Labor had a right to issue the order, but practically it brought a protest from the Canadian Government at once on the ground of injustice to a lot of innocent people. As a result several of the leading officers of the Department of State were occupied with this thing for two or three weeks in intense effort conferring and arguing with the Department of Labor. There was much unfavorable publicity, much feeling in Canada, and some danger of injuring our relations with a long-time friend. The matter was not settled until late in November.

As the result of the handicap which the department faces in developing adequate organization in its own staff the country is under the anomaly, and the large expense in the case of claims commissions, of having all the preliminaries in such cases farmed out to outsiders who ultimately carry off into their own private practice the fruits of the evidence and the study, leaving the department as poverty stricken as before and as unprepared for any future controversy. It seems to be a reasonable view that a well-organized department should furnish continuing ability for the preparation of these cases and the presentation of the Claims Commission, and continuing records of the results.

If any institution of government in this country needs leisure to think in the modern world since the war, it is the Department of State. Under the imperfect organization and the inadequate personnel, every-day questions must every day be put to important executive officers without the background of research which reasonably assures the man who makes the decision that he is doing it accurately. The executive official has not time for the research, and no thorough machinery for it appears anywhere. Men of long experience in these matters, inside the department and out, tell me that there is necessarily too much snap judgment in the Foreign Office of the United States. Foreign relations are too important for snap judgments, and under the existing order it is little short of miraculous that things have gone as well as they have. In the order of nature and chance we are likely in the future as in the past to have some good Secretaries of State and some who are not so good. But with the increasing magnitude and importance and complexity of foreign problems since the war, a capable Secretary might be led by an incapable organization into catastrophe, and an incapable Secretary might be led into disaster.

The disparity in expenditure between the departments of war and the fundamental department of peace, namely, the Department of State, is very striking. In 1926 six hundred and seventy-six millions for the War and Navy and less than ten millions for the department of peace. Actually the net cost of the department of peace to the taxpayers of the country was $1,350,000, because the Department of State produces between eight and nine millions in fees and other receipts. In 1928 the appropriations for the Department of State will reach above twelve millions and the receipts nearly nine millions, leaving approximately three millions net cost for the department of peace at home and throughout the world. The American people are not niggardly about an adequate expenditure for defense, and if a three millions burden upon the taxpayer is sufficient to insure skillful international leadership, enough is enough. But if it shall appear that inadequate appropriations, in view of the vast interests at stake, are injurious to the functioning of the great department of peace, neither will the American people begrudge those additions which make for the skillful and unhampered leadership of foreign affairs. Necessary additions to present appropriations to put the Department of State at home on a sound basis would probably not total over one or two hundred thousand dollars, and to do the same for the Department of State throughout the world, probably less than a million dollars.

Whether the remedy for the present organization is to extend the Rogers Act in some form to cover the whole of the department, or whether there are simple solutions nearer at hand, I do not know. The thing I suggest is a friendly survey by joint action of Congress and the Department of State of the needs of the country in the better organization of the machinery and personnel of the foreign office. There never was a time in the history of the foreign affairs of America when there was need for greater wisdom and efficiency in the foreign office. We are in a position of security and prosperity to be envied, and the last trait of human nature that we should wish to arouse by mistaken views or wrong conduct of our own is envy. What we should wish to avoid most sincerely is any tendency, growing out of envy or misunderstanding, for nations to league against us either in Europe or the Far East. That there is some ground for fear of this tendency is a fact known to all.

In the present situation in China we have a fair and notable example of the need of skill and vision in the Department of State. Whatever the political and military chaos of the hour, the nationalist movement in China seems to be the only sure trend upon which to count. Upon the throwing off of foreign interference and the establishment of a national unity the heart of the four hundred millions of China seems to be definitely set. The peril in the nationalist movement has been the subtle influence of the Soviet Government of Russia for the last several years. Beginning with last May the nationalist movement in China began to eliminate that influence and is continuing the process with unabated vigor. But the Chinese people in their onward march need the wise and sympathetic support of genuine friendship from some influential source. The chief figure in the nationalist movement appears to be Chiang Kai Shek, some time generalissimo of the nationalist forces, and now the chairman of the advisory council in nationalist affairs. The other day in a wistful interview he pleaded for an American commission to come over and examine with the Government at Nanking, and perhaps at Peking also, the question of the revision of treaties and our relation to the China of the future. I am not saying whether it should or should not be done, but great things are afoot, and there is need in the Department of State for clarity of vision and wisdom of decision. Whether we have a Department of State fit for this task may make a great difference with the future of America and the future of the world.

Mr. Chairman, the following table, introduced by Representative BACON, of New York, indicating that under existing statute the Department of State is entitled to approximately $64,000 a

DECEMBER 16, 1927.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to myself. No one will deny that the Department of State is one of the great and one of the most important departments of the Government. When the gentleman from New York [Mr. DAVENPORT] undertook, however, to arraign the Budget officer, General Lord, in reference to his recommendations for the Department of State, knowing, as I did, that as to many of the matters complained of he was limited by the action of Congress itself, I felt it was but just to say that if there be blame on the Budget officer as to these matters, that blame likewise attaches to Congress for having passed legislative limitations.

The State Department is the one department of the Government that is in constant communication with the President, perhaps more so than any other department of the Government. The Secretary of State doubtless has more important official conversations with the President than any other Cabinet officer; and yet, so far as I know, there have been no recommendations by either the Secretary of State or the President to the proper committee of the House, the Foreign Affairs Committee, for legislation that would enable Congress, acting through its Appropriations Committee, to give relief, if relief be required, in reference to many matters to which the gentleman has referred.

Take, for instance, the limitation that the gentleman from New York speaks of with reference to the employment of foreign clerks. That is wrong; yet neither the Appropriations Committee nor the Budget officer has authority to remove the limitation. It was placed there by Congress and does not obtain in reference to some other departments. But so important was it that Mr. SHREVE and other members of the subcommittee intended calling it to the attention of the proper legislative committee and ask that they at this session remove the limitation and place such clerks on an equality with foreign clerks employed by other departments.

Take for instance, another item, the item for paying the return traveling expenses of State Department officials after long absences in foreign fields. While we have had a law authorizing this for many years, yet the law was so written that it left it discretionary with the Secretary of State as to whether he would recommend appropriations for this purpose. No appropriation had been asked for. This committee of its own volition at the last session of Congress voted an initial appropriation for that purpose [applause], and the present bill carries an increase in the appropriation.

Mr. BACON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. BACON. Is it not true that the Department of State requested increased appropriations from the Director of the Budget; that he turned them down, and therefore they were estopped from coming to the Appropriations Committee of the House?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I am not informed as to that. What I was leading up to is this: That if some of the things the gentleman from New York has said are true, either Congress is at fault or the President and the Secretary of State are at fault in not calling them to the attention of Congress. No request, I say to the House, made to our committee has yet been denied, so far as I recall, for the Department of State where proof was afforded justifying the request. We have granted them, sometimes of our own volition, increases in clerk pay and increases in clerk numbers.

Rather strange that, though I have served on this committee for four or five years, only once during that time has the present Secretary of State ever thought it important enough to come before the committee.

The department has been ably represented, however, by Mr. Wilbur Carr, Assistant Secretary of State. There is no abler man in Government service than Mr. Carr, but it is well for the Secretary of State, if an injustice has been done to his department, as claimed by the gentleman from New York, to occasionally come and at least make a statement to our committee relative thereto. [Applause.] So, if there be grounds of complaint, let it be understood that the Secretary of State is not free from negligence in not calling these matters to the attention of the proper committees of the House, and the President is likewise not free from fault for the same reason. They should know about these matters much better than the gentleman from New York. The Secretary of State came before our committee for the first time at this session of Congress, but no allusion was made to any injustice to the Department of State. He referred to none of these matters now complained of, and many of these, perhaps, have fallen into the hands of our colleague through some subordinate of the Department of State.

What I wanted the House to know was that the Secretary of State has, himself, been negligent in not presenting those matters if they be true.

Mr. NEWTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. NEWTON. Of course, the fact remains that if the criticisms of the gentleman from New York are justified, either in whole or in part, that, regardless of a recommendation from the executive branch of the Government, there is an obligation resting upon the legislative committee of Congress to take up the proposition, study it, and act upon it. I take it that is the view of the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. It would be much better for the State Department, through its head who is a Cabinet officer and in constant communication with the President, not to pursue a subterranean channel such as has been adopted. It would be much better for him to come before the legislative committee himself, make the recommendations, and let them give consideration thereto.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. The Committee on Appropriations can appropriate only when authorized by law?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Certainly.

Mr. BLANTON. And if they were to put an item of appropriation in the bill when there is no authority of law for it, a point of order would be good against it, and it would be knocked out if a point of order were made?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Unquestionably so.

Mr. DAVENPORT. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I gladly yield to the gentleman.

Mr. DAVENPORT. I had to go to the telephone a moment. I did not want to lose what the gentleman was saying, but I heard as I came in something about a subterranean method.

Mr. Chairman, I think I can explain to the gentleman there was nothing subterranean about this. I never knew anything about it myself until sometime during the summer when I happened to be at the Honolulu Conference on International Relations and the matter was brought to my attention quite incidentally by one not connected with the State Department, but who knew something about it. When I got home I referred to it in a public speech, and I noticed that it attracted attention in a number of places. When I came here I made an independent inquiry about it. There was nothing subterranean about it, from the organization in the House or any other source whatever. Nobody knew anything about it except the people I consulted. Nobody took the initiative in the matter except myself.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I acquit the gentleman, then, of having himself submitted something that was perhaps handed to him by some one else.

Mr. DAVENPORT. That is not my method.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. May I ask this question, however? The Committee on Appropriations is quite familiar with methods sometimes followed and I assume the information the gentleman gave, of course, came from the Department of State.

Mr. DAVENPORT. No, Mr. Chairman. It came from men who have long left the Department of State.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Only from them.

Mr. DAVENPORT. And who suffered, therefore, from the situation in the Department of State.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. May I ask whether the allusion the gentleman made to the pay of special counsel came from men who had left the Department of State, or was that brought to the gentleman's attention by some one connected with the department?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Mr. Chairman, I have no recollection where that particular item came from; but, as a matter of fact, when I go into these things I do not stop to take anybody's view of them, but make a careful study of them from different sources.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. I was wondering whether our distinguished friend the gentleman from New York [Mr. DAVENPORT], who has been a professor of political economy, has been to our legislative committee with his complaints and has requested them to bring in legislation that would authorize the Committee on Appropriations to cover such items as the gentleman has had under consideration. There is where his action should be taken, before the legislative committee, because the Committee on Appropriations is absolutely helpless until some law is passed that would warrant such appropriations.

Mr. DAVENPORT. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I will yield the gentleman two minutes.

Mr. DAVENPORT. I do not even want two minutes, but may I say that the suggestion of the gentleman from Texas may be a very good one, but I chose another method, bringing it directly to the Congress of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. Congress acts only through its legislative committees. For until a legislative committee regularly brings legislation before the House, the House is helpless and can not give consideration to same.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The gentleman from New York is well within his rights.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. No; I am afraid the gentleman is not, if you will permit me. Such rights are becoming out of date. It is becoming so, I verily believe, that an appeal to the House of Representatives when it is in the Committee of the Whole to remedy any injustice of this or any other kind, is a very archaic method. [Laughter.]

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I had not intended, and I am sure the committee has not inferred from anything I have said, that it is ever improper to bring a matter before Congress, but I thought, in view of this complaint, and the fact that the gentleman seemingly spoke with deep conviction in reference to these matters, and knowing that the Secretary of State should be well informed on the subject, if those facts are true, it was not inopportune to say that the Secretary of State and the President, both in position to know, should certainly have called these matters to the attention of Congress, so that legislation might be considered for the correction of the same where legislation was needed and additional appropriations considered where authorized.

I do not wish, however, to go as far as my friend the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] has indicated in one of his statements, that there are not some matters about which complaint has been made that our committee have no authority to correct. We would have authority to correct matters in reference to additional clerical help, but so far as I know there have been no requests made to our committee for additional clerical help which we felt we ought to allow.

Mr. NEWTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. NEWTON. There is a little embarrassment, of course, to the head of a department or the head of a bureau in himself suggesting to the committee that the Budget has not given him what he ought to have or what he requested. Now, in reference to the State Department, was there care taken to see that they were not embarrassed by the committee itself inviting suggestions?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I am glad the gentleman has asked the question. Before the subcommittee on which I serve the Departments of State, Justice, Labor, and Commerce are invited to speak frankly and fully as to their needs, and the gentleman will find repeatedly throughout the hearings where we have elicited from them the recommendations made to the Budget, and never yet have we undertaken to suppress any recommendations they may have made to the Budget. On the other hand, we have sought to elicit that information for the benefit of the House, and at this time we have increased some appropriations because we learned of recommendations that were made which we felt were justified and should have been granted.

Mr. NEWTON. I appreciate that is the attitude of the gentleman's subcommittee, but was that done in this case with the State Department?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. If there be embarrassment to the heads of departments on that account, it is not chargeable to our committee or to Congress. It is due to the President himself, and the President, as I have said to you before, is more vitally interested in the proper functioning of the State Department than anyone else in official position. They are his constant advisers, and if this department has been so neglected as to become inefficient and to be deserving of some of the things said about it, then the President certainly should have had it called to his attention by the Secretary of State and should have taken proper steps to bring it to the attention of Congress.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia and Mr. JOHNSON of Washington rose.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I have served on the Committee on Foreign Affairs for several years now, and we have never had any representation made of such a condition as has been described by the gentleman from New York [Mr. DAVENPORT]. It seems to me if such a condition exists, the gentleman could serve no better purpose than to introduce a resolution which would result in bringing the entire matter to the attention of that committee.

I am in general sympathy with the proposition that the departments are entitled to consideration and employees of the Government are entitled to consideration with respect to the personnel both as to number and salary. I respectfully suggest, if my friend will permit me, to the gentleman from New York that the best way to effect a result, to get at something practical, is for him to take steps to submit the consideration of this matter to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, which conceivably may find that legislation ought to be enacted.

Mr. DAVENPORT. I shall be glad to do that, as I suggested in the latter part of my speech.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. In conclusion let me say this: Speeches like the one we have listened to are not always accurately reported in the press; only those things that make headlines and invite criticism—yea, criticism of Congress—are carried. That is why I rose to say that if there be matters urgently needing correction, and the Department of State on that account has not been functioning as it should, that these matters could have been and should have been called to the attention of Congress by the Secretary of State, if not by the President himself. I am not willing that Congress, when neither the Secretary of State nor the President have registered any complaint, shall be charged with responsibility therefor.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I will.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I believe this debate in the last few minutes is one of the most important debates that has been held or will be held in the next several weeks. It is not so much any particular charge is made by the gentleman from New York, but it runs to the system brought about by which you are called or not called to the subcommittee.

I have no criticism of any subcommittee, but as to the suggestion of a report from the President let me say that the committee was sitting before the report was made by the President. The committee was holding hearings and the hearings were printed on the 8th day of December, when the other committees had not been organized.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. If the remarks of the gentleman from Washington are pertinent to this subject, I respectfully suggest I am unable to see it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I am sorry that I have not made myself clear.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I know the gentleman from Washington has been critical of the method of centering appropriations in one committee. He has been heard several times on that score. He has appeared before our committee, and we have heard him repeatedly. It is not unusual for some Members of Congress to criticize the Budget Bureau for its economy and then go out and claim that appropriations made by Congress are less than the sums recommended by the Bureau of the Budget. The gentleman from Washington admits he is not immune from that charge.

What I want to bring to the attention of this House, and not allow irrelevant matter to get us away from the point, is that if what the gentleman from New York has said is true, then the head of the State Department and the President himself are in positions where they must know such facts, and if they have that knowledge they should have called these matters to the attention of the proper committees of Congress for correction.

Mr. BEEDY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I yield to the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. BEEDY. Knowing the fairness of the gentleman from Alabama, I thought perhaps he would agree with me in a statement I would like to make. I think the House is indebted to the gentleman from New York [Mr. DAVENPORT] for a most thoughtful and helpful consideration of a problem of vital importance. I did not draw from his remarks any conclusion which led me to criticize even in my own mind the action of the subcommittee. I think those of us who have become familiar with the manifold duties of Congress understand that it is sometimes utterly impossible for a subcommittee to get all the evidence on all the problems of government.

I want to say that I think this discussion has refuted the assertion just made that the consideration of Government problems in Committee of the Whole is futile. Here to-day we have evidence that, although Congress may be cumbersome, as all representative governments are, yet there are various ways of getting at the bottom of things. The gentleman from New York [Mr. DAVENPORT] has laid a splendid foundation, by a thoughtful and considerate speech, for a thorough investigation of this whole problem. I feel that every Member who heard him and every member of the subcommittee, of which the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER] is such an able member, will be glad to cooperate with him to the end that we may if necessary reorganize the Department of State and make it more efficient. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. After all, the Budget is merely the President's private secretary, and there is no Cabinet officer closer to the President than is the Secretary of State. Since our friend from New York [Mr. DAVENPORT] seemingly has been denied access to his President and access to his Budget chairman, General Lord, and access to his Secretary of State to bring all these troubles to light before them, it leaves it solely to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER] to get up here and defend the President and the Secretary of State and the Budget and the administration.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, may I say again that there can be no two opinions about the statment made by my good friend from Maine [Mr. BEEDY]. I think every Member of Congress seeks information, and never have I known a Member of Congress to close the door to those who have information, nor have any of the committees of this Congress closed the doors to bearers of information. I find that it is only to Members possessing information that the membership of the House gives attention to. The gentleman from New York [Mr. DAVENPORT] made a most intelligent presentation of his views, but what I want to carry to the country is this, that if what he said is correct, then those at the head of that department and the President himself should bring that to the attention of the proper committees of Congress. There are but few matters in connection with what he has discussed that the Committee on Appropriations could correct if they were supplied with information, but there are many matters that he has discussed that could properly be laid before the proper legislative committee for its consideration.

Mr. DAVENPORT. Mr. Chairman, I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I yield to the gentleman for two minutes.

Mr. DAVENPORT. Mr. Chairman, I made every effort in what I had to say about the Department of State to keep all heat out of it. I tried to keep as close to the facts as I could, and what I was challenging was not Congress, not a subcommittee, not the Secretary of State, not the President, nobody in particular, but a system that has slowly grown up and that we ourselves must immediately get rid of, it seems to me. I am not at all attacking persons. I think the way to get at this thing is not to attack persons, but to avoid all heat and to proceed to a careful survey by Congress and the Department of State jointly, with the end in view to correct the situation as soon as we can. That is my only purpose. [Applause.]

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LINTHICUM].

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I am very much pleased that the gentleman from New York [Mr. DAVENPORT] has brought up this question. I think the trouble with the State Department is that it is too timid, it is too modest. They do not like to come down and ask for money. They do not like to ask for increase of salaries, and they do it, I think, only when compelled to. For instance, when the Rogers Act was introduced it took two sessions to pass it. It involved an increase of salaries and also the retirement feature, and Congress was very slow in giving the department the relief that it asked. The Committee on Foreign Affairs, of which I am a member, has always listened to them and has always believed they should have sufficient funds to run the department as it should be run and to pay adequate salaries. I have said to the Secretary of State, and I have told Mr. Carr, that they are too timid in what they ask for. When they first had the idea of asking for money to build embassies and office buildings in foreign countries they asked for only $5,000,000. I said they could not do anything with that, and that they should ask for $10,000,000. The President and the Budget were consulted and then $10,000,000 was asked for, and Congress gave them that amount just as easily as it would have given them $5,000,000. But there was a great bluster on the floor of the House. Men said that the commission were going on trips abroad through the various countries and there was the idea that this commission to be created in respect to these buildings would travel through the foreign countries on a sort of junket. The consequence was that nothing was provided in that bill, nothing was asked in that bill, for the commission or any member of the commission, to visit foreign countries and make selections. Yet you are investing $10,000,000, and probably when you get through some $20,000,000. Our chairman, Mr. PORTER, of Pennsylvania, is compelled to take money out of his own pocket and pay his expenses when he travels abroad and looks into the question of sites to determine whether the buildings and sites are properly located and whether they are being purchased at a fair market price.

If the State Department should come down here and ask that the chairman of that committee should have traveling expenses, I expect there would be lots of talk about a junketing trip; and so the State Department does not come here any oftener than they can help and ask for funds; I think they are too timid—I almost said that it seemed to me that they are too polite to come and ask for these different things. If the War Department wants something, if the Navy Department wants something, or if any other department wants something, they make it known to the Congress. They come down here and they have the public back of them, and they tell what they want, and the public gets back of them and you make the appropriation—for instance, some $600,000,000 for the Army and the Navy—but when you come to the State Department they come down and ask for the meager sum of $10,000,000, and pay back into the Treasury some $7,000,000, leaving the whole State Department to be conducted at an expense, both for foreign service and here in Washington, of only $3,000,000.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman object to having the Government run economically?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I have no objection to having the Government run economically, but I believe that it is now being run, so far as the State Department is concerned, parsimoniously, and I do not believe in that.

Mr. MADDEN. How does the gentleman know that?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I happen to be on the Foreign Affairs Committee.

Mr. MADDEN. Give us a single instance of parsimony.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Take the matter of these clerical jobs. In Europe I found some men working—some of these clerks—for as low as $800 a year. Does the gentleman call that economy or parsimony?

Mr. MADDEN. Are those American citizens?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I do not know whether they are or not.

Mr. MADDEN. They are not.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I would say that in a great many of the offices I do not believe that they are American citizens, because they could hardly talk English; but they ought to be American citizens, and they ought to have salaries adequate to the work they do wherever they are.

Mr. MADDEN. If I were in the gentleman's place, I would get possession of the state of the facts before I got on the floor to talk about the thing. If the gentleman has nothing better to say than to find fault because we do not run the Government economically, he has not a very good case.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I do not want to take anything back. I was not criticizing the Committee on Appropriations. I believe the Committee on Appropriations gave them all the money they asked for. But I think legislation should be introduced and enacted to get for some of them better salaries, so that there would not be this turnover of 19 per cent, to which reference has been made. I am very glad that the gentleman from New York [Mr. DAVENPORT] has opened the way, and I hope he will introduce a bill to accomplish the purpose he has in mind.

Mr. MADDEN. I know the gentleman would give them the money if he had it.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman has made some reference to certain low-paid clerks in the service abroad. The gentleman is aware of the fact that it is impossible to appropriate more for the people he mentions because of the legislation.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes. I understand the committee has given them all they asked for and all that they could give them under legislative authorization.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KVALE].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Chairman, I have asked for time for the purpose of reading a poem entitled "The Lindbergh name," by our former colleague, Mr. Knud Wefald, of Hawley, Minn., and an article entitled "Sire of the Eagle," by Lynn Haines, and putting them into the RECORD. The poem reads as follows:

THE LINDBERGH NAME

By Knud Wefald

The Lindbergh name was once so cursed
  It wrapped our State in shame.
It wraps us all in glory now
  And covers us with fame.
And yet I think it stood for more
  When it was so accursed,
Than now it's swelling through the world
  By all our plaudits nursed.

It stands for fame and fortune now,
  Since "Lindy" flew to France;
With God alone he gambled then
  And took a gambler's chance.
His father's name, as yet unsung—
  Have we forgot its charms?
Forgot that he defied the lords
  Of nations sprung to arms?

The mighty masters he defied
  That cracked on us their whips,
Who owned the tools of industry,
  The cannons and the ships.
When most of men had lost their heads
  'Mid patriotism's roar,
He cried, "I'll tell you toilers why
  Your country is at war!"

And what he told the toilers with
  Their masters illy sat;
They warned him, scorned him, libelled him,
  And in his face they spat.
Yet calm and unafraid he stood,
  Though wearied, worn, and wan—
And when the toilers stoned him, too,
  He took it like a man.

The son so proudly has been named
  "Lone Eagle of the Air."
His sire—of blessed memory—was
  An untamed polar bear.
He fought for justice, right, and truth,
  Unmoved by friend or foe;
He, bloodstained, lonely, blazed a trail
  For honest men to go.

When high the famous son sails on
  Upon his lonely flight,
His father's footsteps he can see
  In fire traced at night;
And winging on his trackless course
  Between the earth and God,
He sees the troubled, thorny road
  His noble father trod.

But when the Lindbergh name is cheered
  In every spoken tongue,
And toasted in the banquet halls
  And praised in speech and song,
When throngs go mad as soon as they
  But see him in the sky,
From out the Calvary of his sire
  It echoes "Crucify!"

The article by Mr. Haines is taken from The Nation of December 28, 1927. I read:

SIRE OF THE EAGLE

By Lynn Haines

The world once more is agog over Charles A. Lindbergh. His 35,000-mile flight over the United States, his journey to Mexico through fog and rain makes him more than ever his country's hero, the "ambassador of good will." And though the world saw his father very differently, "like father, like son" was never more perfectly illustrated than in Charles A. Lindbergh, senior and junior. No two could be more thoroughly alike. One chose statesmanship, the other aviation; that was the only difference between them.

It proved a tremendous difference, however. The very qualities of character which bring the world to one's feet in aircraft will place one beneath the feet of the world in statecraft. Lindbergh the younger demonstrates a surpassing courage, whereupon multitudes surge about him to do him honor. Lindbergh the elder was equally courageous and independent, but the masses he had to face were American mobs.

The father was tall and straight, a fine figure of a man. His face was outstandingly strong, alert, frank, and kindly. He was always calm and impersonal. He used no liquor nor tobacco. I never heard even the smallest "cuss word" pass his lips. He cared nothing for social life. If he had been asked to dance he would have made the same answer as does his lionized son: "I never learned how." To work was his greatest joy. If a task were important he liked to do all parts of it. For example, he had stenographers—and did most of his own typewriting. Probably nine-tenths of the many communications I have had from him were his own handiwork.

As everybody knows, Congressmen write their own autobiographies for the Congressional Directory. That contributed by the father of the world's most famous airman was the briefest, I think, every published. Here it is:

"Charles A. Lindbergh, Republican, of Little Falls."

The world marvels at the modesty of the son. It is not at all inexplicable to me who knew the father's remarkable selflessness. Just once in the long period of our acquaintanceship did Congressman Lindbergh voluntarily refer to a personal matter. He was an attorney—a good one, of the Lincoln type; his honesty was unquestionable. Years before he had handled a Minnesota case for an eastern millionaire. When this client died it was found that Lindbergh was named administrator of the big estate; and the will provided that no bond should be required for the execution of the trust. That unusual confidence in his integrity pleased him. He told me about it. It was the nearest to boasting that he ever got.

His industry was prodigious. Undoubtedly he was the hardest-working man ever in Congress. It was his daily habit to reach his room in the House Office Building before 5 o'clock in the morning. Once I asked him how and why he did it.

"I must have three or four hours each day by myself for study and writing. After 9 there are always interruptions." That was his answer.

His outstanding characteristic was his courage. I remember one morning when he called me up and said: "Come over to the hospital at 10 and visit with me while the doctors fix me up."

"What's the matter?" I asked.

"Oh, a little operation," he replied.

It was not a little operation, and he went through it without an anesthetic. The ordeal lasted more than an hour and he never gritted his teeth or even gripped my hand, except for a few seconds, when the surgeon's knife pierced the abdominal cavity.

All through that episode we talked about international banking. I had discussed big public problems with him many times, in his office and at my home, but I do not remember an occasion when his mind was given more unreservedly to a serious subject. There was no hint of a distraction. He seemed utterly unmindful of any suffering. He continued with his exposition of a particular point after being taken to his room. Not once did he mention the surgery, except indirectly, when he apologized for having subjected me to an unpleasant experience.

For 10 years he was a Congressman from Minnesota, representing the Little Falls district. If, at any time during that decade, this district had attempted secession there would have been no civil war over it. The powers that be, both Republican and Democrat, would eagerly have sacrificed even a larger territorial part of the Union to get rid of Lindbergh. A question naturally arises: Why did they not go out and defeat him? They tried, repeatedly. I once asked an old guarder why they did not succeed. His explanation was interesting, and possibly had some significance. "We spent so much money," he said, "trying to lick Lindbergh that the district became too prosperous to care about a change."

He first got in, I suspect, because he was a likable and honest lawyer. His integrity was known to every man and woman in that section of the State. When Lindbergh was admitted to the bar, having graduated in the law class of the University of Michigan at 23 (1883), he subscribed most thoroughly and conscientiously to the oath of an attorney. He regarded his profession as an official part of the judicial machinery. As a lawyer he acted accordingly. A guilty client did not interest him. It became a tradition in central-eastern Minnesota that he was concerned only in helping to find the exact justice of every controversy.

In Congress he was a radical of the advanced, uncompromising type. He tackled the biggest and politically most dangerous national issues. Therefore he was hated and misrepresented more bitterly, perhaps, than any public man of his generation. "Socialist" was among the mildest of the epithets hurled at him. His enemies accused him of being unsocial. They implied that he shunned functions because of a "crudeness" that was embarrassing to him. Nothing could be further from the truth. He was thoroughly a gentleman, both by birth and breeding. He cared nothing for the social life of the Capital, preferring to be studiously by himself; but when it seemed a duty, because of his position, to attend some social event he did so. Social life, aside from its unattractiveness, did not at all fit into his congressional habits. He could not consistently be about his work at five in the morning if the midnight hours were given to sociability.

It would not have mattered to the orthodox politicians how much he made a slave of himself, but the results were troublesome. He was better prepared on serious subjects than any bolshevist ever encountered, either before or after bolshevism became a well-recognized bugaboo.

The Money Trust was Lindbergh's chief obsession. Not many Congressmen are friends of the Money Trust, but few of them at that time ardently desired to stir it up. "Let sleeping dogs lie," was quite generally the congressional policy. Lindbergh, however, persisted in keeping the dangerous animal thoroughly awake. Moreover, he wanted to kennel it, and put the key in the people's pocket. He demanded an investigation of the Money Trust, and got it, although others took the credit.

Lindbergh introduced his resolution for a congressional inquiry in July, 1911. At first it was not taken seriously. But those 5 o'clock study periods quickly began to show their results. He made out so strong a case that it could not be ignored.

The Democrats were then in control of the House. Lindbergh was nominally a Republican, although that party regarded him as an undesirable alien. It was not good politics for those in power to permit any kind of a Republican to sponsor so big a thing as the Money Trust investigation. Other resolutions were presented by Democrats. Henry, of Connecticut, was the author of one; Pujo, of Louisiana, of another, the latter's being adopted on February 24, 1912.

From a beginning in which he stood practically alone, Lindbergh saw this inquiry approved by the House with only 8 dissenting votes. Among these dissenters were four famous Republican names—Cannon, Dalzell, GILLETT, and TILSON. So the Pujo committee came into being. It was Lindbergh's work. It ought to have been the Lindbergh committee. Senator NORRIS, then a Congressman, demanded that Lindbergh be given the credit, but that was not to be. It is doubtful if Lindbergh cared who got the credit so long as an investigation was made.

This Money Trust fight was continuous until Lindbergh voluntarily left Congress March 4, 1917. The investigation was no sooner under way than he turned his attention to the Glass-Owen bill, which created the Federal reserve system. He opposed that measure with a vigor and determination rarely exceeded in public life. However one may regard the now existing system, then created, Lindbergh's first speech in that debate was a marvelous exposition of the history and economics of financial legislation. His research had been amazing. He presented documents of which most Congressmen had never heard. Of course the Glass-Owens bill passed, and is now the law of the land. He did not quit. He kept on studying currency and credit. His vigilance in watching the Federal reserve system was unceasing. Four years later, shortly before the end of his congressional career, he arose and said:

"Mr. Speaker and the House of Representatives, I, Charles A. Lindbergh, the undersigned, upon my responsibility as a Member of the House of Representatives, do hereby impeach W. P. G. Harding, governor; Paul M. Warburg, vice governor; and Frederick A. Delano, Adolph C. Miller, and Charles S. Hamlin, members, each individually as a member of the Federal Reserve Board, and also all of them collectively as the five active working members of said board, of high crimes and misdemeanors."

There followed 15 counts of an indictment, each of which, he said, "I stand ready to prove."

He asked the House not to dispose of the solemn proceedings "by a motion to lay on the table. It would not be doing justice to the country if done in that way." He said:

"Either I am right in presenting these articles of impeachment or I am wrong. If I do injustice to the House, if I do injustice to the country in preferring articles of impeachment which ought not to be preferred, then it is the duty of the House to discredit me for doing that thing. I do not, however, expect to be discredited, though undoubtedly powerful influences will be used to prevent favorable action on the articles of impeachment."

The matter was referred to the Judiciary Committee and, of course, no action was taken.

A confidential talk I had with him about this impeachment of the Federal Reserve Board can now be told. As a publicist, I was interested in knowing what was back of it.

"Will the House act on your charges?" I asked.

"No," he answered; "I don't expect any result like that."

"Why, then, did you make the indictment?"

There followed an hour of prophecy—which seemed almost inspired in view of what happened. He pointed out what this Federal agency could and would do after the war, especially with respect to agriculture. He predicted the manipulated deflation of 1920, which squeezed from twenty to thirty billions out of the farming industry, leaving it hopelessly crushed and broken.

Lindbergh took part in the revolt against Cannonism. That was just a flurry for most of the insurgents. Characteristically he kept on fighting after the others had quieted down. The House rules were not reformed as a result of that Cannon controversy. So as late as the Sixty-fourth Congress he made a lone effort "to break the power of the bosses." He staged a one-man filibuster, objecting to all "unanimous-consent business," seeking thus to force the masters of the House to act on four remedial amendments he had presented. He did not succeed, because it was physically impossible for a single individual to stay on the job every minute for the weeks that were needed to win.

Charles A. Lindbergh did not stand for reelection to the House in 1916. The World War was raging. We had not entered "the hell storm," as he called it; but he foresaw our participation and the reaction it would bring. That meant bigger, more vital struggles for him. He could return to Congress, but the issues would have to be fought out in larger election contests in order that more people might be reached. The governorship of Minnesota or a seat in the Senate was what he must seek—unselfishly, I think. He was antiwar, from start to finish. "Probably I'll go down," he said to me shortly before the war vote was taken, and he was defeated by a narrow margin. He returned to Minnesota, and spoke his convictions wherever he went. He was mobbed more than once by the war frenzied. But he was not in the least afraid.

The supremest test of courage comes when one confronts the unknown. Charles A. Lindbergh, sr., was above all superstition. He faced death, as he did life, with absolute fearlessness. Pioneers are much the same the world over. Lindbergh the elder was as truly a trail blazer as is his son. The boy, fortunately, tackled something that could be demonstrated at once. The father had ideas which were a generation ahead of the popular capacity for comprehension.

Mr. Chairman, let me add a few words. It seems to me eminently fitting to have read this material on Lindbergh, father and son, into the RECORD to-day, when press dispatches are telling how the famous son is receiving the adulation and the adoration of thousands of people down in Nicaragua, where this administration without authority by the Congress is waging a war upon the people of Nicaragua at this moment. Congressman Lindbergh was a candidate for governor in the State of Minnesota in 1918. He was indorsed by the much criticized and much maligned Nonpartisan League of that State. Of course he was slandered, and of course he was mobbed, and of course he received the reward meted out to every one who opposed our country's going into that so-called "hell storm." He wrote a book called "Why Your Country Is at War," and I suggest that many of the Members of this House might receive enlightenment and instruction as to the reasons for our entry into that war if they would read Congressman Lindbergh's book. If he were living to-day, he would no doubt write a scathing indictment of our present administration because the President and Secretary Kellogg are conducting a war on Nicaragua.

Little wonder that Col. Charles A. Lindbergh is as noble and brave as he is, being the son of so noble and courageous a father as Congressman Charles A. Lindbergh. [Applause.]

Mr. ACKERMAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. KELLY. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, whatever criticism may be directed at the power of the Appropriations Committee, no Member can rightfully criticize the application and the knowledge of the members of this subcommittee. I have a high regard for the chairman, Mr. SHREVE, of Pennsylvania, who has mastered the duties of this arduous position. He comes from a great district, and his constituents should be proud of his public service. For the distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER] I have admiration and regard. He, too, has displayed ability of high order and the power to concentrate on a great many important details necessarily covered in this great appropriation bill.

I appeared before the subcommittee and urged the regional economic surveys which have been worked out by the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, in the Department of Commerce. It was with some surprise that I read two paragraphs in the report on this bill which seemed to be antagonistic to such surveys. I was glad, indeed, yesterday to hear Mr. SHREVE state that the subcommittee is not only not antagonistic but distinctly favorable to regional surveys and that the criticism was directed solely against surveys of small units. Also, the gentleman from Alabama pointed out that the subcommittee had proven its favorable attitude by reporting an appropriation of some $75,000 more than last year, which is to be used for this purpose.

Mr. Chairman, when I appeared before the subcommittee in behalf of the regional surveys I stated that they would be of help in solving the question of distribution of products, the greatest problem in American business to-day. I have long been interested in one especial phase of that question, the distribution of articles of standard quality under a distinguishing trade-mark, name, or brand. It is to that question that I wish to address myself at this time.

In the last Congress I introduced a measure aiming to enable the producer or owner of an article sold under a distinctive trade-mark to offer his article to the public at a specified price. Hearings were held by the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, and opponents and proponents had their day in court. The volume which resulted is a compendium of information as to modern merchandising. To my mind, it is unanswerable proof as to the need of legislation to meet a serious situation in business.

After the hearings some members of the committee, headed by Mr. MERRITT, of Connecticut, made a further study and proposed a tentative substitute for my bill. I accepted it as carrying out the principle intended and in some ways doing it more clearly and concisely. I introduced that bill at the beginning of this session, and it is now before the committee of the House. It is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That no contract relating to the sale or resale of a commodity which bears (or the label or container of which bears) the trade-mark, brand, or name of the producer or owner of such commodity, and which is in fair and open competition with commodities of the same general class produced by others, shall be deemed to be unlawful, as against the public policy of the United States or in restraint of interstate or foreign commerce or in violation of any statute of the United States, by reason of any agreement contained in such contract—

(1) That the vendee will not resell such commodity except at the price stipulated by the vendor; and/or

(2) That the vendee will require any dealer to whom he may resell such commodity to agree that he will not in turn resell except at the price stipulated by such vendor or by such vendee.

SEC. 2. Any such agreement in a contract in respect of interstate or foreign commerce in any such commodity shall be deemed to contain the implied condition that such commodity may be resold without reference to such agreement—

(1) In closing out the owner's stock for the purpose of discontinuing dealing in such commodity;

(2) With prominent notice to the public that such commodity is damaged or deteriorated in quality, if such is the case; or

(3) By a receiver, trustee, or other officer acting under the orders of any court.

SEC. 3. Nothing contained in this act shall be construed as legalizing any contract or agreement between producers or between wholesalers or between retailers as to sale or resale prices.

SEC. 4. No suit arising out of any such agreement shall be brought in any court of the United States in any other judicial district than that in which the defendant is an inhabitant, or in which he has a regular and established place of business. If such suit is brought in a district in which the defendant has a regular and established place of business, service of process, summons, or subpœna may be made by service upon the agent or agents engaged in conducting such business in the district in which suit is brought.

SEC. 5. As used in this act—

(1) The term "producer" means grower, packer, maker, manufacturer, or publisher.

(2) The term "commodity" means any subject of commerce.

(3) The term "interstate or foreign commerce" means commerce between any State, Territory, or possession, or the District of Columbia, and any place outside thereof; or between points within the same State, Territory, or possession, or the District of Columbia, but through any place outside thereof; or within any Territory or possession or the District of Columbia.

SEC. 6. If any provision of this act is declared unconstitutional or the applicability thereof to any person or circumstance is held invalid, the validity of the remainder of the act and the applicability of such provision to other persons or circumstances shall not be affected thereby.

SEC. 7. This act may be cited as the "fair trade act."

In the meantime the Federal Trade Commission has determined upon a complete investigation into this question. In a memorandum issued December 12, 1927, it is stated:

The question of resale price maintenance is one of the most troublesome with which the commission has to deal in the present state of the decisions. The early Federal cases trace the principle to a passage in Coke on Littleton dealing with restraints on alienation. Courts, in attempting to apply these ancient principles, have fallen into hopeless confusion. Orders of the commission, issued under its organic act, have been upheld in some circuits and set aside in others on almost undistinguishable states of fact.

Until the commission's inquiry no comprehensive effort had been made in this country to develop the essential facts in reference to resale price maintenance. Such inquiries have been made in Canada and New Zealand, and certain of the Scandinavian countries have given attention to the subject and have laws legalizing resale price fixing with provision for seasonal sales, bona fide competition based on superior efficiency and sustained over a considerable period of time, etc.

It is evident that legislation will be required to cure the present unsatisfactory conditions; and it seems unlikely that Congress will enact such legislation without definite information as to the probable effect thereof on competition and prices.

Questionnaires are being sent out by the commission, and the facts should be developed. Some legislation is essential, and it is believed by most of those who have studied the question that the measure which I have introduced will remedy the present intolerable situation.

Mr. Chairman, I believe that this question is one of the most important which confronts the business world to-day.

Upon its solution depends in some measure the character of American business to-morrow and the day after to-morrow, and, as every man, woman, and child is dependent upon business for life and welfare, the character of business is vital to the Nation.

Now, we who favor price standardization propose to do certain things. We propose to permit the producer of a standard, trade-marked, identified, guaranteed article to enter into a contract with his distributors that his product shall be sold at a specified price. The producer who makes such a contract shall be in competition with other producers of the same class of goods and there shall be no agreement between producers, nor between wholesalers, nor between retailers as to sale or resale price.

We provide that any such contract, whatever other features it may have, shall be deemed to have the implied condition that the goods may be sold for less than the specified price under reasonable contingencies, such as the distributor going out of business, the deterioration of the goods, or the conduct of the business by receiver, trustee, or other court officer.

The provision is permissive, not mandatory. The contract will only be entered into by the producers who wish to protect their products against manipulation of prices and by the distributors who believe such a policy to be beneficial. It will not be used for marketing goods of quickly changing fashion or seasonal value. It can not be used for marketing bulk or unidentified merchandise.

What is the reason for such a proposal? It is to meet the grave evils caused by predatory price cutting on standard, identified goods, a system which has grown up because of Supreme Court decisions in the past 16 years, largely through cases brought before it by department-store firms and chain-store proprietors. We simply propose to prevent dealers who will not rely on their own good will and reputation from using publicly approved, identified goods of stable quality and value as bait to deceive the public into believing that all articles sold by them are at similar bargain rates and savings.

Now, nobody denies that there is an evil in certain forms of such price cutting. At the hearings before the committee on my bill every opponent admitted the evils of certain forms of price cutting on standard goods.

Edmond A. Wise, New York, attorney for department stores, said:

I do not defend nor do I for one moment say that a certain kind of cutting of prices is desirable or admirable or ethical.

Mr. Straus, of R. H. Macy & Co. department stores of New York and other cities, said:

I am perfectly willing to agree that there is a type of price cutting which is bad for the dealer who practices it and bad for the manufacturer on whose merchandise it is practiced.

Surely there is no difficulty in discovering the evils of price cutting on standard articles. The procedure is simple. They proceed upon the theory that if they cut the prices on well-known standard goods, whose value is well fixed in the public mind, to a point below cost to them or below the basis of a reasonable living profit they will be able to attract the customers of their competitors and secure their patronage. Through this plan they expect to sell enough unnamed, unidentified merchandising at excessive profits to reimburse them for the loss on the bait merchandise upon which they take the loss by cutting the fair price.

The price cutters issue flaming advertisements declaring that articles which are known to everybody at a certain price are to be sold at a deeply cut price. An article which costs the price cutter 75 cents will be advertised at 69 cents. A 25-cent article will be marked down to 14 cents. The public is expected to believe that these are but examples of the universal savings to be made by dealing at such a store.

Of course such a practice immediately injures the maker of the goods. The public loses its confidence in them, for they seem overpriced in view of such reductions. The price cutter does not desire to sell the goods, for the more he sells the more he loses. He endeavors to substitute other goods on which he makes an unfair profit. His reliance is that the customers will buy unstandardized goods on which there is no way of telling the real value and the fair price.

The effect of this practice is felt immediately by other dealers. They must meet the cut price or lose their trade in the goods. If they follow the price cutter they, too, must prevent the buyer wherever it is possible from buying goods on which a loss is involved. If they refuse to cut prices they must stop handling the goods which the public wanted and on which at standard prices they could make a fair profit.

Mr. Chairman, is that not an evil business practice? My contention is that it is not necessary to decry the evil with such weasel words as "certain forms" of price cutting, meant to apply to all forms except the one which the particular price cutter is using.

The evil is in plain sight. It is the practice of cutting prices on standard goods by dealers who are at present permitted to destroy honest values, good names, and square business with impunity, and for ulterior purposes of their own.

We say we can remedy the evil in effective fashion by putting into the hands of independent manufacturers and dealers the power to end this unfair, dishonest sales system through price control by the maker of the goods.

Right here let me emphasize the fact that only the use of cuttle-fish tactics can make of this proposal anything new and revolutionary. From the time the cave man made a stone hatchet and bartered it to his neighbor it has been the universal inherent right of the owner of any article to name the price at which he will sell it.

Here in the early days the makers of goods sold them direct to their customers and named the price. Then as transportation facilities developed they sent out their agents to sell to customers at the price specified.

The next step was to sell to retailers and the producers who identified their goods and desired it had the undisputed right to specify the retail price. Later the wholesaler entered the field of distribution as a necessary agent and the producer, through free contract, named the final selling price.

The courts upheld these contracts as lawful and proper. There are splendid judicial defenses of them in hundreds of court cases. The courts declared them to be valid and enjoined those who tried to break the contract.

Remember that point. The right of contract has been taken away from the business man in America and we seek to restore it to him. It was not taken away by express law, but wholly by court decisions.

Mr. Chairman, it was the Supreme Court of the United States that changed the entire course of merchandising. In the Doctor Miles Medical Co. case, decided in 1911, the court ruled that this contract system of controlling the resale price was in conflict with the antitrust law as a restraint of trade.

Five judges said that and four judges said exactly the opposite. That "grand old man" of the Supreme Court, Justice Holmes, wrote the dissenting opinion. He stripped the question bare when he wrote:

I can not believe that in the long run the public will profit by this court permitting knaves to cut reasonable prices for some ulterior purpose of their own, and thus impair if not destroy the production and sale of articles which it is assumed it is desirable that the public should get.

Five men on the Supreme Court bench took away from independent business men the right to contract as to the resale price of identified goods.

But did they declare that controlling the resale price by the producer was illegal and void? They did not. Neither in the Doctor Miles case nor in any other decision has the Supreme Court ruled that there is anything wrong about price maintenance by manufacturers. They only ruled that certain methods of accomplishing the result were wrong.

They have strongly affirmed that some methods of accomplishing exactly the same results are right and commendable. Within the past year the Supreme Court gave a clean bill of health to the General Electric Co. and upheld its right to control resale prices. The Supreme Court gave judicial benediction to price maintenance after the General Electric plan. Here is what the court said:

The owner of an article patented or otherwise is not violating the common law or the antitrust law by seeking to dispose of his products directly to the consumer and fixing the price by which his agents transfer the title from him directly to such consumer.

The General Electric sold its lamps through the retailers, but by consigning the goods and calling the retailers agents they name the price at which the goods may be sold to the consumer.

This decision means that only a great corporation which is financially and commercially in a position to use the expensive and cumbersome system of consigning goods to the retailer can protect his goods. The little manufacturer who can not use such a system is prohibited from doing it through contract with his distributors. The Supreme Court has also held that the maker of goods may control his price through his own retail agencies. If a piano manufacturer will start a retail store in every city, he can control his price, and no questions asked. But let him undertake to sell through the regularly established wholesalers and retailers and his attempt to control his price becomes a criminal act.

Now, my friends, can anyone deny that there is a grievous wrong in such a state of affairs. Price maintenance is either right or it is wrong. If it is wrong for the Doctor Miles Medical Co., it is also wrong for the General Electric. If it is right for the General Electric, it is also right for the little independent producer.

Mr. Chairman, I maintain that it is inherently right. It means honest business. It was right and just for the United States Government to prohibit cut prices on railroad freight rates and passenger tickets, the universal practice years ago. It is right and just for the United States Government to maintain a one price to all policy for postage stamps and Government publications. It is right and just that insurance agents shall not cut prices on insurance policies.

I maintain that it is equally right and just that the man who puts his life and money and character into a product which he brands with his name and guarantees with his cash shall also have the right to contract with his distributors that they shall not manipulate his price to his injury.

Why does this inconsistency and injustice exist? Because of blindness to progress and modern merchandising. In our own time has come about the nation-wide business which enables the buyer in San Francisco to purchase the same article, of identical quality and value, as the buyer in New York City. One of the greatest boons in American history was the adoption of the trade-mark. It standardized production, made uniform quality possible, and eliminated many crooked business practices. It made possible the market extension which resulted in mass production and lowered the cost on every unit for the benefit of the ultimate consumer.

The manufacturer depends upon public good will as the greatest asset in his business. He must protect his product into the home of the consumer if he is to build up good will.

He must deliver good quality at a fair price. When he sells goods to the distributor he does not lose interest in them. In fact, his article is not sold until it is bought by the consumer.

The Supreme Court acted upon the assumption that when the manufacturer has sold his goods outright and received full payment they belong wholly to some one else, and he could not expect to control the resale price.

The fallacy in that is that it classifies trade-marked, identified goods exactly the same as unidentified bulk merchandise. The truth is that with standard goods the advertiser is the seller and the public is the buyer, with the distributor an essential agency between.

Procter & Gamble make Ivory soap, a standard article. They will make soap cakes of exactly the same kind, let us say, for a distributor, but without the brand "Ivory" on it. They do not care what price the dealer gets for that unbranded soap, for they are not responsible for it after it leaves their hands. But if that dealer takes Ivory soap and cuts the price until it is injured, in the eyes of the consumers, and makes other retailers refuse to push its sale, they are vitally interested. In the cases of some companies their very lives are at stake.

We who uphold the principle of price maintenance simply say to distributors, "Give up the trade-mark if you cut prices. Take the identification off and you may treat the goods as you desire. But if you use a name and reputation, made valuable by honest goods at honest prices, you shall not use them for dishonest purposes."

Now, I have shown two things: First, price control by makers of identified goods was the American system of doing business before 1911. Contracts for that purpose were legal and valid until the Supreme Court stripped the business men of the right to make such contract. Second, such price control is perfectly legal and proper to-day if done by great corporations that can afford to consign their goods and wait until they are sold before payment or to establish their own retail stores.

I submit that the burden of proof is upon opponents to show why such contracts, entered into voluntarily by business men, are wrong in policy and effect. Also why, since price maintenance is legal for the big concern, it should not be legal for the small enterprise, that desires to use the regular channels of distribution through wholesaler and retailer.

Opponents must explain why they favor a system under which, if a small manufacturer attempts to protect his good will by requiring dealers to maintain the price he believes fair, he becomes a criminal, subject to imprisonment and loss of citizenship, while the big manufacturer may do exactly the same thing by consignment and agency and be honored as a worthy law-abiding citizen.

Will they say they favor taking away the manufacturer's right to sell at a specified price, through his own agents and agencies? No; they will do no such violence to common sense. They know that any such action would mean anarchy in business.

Then, are they not forced to admit that the present conditions, brought about by judge-made law, means for one set of producers a prohibition and for the other set a blessing? With one hand the law restrains; with the other it sanctions.

Can anyone defend that condition of affairs before men who believe in the American doctrine of "equal rights to all, special privileges to none"? If they can not, it is proof that price maintenance is the only method to secure a square deal for the little independent competing manufacturer of standard goods.

Mr. Chairman, I propose to prove also that price control is the only method of securing a square deal for the distributor.

The opponents of price standardization declare that if we permit the little manufacturer to have his equal rights as to resale price, then the wholesaler will become only a manufacturer's agent while the retailer will become only an animated slot machine, handing out standard goods over the counter.

I might as well consider that proposition as I go along and use it in connection with my presentation of the subject.

That argument sounds like a high regard for the independent distributor, does it not? Of course, if it is sound and the retailers are to be injured by price maintenance, it is strange that 90 per cent of all the independent retailers of the United States are solidly supporting it. It is still more strange that when a referendum on this question was taken by the United States Chamber of Commerce the vote was 1,079 in favor of the price-maintenance principle to 911 opposed.

Shall we say that all these business men are fools, blind to their own interests? With all respect, I would rather take the views of John Smith, the corner druggist, on a question as to the best interests of the independent distributor than those of any owner of a great selling system.

I must admit that I greatly fear that the opposition are not so much concerned about making the small retailer a stalwart, independent man of upstanding individuality and inflexible backbone as they seem.

They defend a system through which they profit, a system brought about by court decisions in cases originated by themselves, a system which is steadily monopolizing merchandising, destroying wholesaler and retailer and making them hired men, little cogs in a vast machine.

The destroyer of independent, individual business is not price maintenance, but price manipulation; not price standardization, but price cutting.

Mr. Chairman, that has been true all through our history. Did you ever hear of a trust squeezing out a small rival by raising the price or maintaining one price to all? Never. Standard Oil cut prices in order to destroy competition. The Tobacco Trust built its monopoly on cut prices.

Supreme Court Justice Brandeis was exactly right when, as a member of the bar, he said:

> Americans should be under no illusions as to the value and effect of price cutting. It has been the most potent weapon of monopoly and means of killing the small rivals to which the trusts have resorted most frequently. It is so simple, so effective.

The Sherman antitrust law and the Clayton antitrust law were passed to prevent the restraints of trade caused by the price-cutting tactics of would-be monopolists. It is indeed strange to see those same laws now being used to provide safe shelters for piratical price cutters in building monopolistic retailing agencies.

The danger in monopoly is that it shuts the door of opportunity to the individual. To-day the most menacing sign on the business horizon is the monopoly tendencies in the field of distribution. If it continues, great numbers of men who in the future seek to enter into independent business will find the door shut tight against them.

Already the little business man everywhere is being displaced by the huge corporation with its multitude of employees, its absentee ownership, and its financier control. Let us go into that a little.

I am not going to emphasize the danger to independent business men from the chain-store systems, serious as that danger is. But I ask, Is it a coincidence merely that these chain stores have grown like mushrooms only since the Supreme Court put into their hands the greatest weapon known to monopoly cut-throat price cutting on standard goods?

Why, there have been chain stores since 1858. They made no great commotion until 1911. Then they entered on their golden age.

In 1900 there were only 25 chain drug stores in the United States. To-day there are about 5,700, and they do 20 per cent of all the drug business of the country.

The Bureau of the Census reports that four grocery chains jumped 209 per cent in volume between 1919 and 1926. There are about 10,000 chain-store systems in operation right now, with more than 100,000 retail stores. They do over $3,000,000,000 business a year.

But the chain stores are not the greatest problem to be faced in the future by independent business men, even though they have already eliminated 90,000 independents and are moving on rapidly.

They, too, will have to face the threat of extinction in the future along with the independents. I want to call to your attention a newer and greater centralization of merchandising which means the annihilation of a great part of the independent stores and the smaller chains as well, if present selling practices continue.

I refer to the chain department stores. Here is a merchandising whale from which few hapless Jonahs will escape unless we change the present system of selling goods.

Edward A. Filene is president of the department store of Filene Sons Co. in Boston. On February 1, 1927, he delivered an address in Chicago which was printed from manuscript in the Retail Clothier of February 17, 1927.

That speech was the frank and honest statement of a man I highly admire in many ways. Here is what he said. I quote:

> It is well for the retailer to bear in mind that, in addition to all of this chain-store competition which I have described, there is under way another and stronger competition, namely, that of chains of department stores. These new chains have been developed to an important extent already, as the following array of examples will show: R. H. Macy & Co., who sold over $70,000,000 in their New York store alone in 1926, also own or control the stores of La Salle & Koch, Toledo, and Davison-Paxton-Stokes, Atlanta.

Then follows a list of seven chains of department stores already under way. Then Mr. Filene continues:

> Just as the department store outdid the individual small store, for the same reason the chains of department stores will overshadow the present chain stores. * * * There is no department store or single-line chain that will be able to stand up against this class of organization. * * * It will make enormous total profits, and the more stores they have the better they can do the job.
> This means that in every city of fair size one department store of a chain of department stores such as I have been describing will be the conquering distributor.
> If these conclusions are sound, it means, of course, that the department-store chain will determine the fate not only of the individual department stores but of the small individual retail stores also. You will bear in mind, of course, that the department store itself has no choice in the matter. Unless the department store meets the chain stores in the way I have mentioned it will likewise be put out of business.

Could I paint a blacker picture of the present situation that confronts independent retailers than Mr. Filene has done?

And in the face of such a statement, whose fruition depends upon the continuance of present cut-price selling practices, is it not utterly ridiculous to argue that if Congress adopts the price-maintenance contract provision the little independent retailer will become only a manufacturer's agent?

Let us give the little retailer a square deal and see if he is not able to live and serve his community more efficiently than any giant combination on earth.

Remember, Mr. Chairman, I ask no special favors for him. If he can not manage his store and render as good service in his neighborhood as the city department store in a far distant location, let him fail. If the independent retailer can not meet the fair competition of any rival, big or little, let him give way before it and make room for finer and better service.

But I do protest against his destruction by piratical methods. No combination of capital should have the right to bankrupt him through deceptive, dishonest business practices.

I am not against the great department stores which make fortunes for their owners through honest, foursquare service, which advances the common good. I honor old John Wanamaker, who refused to use standard goods at cut prices as bait to fool his customers. That company is for the price maintenance bill.

I honor a department store like Bloomingdales in New York, whose president, Mr. Bloomingdale, gave out a statment some time ago in which he said:

> Present price cutting of articles of standard price for the purpose of drawing away trade from competitors by creating the impression that all other articles are likewise sold at lower prices strikes me as not only a decidedly unfair method of competition but also as a practice unworthy of modern business.

Mr. Chairman, I wonder what will happen to Bloomingdales and Wanamakers and others of like reputation when this giant chain of which Mr. Filene speaks undertakes to put them out of business. The chain will start to cut all standard prices to the limit. These stores will then face the kind of ruthless, cutthroat competition that the little fellow faces to-day, and perhaps as Mr. Filene says, "They will have no choice in the matter." They may have to do as their most unscrupulous competitors do or be destroyed.

My friends, it is vitally important that every business man of independence, courage, and honesty be enabled to serve business and the public by standing out against would-be monopolists. The strongest laws in defense of honest business are those that compel fair competition. I desire no backward steps nor turning back of the hands of the clock of progress. I want to see every business enterprise reach its correct size, which will be when it is able to serve most efficiently and economically.

These great department stores, mail-order houses, chain stores, and the like came into being to cut the cost of distribution. But instead of being able to do business with less overhead than the little fellow, it costs them more.

They have certain advantages, such as large purchases and volume of sales. But some of them have 100 nonselling employees for every 100 sales people. They pay the highest rents and operating expenses. You may be sure that if they sell some goods at cost they must make a tremendous profit on others.

They say they are superior in efficiency, economy, and service. All right, I say to them, prove your statement and I will agree. But there must first be a fair and open field. Unfair competition, such as price cutting on standard goods as "bait," must be stopped. Let these great concerns do business on a fair and square basis. Then, if they are able to destroy the small dealers and consolidate into these giant chains by natural and normal means, I will accept the outcome. But if their logic is correct and we are inevitably bound to move onward from many great chains to one great chain and finally to one owner, then State socialism is assured, and we must master monopoly by Government fixed prices.

I am not ready to accept that situation. These great combinations have not yet proved they can honestly and in fair competition wipe out all small rivals.

Once let price maintenance become again the settled business policy, and you will see a sudden halt to this giant consolidation. You will see red-blooded American manufacturers saying to the man who buys for 40 department stores, "You shall sell our goods on an honest basis or not at all. You shall not use them as spider-web bargains to entrap unwary customers. We will allow you a fair profit, exactly the same as other dealers, no more and no less. Sign a contract that you will do it or you do not get our goods, no matter how big you are."

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have pointed out that the power to control resale price through free contract is essential if a square deal is to be given the independent manufacturer and distributor.

I have done that only to prove that such a right to them means a square deal to the public. After all the first and foremost question is the public interest.

Of course, it is true that there are 12,800,000 persons earning their livelihood through the manufacturing industry. They and their families dependent upon them make up a part of the public. There are 3,500,000 persons making their living in the retailing business. They and their families also form a part of the public.

But I not only admit—I contend—that this question must be decided solely upon the effects upon true public welfare.

First, honest and fair competition is always of public benefit; unfair competition is always of public injury. It is that truth, learned through bitter experience, which has led to the enactment of antitrust laws and all the other measures curbing jungle competition in the United States. Under unrestricted, cutthroat competition the strongest and most unscrupulous must triumph and the public must pay the bill.

The one price to all policy means more competition, but it sees to it that it is fair competition. It is competition in quality and individuality. The maker puts his own name and guarantee behind his product and names his price competitively. He makes his appeal direct to the public in keen competition with other producers. There is no price jockeying, no price juggling in the retail market to deceive and dupe the public. There is increased true competition between makers bidding honestly for public favor.

Price maintenance on standard articles in a competitive field can not lead to profiteering prices. If the maker fixes his price too high he does it at peril of building up business for his competitors.

He will lower his standard price to widen his market, but he will fight desperately against increasing it and restrict his market. We saw that in the World War conditions. I have the report of the War Industries Board, which made an exhaustive study of prices during the war period.

It shows that while prices on bulk, unidentified merchandise skyrocketed in price, jumping 1,000 per cent in many cases, practically every article, advertised nationally as to price, remained firm at the former low levels.

The War Industries Board says that that was because the makers of such articles would sacrifice almost everything to keep from increasing a price which advertising had associated with the article.

Will it be said that lowered costs are not reflected in the standard price? That is exactly what does happen under price maintenance. Look at the automobile business. Henry Ford, as the mightiest auto maker of them all, has built his wonderful business on exactly that principle. He has continually reduced the price while increasing the quality.

Ford's car is sold to-day and always has been sold on price-maintenanee principles. Before 1911 he sold under contracts with his distributors on the plan I am advocating. When the Supreme Court ruled against such contracts, Ford immediately established exclusive agencies of his own.

He had the resources and he did it, just as any manufacturer with great capital can do it. Ford did not propose to have his car slaughtered to make a department-store holiday. He did not propose to have his car serve as bait to lure the unwary until his good will had been destroyed.

His present system is more expensive and less efficient than the contract plan, open to every distributor, but it is infinitely better for the public than having it turned over to the mercy of price cutters.

Time after time Ford has reduced the price to the public, but every time it was one price to everybody. He did not change the price every month if there was a slight difference in production cost. That would have brought chaos in the business and discriminated against many buyers, with loss of good will. He stabilized the price for the season and he gave the public the benefit of savings through increased production.

Oh, no; those who argue that price maintenance leads to stationary high prices must shut their eyes to the automobile industry, that most astounding development within the past 25 years, which has been built up on price-maintenance principles.

Well, what about the distribution cost? Our opponents say that a uniform price means that the stores with low costs of operation will have to sell at the same price as the high-cost stores. That would mean an unnecessarily large profit for the low-cost stores, and they could not share this profit with their customers.

Mr. Chairman, that is an upside-down argument. Do the price-cutting stores line up in the rank of the low-cost establishments? Not at all. Their costs are the highest of all. Are the profits allowed them under standard price distribution too high? No, again.

The efficiently conducted neighborhood store, owned and operated by its own proprietor, is the low-cost store. These are the business men who ask the protection of price standardization. They want a fair price and a fair profit—no more and no less.

Then, too, identified goods at standard prices benefits the public by encouraging high-quality goods of uniform value which can be secured by anyone, any place, any time.

Mrs. J. Borden Harriman, chairman of the National Consumers' League, some months ago went to Europe. On her return she said:

> The shopper's only safety lies in the purchase of goods she has tried with satisfaction and which she knows will always measure up to the same standards of quality and value. In Europe she is without such protection and guidance.

That was the situation in the United States before identified goods came to benefit the public. It is the situation now on nameless, unidentified merchandise. The Association for the Improvement of the Condition of the Poor in New York City made an investigation into retail prices. It found that coffee shoveled out of a bin went to one store and was sold at 35 cents a pound. Coffee shoveled out of the same bin went to another store in the same chain ownership and was sold at 60 cents. Unnamed, unidentified coffee. Tea, coming from the same bag, went to one store and was sold at 35 cents. The same tea went to another store in the same chain and was sold at 70 cents.

Is the public served by any such system as that? Today all the resources of chemistry and applied science may be used to fool the purchaser. Imitation and adulteration and dishonesty may defy the most intelligent.

Only last year I heard Health Commissioner Harris, of New York City, say that he had issued an order forbidding a Brooklyn milk company from invading the territory of a milk company in Manhattan. He said he knew that such invasion would lead to price cutting and that would surely lead to milk adulteration.

If price cutting leads to the adulteration of the milk upon which the lives of babies depend, it is an evil system. And the truth is that, carried to its logical conclusion, price cutting on standard goods is always bound to lead to lowered quality, substitution, and adulteration.

Under present law the manufacturer of a standard article can legally restrain a dealer who adulterates his product. Why should he not have the right to restrain a dealer from destroying the product entirely through fake price-cutting methods?

Well, what about the benefit to the consumer who goes to a great city department store and buys an article for 14 cents when the standard price is 25 cents. Is that not a benefit?

No; that is not a real benefit. The customer does save 11 cents on that one purchase, but he pays out much more in unduly high prices on other purchases. If consumers would pledge themselves to buy only these well-known, standard goods at cut prices, I will agree that they would benefit. They would have their savings in their pockets and in a very short time the store would be out of business. I am willing to agree that in most cases that would be a benefit.

But if they buy other unnamed goods then they are helping to make the price cutters master of the merchandising field. When that happens prices go up and the public pays the bill.

Mr. Chairman, there is no benefit in saving a few pennies on standard goods and losing dollars on unidentified, unknown goods. There is no public benefit in saving a dollar to-day and being robbed of $10 next year. Those are the real alternatives in this problem.

But what about the enormous expenditures of nationally famous goods for advertising? Does that not mean higher prices? It does not. It means lower prices. Advertising means increased production and a lower cost on every unit. Do you think Henry Ford could sell the Ford car at his price if he only sold 10,000 a year? Mass production is possible only through advertising, and that means lower not higher prices. Advertising is the cheapest salesmanship. Without it the Nation's business would be but a shadow of what it is to-day.

President Coolidge in a recent address declared that advertising is the very basis of American business and prosperity. And remember, there is one thing advertising can not do with all its power. It can not compel the American people to buy year after year any identified article which is not right in quality and price. Fair competition makes sure that in the long run good value and service and fair price are the friends and not the enemies of success.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I submit that I have proven beyond the shadow of a doubt the existence of grave evils not alone through certain forms of price cutting but through the whole system of price cutting on standard goods.

That evil now can only be cured by national legislation. It should not require that to give freedom of contract to American business men, but it does. The Supreme Court, through judicial decision, has taken away that right as it applies to standard goods and their resale price. The Government of the United States should assure fair competition. Fair price will follow. Shall the Government directly regulate the price? Only if there is combination on the part of manufacturers to control their field or on the part of distributors to control their field. That is expressly forbidden in the antitrust laws and in the principle of my bill.

No person need hold up his hands in horror at the thought that if individual competing producers of standard goods are given the right to name the resale price through free contracts the Government must step in and shield the public with its mighty arm against unfair prices, thus putting the Government into business.

I submit to you in all fairness that the danger comes from the other quarter. If monopolization of distribution continues the Government will be forced to interfere. If the "all-conquering distributor," the chain department store, is to win, then the logic is that we must come at last to one chain and then to one proprietor. If concentration is essential to efficient, economical distribution in part, it is essential in all.

But with distribution in the hands of one interest the Government dare not leave it alone. Then the Government would go into business, indeed, and State socialism would be here.

Mr. Chairman, I have pointed out the evils of uncontrolled price cutting on standard goods and have tried to prove that the only remedy is a restoration of the right of contract to American business men.

I have shown the injustice to the little manufacturer from a condition where his giant competitor can protect himself against unfair practices, while if he attempts to do the same he is branded a criminal.

I have shown that the little distributor, though able to give superior service, is being crushed out of existence by those who are endeavoring to monopolize merchandising through unfair practices.

I have shown that the public is being injured by fraud to-day and that if present conditions continue they will be devoured by extortion in the future. I have shown that under price maintenance the public gets the advantage of a fair price, fixed under competitive conditions, between rival producers; that it means a lower distributing cost than under costly consignment and agency systems; that it means honesty in business, the greatest benefit which can come to the public.

I am willing to rest my case on the principle that public policy requires that independent business men of full age and competent understanding shall have the right to contract to uphold a uniform price policy on standard goods, and that such contracts, entered into freely and voluntarily, shall be held good and shall be enforced in courts of justice.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania five additional minutes. The gentleman's remarks are always interesting, and I am especially anxious that he shall give us the benefit of his study of the air-mail service. If he will give us some observations in reference to that subject and what has been accomplished, it will be helpful to our committee.

Mr. KELLY. I appreciate the compliment of the gentleman from Alabama all the more because of his splendid service to commercial aviation as a member of this subcommittee dealing with the appropriations for its development.

I am, indeed, deeply interested in the air-mail service and hopeful regarding its progress. Since the beginning of operations under the air-mail law I had the honor to sponsor a number of years ago, I have followed the developments of postal aviation as closely as I could. I should be glad if the conclusions I have reached are of value to the members of the committee.

There are to-day 18 contract air-mail lines in operation and 5 or 6 more are soon to be put into operation. No air mail is carried by the Government.

The routes have been as wisely located by the Post Office Department as was possible. Almost 75 per cent of the population of the United States now has some service through the air mail. The schedules are maintained in a gratifying manner, and the public is coming to realize that they may count upon the regularity and certainty of this new form of postal service.

The growth may be seen by the fact that in January, 1927, about 70,000 pounds of air mail were carried over the routes in operation. In December, 1927, the poundage was over 160,000, or about 130 per cent increase.

In January, 1927, the length of routes under contract was 4,495 miles. That meant a monthly schedule of 244,000 miles, with 205,000 actually flown. In December, 1927, the length of routes was 7,810 miles, with 489,000 miles scheduled for the month and 470,000 actually flown.

The total amount paid to contractors per month is around $300,000.

Now, the present need is to increase the volume of air mail. None of the contractors is carrying mail which approaches the capacity of flying equipment. That means that the total expense must be carried by a small volume, where with capacity loads the expense would not be increased.

I have introduced a measure which is now before the Post Office Committee which will do two things if enacted.

First. It will permit the reduction of air mail postage to 5 cents an ounce. The rate now established by the Post Office Department under the law is 10 cents a half ounce. The present rate is too high. The rate I suggest will multiply the volume in a short period.

Second. It will permit the Postmaster General to lower the payment to contractors as the volume is increased.

I have every reason to believe that the individuals and firms who are pioneers in this carriage of mail by aircraft will without hesitation agree to a readjustment of compensation as volume of mail is increased. They should also be protected in the investments they have made for research work, solicitation of business, and flying equipment.

Both of these features I have mentioned must be regarded in the development of air mail.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLY. I will.

Mr. HOWARD of Oklahoma. I would like to ask the gentleman whether consideration has been given to the transportation of second-class matter by air mail. The reason I ask is that last week I was discussing the matter with an editor who has a large amount of mail of that kind for transportation.

Mr. KELLY. We have thought of that, and also of parcel post. However, in my judgment, we must have a flat rate that applies to all classes of mail alike. It is impossible to make separate classes of air mail. A rate of 5 cents an ounce would mean 80 cents for 1 pound of mail, and that is a very fair rate. It means that a pound of second-class matter could be moved from New York to San Francisco for 80 cents. That is far less than any other rate of air transportation.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLY. I will.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. If the run of the mail carried by the airplanes is so vastly increased, what effect will that have on the revenues of the Post Office Department? Will not it lose the mail that they now carry, or a large part of it? Will it not increase the deficit of the Department?

Mr. KELLY. There will be little deficit when we get on a permanent basis. The original law provided that the contractor should get only 80 per cent of the revenue. Then we made payment not to exceed $3 a pound, and it is practically self-sustaining. If we fix a rate of 5 cents an ounce, there will be adjustment of the compensation to contractors.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The point of my question, if it has any point, is that under the present conditions there is a so-called deficit in the Post Office Department revenue. Now, it is proposed to lower the postage on mail carried by the airplanes and increase the volume, and that would take business from the Post Office Department and further increase the deficit. It will help the contractors who have the contracts for carrying the air mail, but will it not increase the deficit of the Post Office Department?

Mr. KELLY. Under the present accounting system, if there is a loss it would add to the deficit. However, I am hopeful that the Post Office Committee and the Congress will soon adopt a policy of honest bookkeeping in the Post Office Department which will provide for setting aside as public welfare expenses those free and partly free services which make up the so-called deficit. Then they will be known for what they are, governmental expenses, and not as postal operations.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I am in accord with the gentleman's statement that we should endeavor to increase the mail volume on air routes. However, it is interesting to note that that result is most encouraging under present conditions.

Mr. KELLY. It is most gratifying.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. And it is largely due to the fact that we are increasing air mileage every year, and every feeder of a long route gets more mail as a result. Take the route from Cheyenne, Wyo., to Pueblo, Colo. The maximum rate there was $3. Recently that was lowered to 83 cents. The contractor lost money under the $3 rate, but now is making money under the 83-cent rate. The tonnage has increased about five times.

Mr. KELLY. That is quite true.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman please explain what he means by the $3 and the 83 cents?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Three dollars a pound for a thousand miles is the maximum rate.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Of letters?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes. That was the maximum the contractor could get from the Government.

Mr. KELLY. That is the maximum payment to the contractors under the law.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. They had competitive bidding and the same company took it at 83 cents instead of at $3. The result is they have increased their volume and thereby their profits. The same is true of the route from Atlanta to Miami, Fla.

Mr. KELLY. The National Air Transport Co. took the contract route from New York to Chicago at $1.24 a pound. That company is carrying something like 1,600 pounds of mail a day. With a volume like that they can distribute their overhead charges over a large amount of mail making a profit possible, even at the low figure. We are trying to develop the volume, and that means public support of the air-mail service.

There are 15,000,000,000 letters carried in the entire Postal Service every year. If we could get 1 out of 100 of them in the air mail, we would have a fund of some $15,000,000 for aviation in this country, which would mean vastly greater sums expended for the Army and Navy. At the 5-cent rate we should get 2 per cent, which would equal the same sum.

Mr. ROMJUE. Does not the gentleman think that as the carriage by air increases, the carriage by other means will naturally decrease, and as we go on developing the air-mail service will we not in the future have to readjust our contracts for carrying mail by train and other means, and we shall, therefore, be at less expense to the carriers who transport it through the air as the air mail increases in its facilities?

Mr. KELLY. That is a contingency that is a number of years in the future, I will say to the gentleman. The increase in volume of letter mail each year would alone make up a tremendous air-mail volume.

Right now we are making great progress in air mail and we are building it on a practically self-sustaining basis.

Perhaps there is a feeling among Americans that in Europe aviation is on a stronger and sounder basis than in this country. That is a great mistake. European commercial aviation is built on subsidies, without which the entire system would collapse.

In Germany more than half the gross revenues of the lines is a subsidy. Some of the lines receive a federal grant of 77 cents a mile flown, where the operating costs are $1.11 a mile.

France for 1927 appropriated $6,633,000 for civil aviation. The miles flown on British air lines total about as much in a year as our air-mail lines in two months. Yet the British subsidy for 1927 was about $830,000.

The United States air-mail lines are not built on subsidies. From the beginning the plan has been to have the routes pay their way. The aviation companies here have not asked for subventions and subsidies. I do believe that every American interested in aviation desires these pathfinding companies to have a reasonable, workable plan of cooperation with the Post Office Department for the benefit of all concerned.

The Air Mail Service is built on American principles. It is the service which commanded the loyal efforts of the incomparable Lindbergh. It is the service which will keep America in the forefront of the great science of aviation, which this Nation gave to the world. [Applause.]

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES].

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, it is not often that I have occasion to quote from the patron saint of the Republican Party, but in making some investigations recently I came across a statement from Alexander Hamilton that has peculiar application to certain proposed legislation which has been under consideration during the last two or three years—the debenture plan for disposing of surplus products of the farm. These statements were made by Alexander Hamilton in his report as Secretary of the Treasury on December 5, 1791. In this report he discusses the question of manufactures in this country. He is the man who originated, in so far as its application to this country is concerned, the doctrine of the protective tariff. He presented the arguments in favor of the tariff program. In making those arguments he refers to the activities of this country along manufacturing lines as infant industries. That was the basis of his justification of the tariff. He gives the arguments which he there assembles—and he assembled most of those given to-day in favor of encouraging the infant industries of the Nation, in order to protect them from foreign competition. But in this report in which he wants to encourage the manufacturers of this country, he says to do so amounts to giving a bounty to a specific class of citizens; that it is for the purpose of encouraging that home industry; that in doing so you will necessarily raise the price of that article, and that that will increase the prices of the products that the farmer must buy, and that he will not directly get much benefit from it, although he may, indirectly, in the form of an increased market; and that the only way to equalize the right of the farmer in connection with the establishment of a protective tariff is to take a portion of the receipts of the tariff and pay an export premium on the exportation of farm products.

That is almost identical and parallel with the plan known to-day as the export debenture plan, which would provide for the issuance of a certificate, in the event of the exportation of farm products, to be tenderable in payment of a portion of the duties that are collected on imports at the customhouse.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will my colleague yield there?

Mr. JONES. Yes; I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. My colleague is to be commended on being the pioneer here in the House on that proposed debenture plan. In fact, my colleague is the pathfinder here in the House of a great deal of important legislation.

I am just reminded of the fact that in the last session my colleague from the Panhandle of Texas introduced an important bill here in the House, and some days afterwards, in another body, the name of which I shall not mention, a similar bill was introduced; and because the similar bill got through first my colleague is not known as the real author of that bill down in some parts of the country by reason of claims that have been made during the past year. I hope my colleague does get his debenture plan through and will stamp "JONES" all over it so that somebody else can not claim it. [Applause.]

Mr. JONES. I thank my colleague for his statement. The main purpose is not the securing of credit. The main purpose should be to have everybody working in the public interest to obtain and give results. But I appreciate the gentleman's generous statement in that connection.

Mr. BLANTON. I believe in giving credit to whom credit is due.

Mr. JONES. When I introduced the export premium or debenture measure some years ago carrying this idea I did not know of this report. This man has stated it and the reasons for it better than I could possibly have stated them.

I want to read an extract from the report, which is contained in Senate reprint of Document 172, Report on Manufactures, by Alexander Hamilton. I want to read an excerpt found on page 38 of that report, in which the Secretary discussed a proposal to equalize the privileges among the different classes of this country and prevent the favoritism that would naturally come from granting special privileges to one class of people; and recommends the utilizing of a portion of the receipts obtained from the tariff in the way of export premiums on agricultural products. I read from section 4:

(4) Bounties are sometimes not only the best but the only proper expedient for uniting the encouragement of a new object of agriculture with that of a new object of manufacture. It is the interest of the farmer to have the production of the raw material promoted by counteracting the interference of the foreign material of the same kind. It is the interest of the manufacturer to have the material abundant and cheap. • • •

It can not escape notice that a duty upon the importation of an article can not otherwise aid the domestic production of it than by giving the latter greater advantages in the home market. It can have no influence upon the advantageous sale of the article produced in foreign markets—no tendency, therefore, to promote its exportation.

The true way to conciliate these two interests is to lay a duty on foreign manufactures of the material, the growth of which is desired to be encouraged, and to apply the produce of that duty, by way of bounty, either upon the production of the material itself or upon its manufacture at home, or upon both. In this disposition of the thing the manufacturer commences his enterprise under every advantage which is attainable, as to quantity or price of the raw material; and the farmer, if the bounty be immediately to him, is enabled by it to enter into a successful competition with the foreign material. If the bounty be to the manufacturer on so much of the domestic material as he consumes, the operation is nearly the same; he has a motive of interest to prefer the domestic commodity, if of equal quality, even at a higher price, than the foreign so long as the difference of price is anything short of the bounty which is allowed upon the article.

He says it should be a reasonable bounty; but he recognizes, as everyone must who will analyze the situation and who is honest with himself, that a tariff has the effect of increasing the domestic price of the manufactured articles without any corresponding advantage to agriculture. Whatever may be one's idea about Hamilton's views of popular government, he was honest. He was fearless. He recognized conditions as he found them.

I do not subscribe to the doctrine of a high protective tariff. I stand on the Democratic basis and ground that we should have a tariff for revenue purposes, but that tariff, I believe, should be levied on every article that comes through the customhouse from which a revenue may be derived, whether it be an article of manufacture, a finished product, as it is sometimes called, or a raw material which goes into the product. Our records and our common experience will show that in the handling of that tariff, whatever it may be, the advantages go in large measure to the industrial portions of the country and in the smallest measure to the agricultural portions of our land. I believe, therefore, that if we continue to have the general policy of a protective tariff, as laid down and set out and advocated by the first man who urged its adoption in this country, we should also couple with it the complement which he advocated of applying, either directly or indirectly, a portion of those receipts to the equalizing of conditions among all classes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for five minutes more.

Mr. JONES. I believe that is fair, and the man who is regarded as the father of our present system urges, in black and white in his report, that as the only way to equalize the interests of those great sections of the country.

To do otherwise would be favoring a certain class of our citizens, and not only a class, but, as America has developed, a section of our country. If you include this other portion of the original plan as a complement to it, you at least, whether it is a wise policy or not as a whole, have a national policy. It seems to me, therefore, that the plan is a good one, namely, that of issuing, when we export these raw products that are referred to in this report by Mr. Hamilton, a certificate showing that exportation and let the certificates that are issued be tenderable in payment of a portion of the tariff duties on the articles as they come in. If we did that, we would necessarily bring up the reflected price of the raw products to a level of equality with the manufactured products. It would be no more than fair to couple the two together, because whether the tariff went up or down there would be equality all along the line. One would go up with the other and come down with the other. On any other basis the farmer, or any man engaged in the making or growing of any kind of raw products, must pay a higher price for the things he buys, and at the same time sell, both at home and abroad, in a market in which he is not permitted to purchase.

I wanted to call this old report to your attention, and I recommend it to the consideration of men on both sides of the House who are really interested in equality.

In the last two or three years we have had much talk about equality for the farmer and much talk about equality for agriculture. Many bills have been introduced, some of them containing great merit and all of them, perhaps, containing something of merit. But this plan, as laid down by the man who founded the policy under which we are working, is the simplest that has been offered, and I believe it would be the most effective. It would require no great machinery; it would require no great organization; it would simply require a little more work upon the part of the customs officials, and at the same time we would be sure of giving agriculture in this country, whether we have a high or a low tariff, an equality of opportunity, an equality before the law and an economic equality in its dealings at home or abroad with manufacturers in the industrial sections, both in this country and in the countries abroad. That would be a fair solution. The Members of the House to-day should read with interest this report by Secretary Hamilton. [Applause.]

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I feel it is the least bit unfortunate that when I arise during these general debates in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union with an appropriation bill pending, or when I arise in connection with any detailed appropriation in any appropriation bill, I am immeditely charged with heckling the Budget, or an enemy of the Bureau of the Budget, or else I am charged with having an everlasting and continuous controversy with the great Appropriations Committee of the House. I beg to assure you, my friends, that neither charge is correct. All sides of all matters connected with proposed appropriations are entitled to be discussed on this floor. The Appropriations Committee should not consider that it must always be on the defensive. I have stated, and shall continue to state, that under the system by which we permit the great Budget Bureau to operate we seem to have made such cowards out of some of our high officials in the departments that they themselves are afraid to say what they should say to the subcommittees of the Appropriations Committee and, therefore, the appropriation subcommittees can not be blamed if they do not receive the information which Members on the outside of the subcommittees receive, whether by subterranean methods or otherwise.

Mr. MADDEN. I did not get that last phrase. What was that about subterranean methods?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. That is a phrase that has been bandied about here this afternoon. The statement was made that the gentleman from New York [Mr. DAVENPORT] had received the information which he was presenting to the House by some subterranean method.

Mr. MADDEN. Who was that?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Representative DAVENPORT.

Mr. MADDEN. He received information——

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. By subterranean methods, the clear inference being that somebody in the State Department has slipped information to him which he should not have received.

Mr. MERRITT. The gentleman does not mean that Mr. DAVENPORT said that himself?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. No; he was charged with that.

Mr. MADDEN. You do not charge that as coming from the Appropriations Committee?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. No; I do not charge it. I heard it. And now I am trying to point out the situation which we are getting into.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. It is easy to make a wrong application of a statement of fact.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Let us see what it was.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I think the statement was made in connection with the speech that Mr. DAVENPORT made. Mr. DAVENPORT had undertaken to charge that there had been great neglect in making appropriations for the State Department, with the result that it was inefficient, and I stated that if what he said was true, the duty was on the head of that department, a Cabinet officer, to bring those matters to the attention of Congress. What I said in reference to a subterranean channel was this: That if the head of that department had permitted anyone under him to bring it to the attention of Congress and had not himself called it to the attention of Congress, that it was a subterranean method.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes; that is probably as good an explanation of the incident—but not in the exact words as they occurred in debate, because the conversation happened to be in the first person and was this: The distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER] said to the gentleman from New York [Mr. DAVENPORT], "Did you or did you not receive your information through subterranean channels?" I wondered if the gentlemen had the right to receive any information.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. I am sympathetic with the attitude of the gentleman in protesting against our present situation. Our present situation is this: We have a bill here appropriating $89,047,000 for four departments of the Government. The gentleman is chairman of one of the most important committees here in Congress and is here to speak to us and give us information, and we now have 35 Congressmen on the floor. Where are the other 400? This is the system that the gentleman has in mind and is decrying.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The system, I think, has something to do with the small attendance. Let us carry that out further. I do hope the Committee on Appropriations will realize I have no feeling against them or any one of them, but I do feel that other Members are being put into a secondary position. Have we not come to a condition where the appropriation bills are prepared ahead of time? Preparation of the bills is begun officially before Members may take their seats or be appointed to the different committees. The appropriation bills are beginning to be set as to figures. Suddenly a bill is ready. It is introduced. Frequently general debate begins almost immediately thereafter. That is the situation with this particular bill. If a Member feels that he should say something in connection with an increased appropriation, or want of appropriation, he is quickly charged with having attacked the committee or is made to feel he is assaulting a hard-working committee.

The Members, therefore, come to a "what is the use" attitude. They say that, between the Budget and the big committee, there is nothing for them to do. So they are not here. Unless pressed very hard to attend, very few of them will be here Monday when this bill for four great departments will be read just as fast as the reader can skip through it. A Member who rises to offer an amendment increasing the figures of some appropriation is likely to be charged with being extravagant or not in favor of economy, or not talking "by the book"—which is the committee's printed hearing—and the amendment is promptly voted down. If he makes a suggestion of legislation of any kind on the bill, it is, of course, subject to a point of order. Therefore these days there really is little necessity for a Member to be present during the reading and passage of an appropriation bill. Should he muster Members on his side, he is in danger of being charged with assault on the Budget system and the committee.

Mr. BLANTON. And as each paragraph is read it becomes a law so far as we are concerned.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes; exactly so.

Mr. BLANTON. And if we would reduce the membership of the House to 300, as I have proposed, we would then have a working House.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. We might.

Mr. BLANTON. And every Member would know what he is doing and would know what it is all about.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. That might or might not be true. Perhaps the system might then work even faster. I do not want to get clear aside from my subject.

I wish the Members would read the short hearing on immigration in one of the pamphlets of the Immigration Committee, which pamphlet is not even entitled "Department of Labor." This subcommittee handles the appropriations for the State Department, the Department of Justice, the Department of Commerce, and the Department of Labor—four great departments—and the hearings this time have been cut up so that the hearings on the appropriations for the Department of Labor are separate.

You will find in this pamphlet all the information that was given in the way of questions and answers with respect to appropriations for the Labor Department, and I hardly need remind you that the major part of the Department of Labor is the Immigration Service.

You will find in here that the committee has made an increase in the matter of the deportation appropriation of $200,000. The deportations for the last fiscal year were about 14,000, and this the department points to with pride. The number has gone up 1,000 over the previous year, and how? Four thousand persons were pushed back over the line into Mexico and 3,000 were pushed back over the line into Canada. This accounts for 7,000 of the deportations and the cost of pushing them back is very little. It is all averaged, however. The cost of pushing back one Mexican across the line and the cost of sending an offending Chinaman at $300 back to his home place in China, which is mandatory under the law, is averaged, so that the cost of deportation is made to be about $87 per person; but when you see how the proportion works out it will remind you of the story of our former colleague, now Senator, TOM HEFLIN, about the 50–50 horse-and-rabbit pie.

So that even the additional money given for deportations will not do the work that the present laws call upon them to do. Members of the department itself, when called only yesterday for hearings before the Immigration Committee, of which I have the honor to be chairman, stated that for a good part of the last fiscal year they had to merely mark time with regard to deportations and deport the minimum of the most necessary cases, because they had not the money to pay the transportation of the persons to be deported, and this very fiscal year they are marking time. Shortage of funds causes them to deport principally just those thrown at them from the prison doors at the expiration of their sentences and a few others that are thrust upon them. They have no means with which to go out and pick up persons whom they know to be subject to deportation.

Mr. SHREVE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I will be glad to yield.

Mr. SHREVE. I desire to inform the gentleman—the gentleman has not been here for a day or two—that the committee has taken care of that extra item referred to and the deporting squad will be provided with money enough to work the entire year.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I have been here. That is proposed to be added to the bill?

Mr. SHREVE. It is already in the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I have the bill here and have read it. How much is that additional money?

Mr. SHREVE. We are giving them $200,000 more.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I am informed of that. I stated not three minutes ago that there was an additional $200,000, and it is not $200,000 net for that matter.

Mr. SHREVE. That is for the purpose of deportation so that the men may be employed for the entire 12 months.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. And I am bold enough to make the charge that if we have been marking time on deportations a portion of each and every year for the last two or three years, there will not be enough money for the ensuing fiscal year.

Mr. SHREVE. We are not going to mark time any more because we have provided them with the necessary funds.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. We will still mark time if we have only $200,000 additional for deportation purposes, and I will make the further statement——

Mr. SHREVE. In addition to our regular appropriation for deportation we had a supplemental estimate from the Director of the Budget of $200,000, which is all the money that can be used in keeping this deportation squad busy for the entire year.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. What is the deportation squad?

Mr. SHREVE. The men who handle that service.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. But that squad has not enough money to allow a single man to go out and find the men who ought to be deported.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. If the gentleman will permit, the amount of the increase is really $175,000.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes; a net increase of $175,000.

Mr. SHREVE. That is the increase over what was originally recommended.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. That is helpful, and I am sure it will be appreciated and properly used.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Was that amount satisfactory to the Labor Department?

Mr. SHREVE. Oh, yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. It has to be.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Did they ask for anything more?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. They do not dare ask for anything more. They asked the Budget for more.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Did the Labor Department indicate they could use more?

Mr. SHREVE. They did not say they could not use any more.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman let me answer? This is my time.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. That is because the Immigration Bureau is afraid to speak out.

Mr. MADDEN. No; it is not. It is because the law prohibits them. It is the law.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The gentleman is quite right. After going so far it is the law. But more money, more squads, more deportations, and Congress makes the law after all.

Mr. NEWTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I will.

Mr. NEWTON. The gentleman says they are afraid to do so-and-so. Does it not permit them to speak out when questioned by the Appropriation Committee? Are they afraid to talk frankly in answer to a question by a member of the committee?

Mr. MADDEN. It is not a question of answering; it is a question of being asked.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. That is it.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I will yield.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. In view of the positive statement the gentleman has made, I hope he will continue to make positive statements, because I will make a reply later thereto.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. All right; I will make a further one. If the department had funds for a squad from the Immigration Department that could be spared to step out into the streets in New York City and look for alien seamen who have come ashore and failed to go back to their ship or any other ships they could pick up 5,000 men. The probabilities are that there are 75,000 a year, at the very inside number, alien seamen who come ashore and remain in the United States, going into the coal mines of Pennsylvania or into restaurants or into other places to hide out and remain in the United States, and all that is well known to the immigration authorities.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. How many alien seamen are probably subject to deportation?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. A good many. But all alien seamen who have slipped in during past years are not subject to deportation.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. How many people in the country who have illegally come past the immigration authorities?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I venture to say there are 1,200,000 persons in the country who can not prove that they legally entered the country. But, please notice, that they are not all deportable; because if they have been here three years in the cases of seamen and five years in the cases of most others, under the limit of the law they can not be deported.

Mr. BLANTON. For every one of the 250,000 aliens who annually come in lawfully to the United States there is a corresponding 250,000 aliens who come in unlawfully?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes; I think likely that is true. The department is doing well to hold it to that.

Mr. BLANTON. So that there are 500,000 aliens who lawfully and unlawfully come into the United States annually.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I think the net legally in the United States, subtracting the departures, is about 250,000.

Mr. MADDEN. Why do you not get the accurate facts?

Mr. BLANTON. Because there is not a department of the Government that can give them to us. The Census Bureau can not. The Immigration Bureau can not. The naturalization department can not. Because our law does not require them to keep accurate statistics on this point.

Mr. MADDEN. I think it is unfair to make wild statements about the number that are here unlawfully—way up in the millions.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. That statement has not been made. I gave a correct statement of those who can not prove that they legally entered the country. There are easily 300,000 of such from Canada. Some have been here many years. The gentleman asked how many illegal entries there are. If anyone really knew how many in the past five years, then a direct statement could be made as to the number liable to deportation. What I am trying to say, in this interrupted way, is that more money for deportation purposes would permit the department to attempt a survey and to go about finding some of the most vicious of these people who are deportable. Each year the situation becomes worse.

Mr. MADDEN. How does the gentleman know that there are 5,000 deportable seamen in New York?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I said that there were 5,000 in the city of New York.

Mr. MADDEN. Where are they?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. All around that city. You can ask the shipmasters.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman think he could get the information from the shipmasters?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. We know the number of sailors arriving and departing. We have consular officers' figures also. Information is available on every hand. Get a copy of the hearings of the gentleman's committee or the department's reports.

Mr. MADDEN. That is not information at all. It is assertion.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. You will find all this in the records.

Mr. MADDEN. Notwithstanding the sneer of the gentleman, I say that is only assertion.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I am not making a sneer at all. The gentleman's committee is powerful. It is a great committee. But have things come to a point in this House that a Member dare not make a statement based on his study without certain members of the committee getting their backs up like a bunch of porcupines? Further, I think it is a mistake to allow each member of the Appropriations Committee to have reports of the Bureau of the Budget 60 days before other Members receive it.

Mr. MADDEN. That is not a statement of fact either.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Is it not? Then what is the fact?

Mr. MADDEN. The fact is that the Budget does cooperate with the committee in giving us information to work on from day to day while we are getting the bills ready for you and the other gentlemen of this House, but we do not get any printed copies until you get yours.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, we can get those advance copies the same as the gentleman if we know how. I get a copy just about as soon as the Committee on Appropriations does.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; anybody can get them.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. How early?

Mr. MADDEN. Just as early as we can.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. But I have a letter from the Director of the Budget that my copy will not be available for me until the opening of Congress.

Mr. MADDEN. But the gentleman made the assertion that we got printed copies 60 days in advance, and the gentleman did not state the fact when he said that.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Oh, the distinguished gentleman is now splitting hairs.

Mr. MADDEN. I would like to have the statement made truthfully.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Oh, it is truthful. I have quite a voluminous correspondence on that subject. Why go whispering around for a Budget estimate? I knew that we could get a rise out of the chairman in no time at all.

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, if the gentleman wants——

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I decline to be further interrupted.

Mr. MADDEN. I will give the gentleman a proper rise any time he wants it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Sure; always. Gentlemen, you will find a statement in some of these hearings to the effect that these immigration authorities have not any money with which to go and look for anybody except those that are practically delivered to them for the purpose of deportation. The public is led to believe that some real effort is being made to run down and deport vicious and criminal aliens, in addition to those that are shoved out of the penitentiaries for the purpose of being deported, and that sailors and other "sneak-ins" are located and sent away; but not so to any extent. Why? No funds.

And further, Mr. Chairman, even the arbitrary deportation of aliens who step out of prison may go to pieces if other governors follow the precedent of Governor Smith, of New York, who has decided—or his legal adviser for him—that a man paroled from the penitentiaries of that State shall not be held for the Immigration Service to take into custody and deport, but that it is up to the Immigration Service to go and find the paroled man when his parole runs out—and that costs money. Also Governor Smith—or his legal adviser—has stated to the Labor Department that if the department can not see that phase of the conflict between Nation and State it may become necessary for Governor Smith to issue pardons to those convicted deportable alien criminals coming out of the New York penal institutions—to pardon them to prevent their being deported by the Federal Government. That is one interesting phase that is developing in connection with deportation. It shows the power of alien influence, by the way.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes more to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman will bring in a bill and pass it putting a fine of $5,000 to $10,000 on every ship company that brings an alien here unlawfully, and a penitentiary sentence on its officers, it would stop most of this unlawful entry.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Oh, we have such a law, except that the fine is $1,000, which is pretty heavy.

Mr. BLANTON. It is now merely a maximum fine of $1,000. It ought to be made a serious offense. There ought to be confinement in a prison.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. It is a serious offense, and the fine is mandatory and can not be remitted.

Mr. BLANTON. But they take chances now with a maximum fine of only $1,000, where otherwise they would not if the fine were $10,000, with a prison service added.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Not so many as the gentleman would think. The ships themselves are often made victims.

Mr. BLANTON. They do get here, do they not?

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. In a moment. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, the motion for additional funds for the Immigration Service will not call for an excessive amount. It will be offered at the proper place in the bill. I am calling attention to it in advance. A few years ago, when we had a great number of immigrants coming in, the money received for head tax was far in excess of that spent by the Federal Government for its whole Immigration Service. Now that immigration is limited to a certain number—this year about 500,000 coming, each one paying a head tax of $8—the Immigration Service ran only $1,000,000 behind, or some such figure behind receipts, and on top of that there is the $10 consular visa, which is collected from each of these people but which goes into the Federal Treasury—a great sum which is generally thought of as State Department income, but which comes from immigrants. I now yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman does not mean to say that the Governor of the State of New York ignores the notices given by the immigration authorities in the Department of Labor with reference to people about to be deported?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. No; I do not say that he has ignored the notices. In fact, he has taken full cognizance of the notices. It develops a very interesting legal situation.

Mr. BLOOM. The gentleman knows that as soon as a person is about to be paroled and the immigration authorities wish to deport him they send a man to the prison to pick him up right there.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Oh, the gentleman is so far behind what is happening with Al Smith and the great State of New York that I am sorry for him. That is the very situation which is being changed.

Mr. BLOOM. The gentleman is not so far behind.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Oh, yes; he is.

Mr. BLOOM. The gentleman knows that Al Smith is so far ahead of what the gentleman thinks he knows that he can not catch up with him at all.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Oh, when Gov. Al Smith, of New York, undertakes to protect alien criminals when they step out of the penitentiaries of New York, either as paroled or pardoned men, so that they can remain and vote the Tammany ticket as soon as they can be naturalized, the Governor of New York is going too far ahead for me. [Applause and laughter on the Republican side.] And only yesterday a class of 10,000 candidates were made into citizens in Judge Cottillo's New York State court. That is pretty fast, too.

Mr. BLOOM. Will the gentleman mention one case where the Governor of the State of New York has been protecting criminals?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Oh, do not——

Mr. BLOOM. Just mention one case.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Do not do as my distinguished leader the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] undertook to do. Do not try to split hairs. Let the gentleman ask for the legal records in the case.

Mr. BLOOM. Does the gentleman know of one case?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes; I have it in hearings held only yesterday, and I will send the gentleman a printed copy by Monday. I will endeavor to send copies of that hearing to all Members, so they may see for themselves what is doing in deportations.

Now, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, inasmuch as the atmosphere has cleared and the weather has moderated, let me say in all seriousness that the Immigration Service must be kept efficient, vigilant, and abreast of the new laws—the work of detail in that service. Human beings are dealt with. The United States wants to be just, and the people want the immigration and deportation laws enforced. You know that. Immigration appropriations are made, most of them, under a lump sum, not split up into detail providing for so many clerks and so much money for this and so much for that. Then the sum has to be prorated per month, per district, per activity. Gentlemen, we would be doing the right thing by adding another $500,000 to the sum already recommended by the chairman, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SHREVE], and that is the additional amount for which I shall ask.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman will offer an amendment providing for it, for one I will vote for it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. If the gentleman will help get all the members present, with the understanding that the money will be carefully used, we can work that out, and I doubt if the gentlemen of the subcommittee will seriously object.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. I want to ask the gentleman if it is possible to give the Department of Labor enough money to deport all those who are illegally here?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. No; I do not think it is possible. But we can vote enough additional money to make deportations to Europe worth while.

I remember in a recent Congress, only three or four years back, that I had the honor to lead a movement designed to override the Budget recommendation, as well as the committee's figures. I asked for a million dollars for the purpose of setting up a border patrol by appealing to the members of the Committee of the Whole. I acted as a sort of midwife, and the border patrol was born by a great majority right here on this floor, with no extra legislation and no restrictive riders. And then the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. HUDSPETH], who was acting as a sort of wet nurse on that occasion, got an extra $200,000 for it. [Laughter.] All hands agree that the border patrol is operating successfully and that it is a necessary and worth-while adjunct of the Immigration Service.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. I think the gentleman has overstated it when he said all hands agree that the border patrol is a good thing and is working altogether successfully. I am not certain that it is, as a matter of fact, inasmuch as I see a statement that there are some bootleggers coming over in spite of the border patrol.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Oh, overstating? Nearly all hands then. I will further answer the gentleman on that by reading an extract right from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of only yesterday. No; I can not find it at this moment; but there was a discussion here on that subject when the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SHREVE] stated that the border patrol is working successfully. It should be understood that there are less than 500 men divided on the two borders. The gentleman from Pennsylvania said it was successful, doing very well, and that he was proud of it. And then the distinguished gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GIBSON], in whose district, I believe, is a wonderful double house, partly in Canada and partly in the United States, so that Chinese and others can walk upstairs on the Canadian side and down stairs on the United States side, said that the patrol was a good and necessary thing. Next, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HUDSPETH], who has the headquarters of the Mexican border patrol in his district at El Paso, bowed and scraped and said it was a good thing; and there is the testimony of three of our colleagues, and therefore it must be right. [Laughter.]

Mr. MADDEN. Since the gentleman is testifying now, I would like to have his own testimony.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes. I could give it by the yard. It is shown in the Appropriation Committee's hearings that the border-patrol boss confiscated a thousand or more automobiles which they themselves were unable to use. They have turned back thousands. They have assisted customs and prohibition officials. We estimate that on the Mexican border the number illegally coming in is about one for every one coming in legally. We know, however, that the Mexican population in the United States is increasing at a great rate. We expect to restrict the right to come. Our committee had hoped that when the members of the subcommittee had personally seen the operations of the patrol on the border there would be a little more than a paltry $90,000 or $100,000 extra for the increase of pay and increase of the personnel of the border patrol.

Mr. HUDSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. HUDSON. What does the border patrol constitute? What do they patrol? How did it get that name?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The word "patrol" sprang into existence at the time of the birth of the organization, which I have just described. It was an emergency name, and a fitting name. They undertake to stop persons usually back on main highways, a few miles inside the border, persons who may be coming in illegally, people bringing in aliens illegally, and they help to detect persons smuggling liquor and other contraband goods. They are not warrant officers. Their numbers are limited and they are obliged to patrol first on one sector and then on another.

Mr. HUDSON. Can the gentleman state how many members of the border patrol are stationed at Bruges Point? I think the commissioner stated there were 12. But when I passed through there I could not find any patrol or any prohibition agents or anybody. I could have brought in any and all kinds of things.

Mr. BLANTON. Did the gentleman bring in anything?

Mr. HUDSON. I did bring in two young men; that is a fact.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The limited number of men appointed on these border patrols can not be expected to be up all night, as well as all day, and at all points at all times. We need more men.

Mr. HUDSON. They do not really patrol. They would have to have a good many more if they really did.

Mr. NEWTON. I know nothing particular about the border patrol, but I know that they do detect people attempting to come in illegally.

Mr. HUDSON. I can tell the gentleman that if he will go up on the border he will not find any patrol.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Now, gentlemen, I have about completed. Please understand that one place where the shortage of money occurs is in the matter of transportation of the persons to be deported. You will find in the statement made before the Appropriation Committee a statement to the effect that the fund in the previous fiscal year had run out so rapidly that now the department, in apportioning money, allots so much for the persons to be deported from this district and so much from that district, so much for each and every month of the year, regardless of what the situation may be.

Just like saying to a grand jury, "You shall sit $50 worth and no more." [Laughter.]

You will find in the Appropriations Committee hearings a report to the effect that some sort of a circus arrived at Atlanta, Ga., bringing with it quite a large number of aliens of all kinds, including snake charmers, circus riders, acrobats, and, in addition, some alien shell and card men, procurers, pimps, prostitutes, and others of a deportable kind. In this case the Immigration Service took notice. It was an emergency, and they found and arrested 20 or 25 of these disreputable aliens and had them up for deportation. To get them out of Atlanta, Ga., the service used the Atlanta district's whole transportation fund for the remainder of the year, and I can imagine that the department is now in a great quandary as to whether it should draw from the deportation money allocated to the Chicago district, where there are a number of alien gunmen traveling around with sawed-off shotguns and machine guns, or draw money from the Pittsburgh district where, I am told, there has recently broken out a very good-sized vendetta between the fascisti and anti-fascisti, which has resulted in the killing of 24 anti-fascisti. [Laughter.] No; that is not humorous at all. Why should we have fascists and antis in the United States?

Mr. Chairman, we have limited immigration. We have restricted it as far as possible, so that only 2 per cent of the number of foreign-born people on a given census date may come from other countries. That results in shutting out many good, fine foreign peasants and other working people from any European country you might name—from Czechoslovakia, Italy,

Austria, Switzerland, Denmark, Sweden, Norway, and other countries from which many fine people have come to this country. The law even shuts out many wives and children of aliens domiciled here. It will be wrong for Congress not to make appropriations sufficient to drive out those who sneak in, either of sailors, stowaways, smugglers, or otherwise, to live here in lieu of desirable ones shut out. The expenditures may look big at times, but they are worth it. Let me tell you something. It cost $1,000,000 extra in supplemental appropriations a few years back to deport the anarchist, Emma Goldman, her murderous consort, Berkman, and 249 other anarchists from New York to Russia on the old transport Buford, but it was worth many times $1,000,000 to the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. HUDSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. HUDSON. For the information of the House, will the gentleman please place a statement in the RECORD showing the points from which the greater number of deportations are made?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I have such information in recent hearings before the Immigration Committee and will be glad to supply all Members with copies as soon as printed.

Mr. HUDSON. I wish the gentleman would do that.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I am very glad to have had an opportunity to speak freely and frankly before this small but appreciative audience, and I thank you for your attention.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman acknowledges there are no restrictions on his rights.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Why, of course not. I agree that is quite true. Any man who knows how can get all the time he needs. He can move to strike out the last word in every paragraph in a bill every five minutes. He can make all the motions he desires, and it is probably the duty of the gentleman from Illinois to see that as many as possible of such motions turn out to be mere gestures.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman should feel complimented because his audience has trebled since he began.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Thank you. This is a great and a serious subject, and I know that not only Mr. SHREVE but also the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER], the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN], and the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ACKERMAN], as well as the clerk of the committee, have given tremendous study to this subject. It is one of those subjects, if the distinguished gentleman from Illinois will bear with me, about which you can not say there are just so many.

You can not handle immigrants or deportees like sacks of wheat. You can not say, "We will provide for the Atlanta district $800 a year for deportation purposes," and not be prepared if that district uses it all in one month. When I first came to Congress, now 15 years past, I wondered why we did not have all the appropriations on a lump-sum basis, but I had only to be here a few years to learn that the lump sum is the most distressful way appropriations can be made. Under a lump-sum plan they must prorate the money over the entire year and for each purpose and for each district; but because of ever-increasing emergencies in this particular service, the necessary things are trimmed, cut, and even suspended. The inspectors are underpaid as compared with other inspector services, and they get no overtime, which other inspectors receive. Clerks are underpaid and not enough of them. The business of the Immigration Service has gone up by leaps and bounds, yet the number of clerks employed has not gone up. Every Member of Congress has much work with that service, which calls for the writing of many letters and much detail. The work is so heavy that the department itself is hard pressed to keep up with the most necessary work, yet it comes within $1,000,000 or $1,500,000 of paying its own expenses. [Applause.]

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to myself. I think it well that the House understand what the facts are when any Member seems to be laboring under a wrong impression. My good friend from the State of Washington has fallen into the habit of frequently insisting, in a general way, that the Committee on Appropriations has limited the amounts it recommends to the Budget recommendations. I find that the gentleman, when called to account for that, has been willing to correct his overstatement in that regard. He made a similar statement to that effect before our committee last year, and I asked him this question, as will appear from the printed hearings:

Mr. OLIVER. I have heard you make that statement before, and from the information that I have as a member of the committee I do not think the statement is justified.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do; but pardon me, I do not want to dispute your statement so directly.

Mr. OLIVER. I think it is so easy for an individual Member of Congress sometimes to overstate a situation, looking at it from his own viewpoint——

Mr. JOHNSON (interposing). I may be a little given to that.

Mr. OLIVER. Of course, the opinions of all should be taken into account and should be weighed in determining what is a fair conclusion to draw from the facts. So far as this committee and as the other subcommittee on which I serve are concerned, while we entertain, of course, great respect for the recommendations of the Budget as approved and submitted by the President, yet we have never felt they were conclusive on the committee; and, as you stated a few moments ago, this particular subcommittee has at times made very different recommendations to Congress from those submitted to us. So I do not think that the Appropriations Committee is subject to criticism that we are bound down by estimates submitted by the Budget.

Mr. JOHNSON. Oh, no.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Is not that quite right?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I think so.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Is not the entire statement quite in keeping with the situation?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. That is why I was objecting to the statement the gentleman made to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. COLE], in which the gentleman was quite positive in saying that so hidebound was this rule that we never permitted representatives from the departments to make statements as to appropriations different from what they submitted to the Budget.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I hope the gentleman will not put words in my mouth which I did not say.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. It so happens that in reference to the very matter he was discussing—namely, the deportation of aliens—that our subcommittee elicited from Mr. White, Assistant Secretary of Labor, information which led to an increase of $175,000 over the recommendations first submitted by the Bureau of the Budget.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SHREVE] and myself called Mr. White before us and talked with him about measures for the deportation of aliens. We asked him if he thought the amount recommended was sufficient. Mr. White said he did not. We went carefully over it and concluded that some increase should be carried. We then called these facts to the attention of General Lord, who sent for Mr. White, and later submitted a supplemental estimate of $175,000, which is carried in this bill.

This shows, I hope, that we are trying to proceed in an orderly way to submit proper estimates to the House; not excessive estimates, but such as those in authority tell us they can efficiently expend and get results from.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. If General Lord had not agreed with the gentleman and had not sent in the supplemental estimate, then what?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Unquestionably that amount would have been brought in by our committee if, in our judgment, the facts justified it.

Mr. BLANTON. Then what was the use of submitting it to General Lord?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Simply because we have an established system and we are glad to have a man so well versed in these matters as General Lord; and his aides are to go carefully over information submitted to us and give us the benefit of their judgment. They are well qualified and are willing always, I think, to give an open mind to such matters. We felt, from information communicated to us by Mr. White, that this item should be considered for a supplemental estimate. I will say to the gentleman from Texas that some of the matters had, perhaps, become known to Mr. White after he appeared before the Budget—such an instance as the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON] has referred to. You remember that last year the deficiency bill failed in the Senate. It carried an appropriation for the Labor Department and its failure brought about a condition that made it very necessary to conserve the amounts carried in the regular appropriation bill, and if there was some marking of time last year—and there was—it was partly due to the fact at least that the deficiency bill failed.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield for a further question?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. They have been marking time for a part of the time for several years.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. We are endeavoring to correct it.

Mr. BLANTON. As the gentleman from Alabama knows I am one of those who backs up the gentleman's committee and supports the Budget, generally speaking.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. But the gentleman asked who could be better informed on this question than Mr. White, the Assistant Secretary of Labor.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Where could the gentleman get better information on this subject than from the chairman of the Committee on Immigration of the House, a man who has access to such information from all over the country, who brings witnesses from everywhere before his committee to testify. Where would the gentleman find better authority than the gentleman from Washington upon this question?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. If the gentleman feels that the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON] is such a fine authority, I shall not take issue with him at this particular time; but speaking for myself, I will say to the gentleman I do not think the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON] has the specific data such as a lawyer or a judge would and should require in order to make appropriations. I should not have said this had the gentleman not called for it by his question.

Mr. BLANTON. What I have in mind is this: Suppose it came to a question of difference of judgment between the chairman of our legislative committee and the Assistant Secretary of Labor, is the Committee on Appropriations going to absolutely disregard the judgment of the chairman of our legislative committee and take the judgment of an assistant secretary or a bureau chief?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I hope the gentleman will not embarrass me but will let me make a statement.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. There is not such a wide difference of opinion between us. On these matters of estimates I can not have any more statistical information than have these gentlemen who ask for it and get it. I am sorry the discussion has taken this turn, but the point I particularly was trying to bring out was that the money being appropriated simply takes care of the deportations that come up from the regular sources and does not let us pick up those we are trying to get particularly. That is the point.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I will say to the gentleman from Texas that we always give an opportunity to every Member of Congress, including the gentleman from Washington, to come before us, and we are very glad to have them come. I do not think we have ever at any time denied a Member of the House the right to a courteous hearing.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman allow me to make another statement which I think will be worth while?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Our committee planned to have a subcommittee present at the hearings before the gentleman's subcommittee. The particular hearing at which Mr. White was present, occurred on December 8, when our committee was not appointed. A hearing was held yesterday in our committee for the purpose of beginning a discussion among ourselves as to whether we should proceed with the preparation of a much heavier deportation bill to present to this House to be voted upon. We sent for facts to see how we are getting along with deportations under present laws, and the situation was so depressing, gentlemen, that the members of the committee themselves thought it was almost useless to undertake to perfect the machinery of deportation when we could not, with the money at hand, keep up with the deportations necessary under present laws. This is the situation.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I think the gentleman from Washington will recognize that Mr. White and others connected with the Department of Labor are best qualified to give facts on which the legislative committee and the Appropriations Committee can intelligently act in relation to these matters. We have always sought what we considered to be the best information on which to predicate our conclusions.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I will yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. That ought to be true; but I have in mind the time when unfortunately there was in charge of this department Louis F. Post, whose policy was not to deport even the most radical communists that came within the law of deportation. The great amount of money we spent in order to get Emma Goldman and Alexander Bergman back was due to the fact that we could not get cooperation from Mr. Post.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. That condition does not exist now.

Mr. BLANTON. It has existed in the past, and it may exist again.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Will the gentleman from Texas yield? [Laughter.] I submit to the gentleman from Texas, who is a good lawyer and a good judge, that because at one time in the past there may have been some one in the department who did not do his duty does not justify us in concluding that men of that type are still in office. All of us who know Mr. White, know that he is zealous in the enforcement of our immigration laws, and that he is not the type who would mislead us as to the facts. The committee felt we were getting information from a very reliable and well-informed witness.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Can the gentleman assure us that Mr. White is satisfied with $175,000 increase; that is, does he believe he can carry out all the purposes of his department for that amount of money?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I do not know as to all of the purposes of the department, but he was well satisfied with that amount. That is the conclusion we came to after a talk with him.

Mr. HUDSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I will.

Mr. HUDSON. Is it not a fact that if you can make more efficient the border patrol, you will have less need of money to enforce deportation?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. The gentleman says that the border patrol is inefficient; that they are doing nothing. I want to say that that information is incorrect. We traveled along the border, and we heard from the citizens of the gentleman's State high tributes paid to the efficiency of the border patrol. You are to-day furnishing to this committee the only opinion we have heard expressed around the border line of America tending to detract from the efficiency of the border patrol.

Mr. HUDSON. I think I can take the gentleman up the full length of the St. Mary and Detroit Rivers and find miles that it is impossible for the border patrol to cover with the number that they now have, and in that instance and in that way the border patrol is inefficient. I think the chairman of the Immigration Committee will say that it is impossible to completely patrol the borders of the United States with the present force. That is all I mean. I wish to say that if we had more money to put more men there you could patrol the border. I want to make a further statement, that if the border is effectually patrolled you will not have so many men to deport.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I yield myself 10 minutes more.

The gentleman from Washington has stressed on many occasions the wisdom of the quota law. I voted for that law and wish to see it strictly enforced. Our subcommittee has made diligent inquiry into all violations, with a view of supplying adequate funds for its enforcement.

However, those who believe in the law should give serious consideration to some fundamental facts that weaken the law and make its rigid enforcement difficult, if not impossible. Until these facts are given consideration you can never enforce it as it should be. You will never be able to prevent aliens from coming in surreptiously and remaining here until, in my judgment, you write into the law some provision requiring registration. [Applause.]

Then, again, you must give consideration to the fact that when you find characters like Emma Goldman and others, to whom the gentleman from Washington has referred, are here in violation of law and they are sent back across the seas from where they came at great cost to our Government, when they return again in violation of that same law they must understand that some punitive penalty awaits them.

The committee of which the gentleman from Washington is chairman should recommend to Congress a law which will prevent these parties from feeling they are immune from punishment, even though they repeat the same offense against our law a dozen times. All we now do is, at great expense to the Government, to intercept and send them in comfort back to their homes, from which they may with impunity seek another unlawful entrance. I believe this Congress should pass a law punishing a man who enters unlawfully a second time. This it would seem is just and is as little as we should be expected to ask. When you do that even, you will largely stop illegal entries. You would be surprised at the number of those who unlawfully enter as second, as third, yea, as fourth offenders. Yet we have no law which imposes a punitive penalty on unlawful entrants.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Let me say to the gentleman that a section of that kind is a part of the deportation bill that has passed the House of Representatives twice and still has not become a law.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. But what are you going to do when you have such cases as that of Emma Goldman, who says that she would rather spend her whole future in a penitentiary in the United States than to be free in Russia? She was willing to be in a penitentiary here.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Oh, I think if she had some work to do in the penitentiary that the gentleman would find that the statement she makes is nothing but an idle threat. I have yet to find those who make statements of that kind willing to be deprived of their liberties for a great length of time. That sort of statement is often used as a means for getting into newspaper headlines, seeking for the time to pose as a martyr.

The gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON] has referred to the great source of unlawful entries when he speaks of seamen who leave and never return to their ships. The gentleman has talked with me more than once as to privileges enjoyed by seamen. It is a great international question, one that must be delicately handled, and yet if his statements are correct, thousands are permitted to come in because of an international custom, probably now almost recognized as international law, allowing 60-day shore leave, so that they may wander around in search for a better ship on which to return. Many of them avail themselves of that right, not for the purpose of seeking employment on another vessel but really to violate our immigration law. That will require study on the part of the gentleman's committee that we may write into law something that will prevent this abuse of a privilege on the part of many who enter our gates against the plain mandate of the law. When you place some punishment upon those people and not limit the punishment alone to the owners or captains of vessels you will go far to strengthen the enforcement of a law that we believe in. [Applause.]

These are matters that should be considered by the legislative committee, and I am glad to learn from the distinguished chairman of the committee that he is in sympathy with legislation along these general lines. I recognize it requires time to know just what further enabling acts should be passed. The time is now ripe for the consideration of enabling acts that will provide adequate punishment on all who violate our immigration statutes.

Let me call attention to another weakness in the law, and I think it may surprise some of you. We felt we had excluded the Chinese, but under a judicial interpretation of the treaty of 1880, we are told that where a Chinese assumes the status of a merchant he has the right to do what a Swede or an Englishman or a German or an Italian can not do, namely, bring in his family without having them even charged to a country quota. There is no quota for China; yet every Chinese merchant, it is now held, can bring in his family. Here is a subterfuge many now employ. They have large Chinese mercantile partnerships now out on the west coast, each member contributing to the partnership capital. Sometimes the number of partners may go as high as three or four hundred, each claiming the status of a merchant. If you will travel around the border, you will find many ports of entry crowded with young Chinese seeking to be admitted as members of the family of one who claims the status of a merchant. It is difficult for the Department of Labor to meet the affidavits and the proof they submit of birth. This, I submit, is a matter that needs the attention also of the legislative committee. [Applause.] Now, gentlemen, you do not appropriate money recklessly for your own business. You could not succeed if you did. You do not spend your own salaries recklessly. If you did, you could not live in Washington. This House desires its Committee on Appropriations to make intelligent recommendations, and in our effort to do so we have sought information from those whom we felt were qualified to advise what money could be wisely expended in carrying out the authorizations of Congress. I feel reasonably sure the House will find that the amounts carried in this bill are reasonable and provide sufficient funds for an efficient discharge of duties by the several Government agencies cared for in this bill.

Some reference has been made to the border patrol, and it is proper to say that a large part of their duties consist in turning back Canadians and Mexicans who, by filing application and paying a certain fee, might be lawfully admitted. No individual penalty is imposed on those who seek to enter without complying with the requirements of the law. As a result many of them repeatedly offend, and until the legislative committee imposes some penalty, at least on repeaters, you will not aid the border patrol in their efforts to enforce our immigration law. If the legislative committee will provide a punitive penalty for the second offense it will relieve the border patrol of a large part of the work it is now engaged in. I take this opportunity to say that the border patrol is the most intelligent body of young men that I have come in contact with in the Government service. [Applause.] They are zealous in the enforcement of immigration laws. I did not find one who did not feel he was there as the representative of the Government to carry out the mandate of Congress and to see to it that those not entitled to enter should stay out. Down on the southern border, when a large number of border patrol men were gathered together, the question was asked by the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN], "How many of you boys were in the World War?" The answers disclosed that about 80 per cent of that number were ex-service men. They are engaged in a dangerous service and undergo at times many serious discomforts. It was because of the importance of their work and the low salaries they received therefor that the committee has recommended in this bill a reasonable increase in their pay.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. You will find some of them who were captains in our Army abroad—men who are now drawing $150 a month; men with families; high-class men—doing loyal, efficient service in our border patrol.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. When the legislative committee has finished what it has wisely undertaken to do, as the chairman, Mr. JOHNSON, informs us, and approval of that legislation has been had, you will find that these complaints of unlawful entries will dwindle, and you can, with confidence, look forward to the time when the number of those who enter unlawfully will be comparatively few.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. The committee is anxious to pass some safe, reliable form of registration. But every investigation we have made into that matter has shown us that any system of registration would be very cumbersome and the multiplicity of details would be something terrific. It is not wise to send out legislative acts calling for more than the Government of the United States can maintain with the appropriation provided. That is the crux of all that I have stated.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I have great respect for the opinion of the legislative committee, of which the gentleman is chairman, yet, in view of the importance of that legislation, I do not think the mere matter of expense incident to its enforcement, if it promises real results, will cause this Congress, if you report the bill, from passing it. [Applause.]

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ADKINS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. ADKINS. Mr. Chairman, of course I can not under the present conditions attempt to make a speech. However, since coming to Washington the topic that I have heard spoken about most, I believe, is farm relief. Everybody seems to be anxious to know what is going to be done about farm relief. Many hearings have been had and much discussion has been given to what will relieve the farm situation and what can be accomplished. But I do not think the outlook is discouraging to Congress, when we stop to consider that all other major legislation that we have placed on the statute books of the Nation affecting directly or indirectly our major activities was put on the statute books only after long hearings and after modification before attaining its present final completeness. The interstate commerce law was for a long time discussed, and after the framework of what we now have was put on the statute books it was amended from time to time as occasion required. Everybody admits that the price of transportation is one of the important elements that enter into this problem. Never was there a tariff law passed by unanimous consent or without a great difference of opinion. Nobody would want a tariff enacted unless it stabilized the commodities at a higher level. Many hundred pages of discussion were put into the RECORD before the stockyards act was passed. Our people were not unanimous in the matter of the creation of the Federal Reserve Board. It has been amended, I believe, twenty times or more before its terms were made to apply fairly satisfactory to the banking interests of the country.

Now, after we have discussed all the various schemes offered for the relief of agriculture, where are we at this beginning of the new Congress? All the farm organizations represented at the Capital, and most of the farmers of the country, believe that the solution of the farm problem is in surplus control. My understanding is that the administration, or those purporting to speak for it, believe also that it is the surplus that is the cause of the trouble agriculture finds itself in. That has been agreed upon as factor No. 1. All believe that, inasmuch as every major activity of the country has some Federal board or commission that either directly or indirectly stabilizes the price of the service these activities renders society.

The immigration law, which has been talked of so much this afternoon, functions in stabilizing the price of labor at a higher level. Agriculture being about the only major activity not having a Federal agency to stabilize the price of its commodities, naturally it would seem has brought about a fairly general agreement on the necessity of having a Federal farm board to assist in stabilizing the price of agricultural commodities at a price that the farmer may make a fair exchange of his commodities with that of the other fellow, maintain a respectable style of living, educate his family, and lay up something for old age.

My understanding is that every farm organization represented in Washington and everybody having anything to do with the farm question believes that a Federal farm board is necessary to administer this surplus, which they all admit is causing us our trouble. Every farm organization represented in Washington, so far as I know, except one, believes that in order to maintain that sort of a system of handling our surplus it will be necessary to have what is known as the equalization fee to pay the cost incurred in operating that plan. There is where the difference seems to come in.

The last bill which was passed by Congress was vetoed by the President and the veto message criticized it in many instances. However, I think that inasmuch as we have agreed on certain of these fundamental principles it is necessary for us to stick to them. All of the laws to which I have referred have had certain fundamental principles which they had enacted into them. The compromises came as to the details. I think Congress should during this session meet every objection contained in the veto message except as to the three vital principles which are advocated as being the remedy for farm relief.

Take the debenture idea. I introduced a bill providing for that, and that proposition has been somewhat discussed this afternoon. None of the farm organizations were for it at the time; that is, at the beginning of the Sixty-ninth Congress. Well, there is no use in trying to revive a dead horse, but the Grange, at the second session, came forward to champion it, but no other farm group. I have gotten figures from an economist as to what it will probably cost the Government to put the debenture idea into operation with reference to seven of our leading commodities, which I will extend in my remarks. I find from experience and in talking with representatives from different parts of the country that one of the faults of our farm-relief idea is that it does not apply to all farm commodities, but if you took seven of the leading staple commodities and issued a debenture on what was exported during 10 months of the year 1927 of those seven commodities, at half the import tariff on those commodities, and 2 cents a pound on cotton, it would stop more than $214,000,000 from getting into the Treasury. Now, a tree does not need to fall on me to take a hint. I know that Congress would not pass a bill which would only apply to seven commodities and which would stop $214,000,000 from going into the Treasury every 10 months indefinitely. I know that Congress would not pass such a law, and so far as I am concerned I have lost all interest in the debenture idea.

I wrote Doctor Stewart, of the University of Illinois, to send me figures on cost of debenture plan if he had any available. He sent me a statement by S. S. Knight, of Petaluma, Calif., on wheat, cotton, corn, rice, tobacco, hogs, and lard, which shows if we should issue debentures for one-half the present tariff on these commodities and 2 cents per pound on cotton, it would prohibit about $214,125,000 from getting into the United States Treasury annually. I do not think such a law could be passed.

The statement referred to above is as follows:

Data sheet showing effect of debenture upon principal basic crops

Total customs duties collected in 1926 ..... $550,000,000
Total imports in 1926 4,250,000,000
Total imports of agricultural products (nonforest) 1,800,000,000

In Fordney-McCumber bill rate is about 37 per cent of value of commodity upon articles subjected to duty as against 23 per cent in Underwood bill.

Total exports in 1926 amounted to $4,750,000,000
Total exports of agricultural products (nonforest) 2,000,000,000

Wheat: Total crop about 800,000,000 bushels, with value at farm of about $1,000,000,000; about 25 per cent exported; present tariff rate, 42 cents per bushel; debenture asked, 21 cents per bushel; cost of debenture, $42,000,000; increase in value of wheat produced in Nation, $168,000,000.

Cotton: Total crop about 16,000,000 bales of 500 pounds each, or 8,000,000,000 pounds; about 50 per cent exported; no tariff now (proposed tariff, 4 cents per pound) (present importation about 300,000 bales long staple); debenture asked, 2 cents per pound; cost of debenture, $80,000,000; increase in value of cotton produced, $160,000,000; total value of present crop at farm about $1,500,000,000.

Corn: Total crop about 2,500,000,000 bushels, having value at farm of about $2,000,000,000. About 15 per cent of the crop is exported out of the country of production, about 1½ per cent of the total crop is exported as corn, or 37,500,000 bushels; present tariff, 15 cents per bushel, should be 22 cents; debenture asked for, 11 cents per bushel; cost of debenture, $4,125,000; increase in value of corn produced and sold as corn, about $41,000,000.

Rice: Total crop about 18,000,000 pounds, of which about 33 per cent is exported; total value of crop at farm, about $45,000,000; present tariff is 2 cents per pound; on milled rice should be 3 cents; debenture asked, 1½ cents per pound; costing about $9,000,000; increase in value of crop produced, about $27,000,000.

Tobacco: Total crop, about 1,300,000,000 pounds, with value at farm of about $250,000,000; about 35 per cent exported; present tariff rate, 35 cents per pound for filler; debenture asked, 10 cents per pound; costing about $45,000,000; increase in value of crop produced, about $130,000,000.

Hogs—lard: Total production, about 2,500,000,000 pounds; about 35 per cent exported; present tariff rate, 1 cent per pound; should be 1½ cents; debenture asked, three-fourths cent per pound; costing about $18,000,000; increase in value of crop produced, about $50,000,000.

Pork: Total production, about 8,500,000,000 pounds; about 10 per cent exported; present tariff, 2 cents per pound; should be 3 cents; debenture asked, 2 cents; costing about $16,000,000; increase in value of crop produced, about $160,000,000.

Commodity	Cost debenture	Increase value	Rate per pound
			Cents
Wheat	$42,000,000	$168,000,000	21
Cotton	80,000,000	160,000,000	2
Corn	4,125,000	41,000,000	11
Rice	9,000,000	27,000,000	1½
Tobacco	45,000,000	130,000,000	10
Hogs:
Lard	18,000,000	50,000,000	¾
Pork	16,000,000	160,000,000	2
Total	214,125,000	736,000,000

Net increase in farm income on the six crops shown above to the American farmer would be $736,000,000, which cost the American people as a whole $214,000,000, leaving a net gain to society of $512,000,000, by the operation of the debenture program as outlined above upon these six crops.

S. S. KNIGHT, Petaluma, Calif.

NOVEMBER, 1927.

Now, what have we done? We have agreed on about two vital things. The men most interested in this problem and have given this the greatest thought. The representatives of the largest number of farmers in America have agreed on a proposition that will meet every objection in the veto message except one, and as to that objection, it is more than half met. The veto message on the McNary-Haugen bill says we should not restrict the President as to whom he shall appoint; give him a free hand to appoint this board and depend on his fairness to the producing interests of the country in making up the board. Do not confine it to any commodity; let it apply to any commodity that produces a surplus. Do not bind your board so that it will have to deal exclusively with the co-op's; give it a free hand to deal with any organization having the necessary equipment to handle the surplus. The board would naturally favor a cooperative organization having the necessary equipment to handle the business. So we can meet every objection except the equalization fee. Now, Senate bill 1176 safeguards that. One fellow said, "My God, they would produce such a great surplus that it would result in breaking down the system—if the farmer gets a good price for some commodity he will increase his acreage." But, as I say, Senate bill 1176 safeguards that, and you will find in section 7, on page 12, of that bill, a most effective and successful means of providing against that eventuality, which is so much complained of. In the bill it is provided that if any producers of any commodity—wheat, corn, oats, pork, and so on—is getting a fair price for what he is producing in a certain year and then in the next year he puts all of his acreage into a single commodity, then the board is authorized not to take over the surplus if it exceeds the five-year preceding average. I do not believe you could have a more effective and practical means of curbing production than that. So I can not see, after reading Senate bill 1176, and the one introduced on the House side, why any man who believes that the solution of the farm problem is in surplus control and who believes that we should have a Federal farm board, should object to the passage of such a bill and giving it a trial.

I am going to say this without any fear of successful contradiction from any man, that if the theory of surplus control does stabilize the price of farm commodities at a higher level, and then it is demonstrated that your equalization fee is unworkable and unconstitutional, you will have to abandon the idea of surplus control, because here is what will happen: If you make a loan to the cooperatives to handle this and depend on good merchandising to pay your loan back to maintain your scheme, then it will not be long before you will have lost your money, because very seldom will this board be operating on a rising world market; and that is the only time you make any money in merchandising your surplus. And when your loan is exhausted, no matter whether your scheme does work or not to stabilize your markets at a higher level, it will have to fall down unless you come back and get Congress to make another appropriation or else call on the farmers to produce the money, and neither of them would produce it.

The equalization-fee idea, if surplus control is to be the remedy, is the only one whereby you will ever be able to perpetuate the surplus-control scheme of farm products without a subsidy and furnish the means of perpetuating the scheme if experience finds that that does solve the problem.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADKINS. Certainly.

Mr. BLANTON. Does the bill S. 1176 provide that the profit that this surplus may be sold for shall be distributed among the producers of the commodity?

Mr. ADKINS. Provided you get your debts paid. The gentleman does not think there would be any profit in it, does he?

Mr. BLANTON. What I am talking about is this: The farmer is interested in getting something more than the mere cost of production. He wants a profit and is entitled to it. He is interested in getting something above cost, just like every other business man.

Mr. ADKINS. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Neither the last McNary-Haugen bill nor any other McNary-Haugen bill has ever provided that the profit that may be made from marketing the surplus through this board shall be distributed back to the farmers or the producers who raise the commodity.

Mr. ADKINS. You just forget it, if you think there will ever be any profit from "ditching" this surplus on the foreign market, where the prices are lower than on our domestic market. This is why it is necessary to provide some means for taking care of the loss, and the only way you can do it is through an equalization fee.

Mr. BLANTON. And that is the reason the farmers have never fallen over themselves in behalf of the McNary-Haugen bill.

Mr. ADKINS. If it stabilizes the price on a higher level they can afford to do it, and if it does they will "fall all over" the fellow who opposes it.

Mr. BLANTON. But all any of these bills have ever proposed is to give the raisers of the commodity normal cost of production. They want some profit.

Mr. ADKINS. The farmers would not be asking for this legislation if they did not think it would help make agriculture profitable. The only chance that any commodity has to make such money out of good merchandising is cotton. The cotton grower is a factor in the world's market because he puts so much stuff on the world's market, and there is a chance for him to pay the expense of handling the surplus through good merchandising.

I think the farm organization leaders should unite on a plan such as is outlined above and Congress should pass such a law and try it. Whatever may be passed will be an experiment, and probably have to be amended, as other laws were affecting other major activities. It seems to me childish to say the farmers must all agree on a plan. If we had waited for everybody affected to have agreed, we never would have had a tariff act, an interstate commerce law, a Federal reserve act, or any other important act having to do with our economic life.

If the McNary-Haugen bill had become a law when it was passed, and corn was selling below cost of production, then the board would have declared an operating period and authorized some agency or agencies to purchase some of this corn. The weather was a factor in the corn market, the price advanced, and the board probably would have turned it at a profit. It would have changed the psychology of the whole Middle West, avoided starting a line of cleavage between the East and the West. Such things are not good for our country. Suppose the courts had declared the law unconstitutional, our country would be better off to-day than it is. [Applause.]

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with considerable interest to this discussion of the sinking of the submarine S–4. The recent disaster off Provincetown has attracted more interest throughout our country than any of the 18 or 20 naval tragedies since the sinking of the Maine. Wherever you see little groups gathered here and there they are invariably discussing this terrible disaster that has cast a gloom over the entire country.

For my own part, I have more than a passing interest in what happened in those cold, icy waters of that Massachusetts bay, for the reasons that young Lieut. Commander Roy K. Jones grew to manhood in Oklahoma and was appointed to the Naval Academy from the sixth congressional district, the district I have the opportunity and the honor to try to represent here. His parents, Mr. and Mrs. John M. Jones, reside at Hennessey, Okla., and are very dear and good friends of mine. I have known no better people in all my State than these parents of the fine, brave, young man whose life was lost in the sinking of the S–4.

I am sure that Members of this House join me in extending sincere sympathy to this stricken father and broken-hearted mother in their hour of grief. But it is not altogether sympathy they now desire. Somehow I believe the people of America share the views of these parents, who feel that this terrible accident could have been avoided, and that some one is responsible for sending not only their beloved son but the entire crew of 43 brave men to sudden and untimely deaths.

When I came here last month little did I dream that my first remarks before the American Congress would be to give utterance to the grief which has spread its dark shadow of gloom over my good friends and shocked the entire country. But, then, little did those men who went down to sea on the morning of December 17 imagine that within a few short hours their lives would be snuffed out without even a fighting chance in a tragedy that spread a pall of gloom over the holiday season for the entire Nation.

Being a new Member of the Congress, I would be reluctant to take even a small part in this controversy were it not for the fact that on yesterday certain officers of our Navy gave testimony before the court of inquiry being held in Boston to investigate the sinking of the S–4, which was plainly a veiled effort to place the blame for that tragic, heart-breaking disaster upon the shoulders of a dead man. The gallant young Lieutenant Commander Jones, who went down with his ship, is not here to defend himself. His body was only yesterday recovered, and yonder lies waiting for his mother, father, wife, and children to claim.

Mr. Chairman, I want to support the pending resolution calling for a thorough investigation of the sinking of the S–4. But I would like to have some assurance that this investigation will be conducted by a board of impartial experts, who will make a sincere and complete study of the whole tragedy. If this investigation becomes merely a tool in the hands of the Navy Department, a method of placing the blame on some dead and defenseless officer, we shall regret that we ever authorized this inquiry. We want an investigation, but we want it to be a painstaking and thorough study of the whole problem of submarine navigation, with especial attention to fixing the blame for the S–4 disaster, to be followed with constructive suggestions to prevent, or at least make less likely, the recurrence of a thing so terrible and ghastly.

Nothing we might do or say here will add to or take from the glory of these heroic dead, but it is our duty to see to it that there shall be no recurrence of a like disaster, if humanly possible. [Applause.]

What I read yesterday in the newspaper reports of the Boston inquiry led me to believe that at least a subtle effort will be made to blame the crew of the S–4. Yesterday a high official of the Navy called at my office. He was very gentlemanly and volunteered to bring me some information I desired. That is a quite different attitude than the Navy assumed when the loved ones of those 43 boys were frantically endeavoring to secure information from Navy officers during the first several days following the sinking of that submarine. But this officer immediately began insinuating that Lieutenant Commander Jones and his crew might have been responsible for the disaster. No intimation was made that some one higher up might have been at fault in not taking precautions to see that the scene of the operations of the S–4 was kept clear of surface craft.

The department has gone so far as to appoint counsel to represent the dead men, plainly indicating that these dead bodies are now defendants before the court of inquiry.

It would seem that the policy of the Navy Department is to follow the line of the least resistance. It would seem easier to blame the crew of the S–4 than to fix the blame in other quarters, where it rightfully belongs. A thorough and sincere investigation of this tragedy might cause some one to be demoted or reprimanded. I am told that in cases of train wrecks some one back behind a desk is generally to blame and some one usually loses a job. This rule evidently does not apply to the Navy. Other inquiries of the Navy Department, for example, the investigation following the wrecking of a fleet of destroyers off the west coast in 1923 failed to accomplish anything. No one was dismissed, demoted, or even criticized. Let us be certain that this investigation we propose to launch will not be dominated by timidity or under influence from official sources.

Let the facts be brought out, and if anyone is to blame, let it be known. As it now appears, the only offense calling for official reprimand is where a naval officer so far forgets his place in a giant organization as even to offer constructive criticism of that machine. The slightest criticism of the Navy from within appears to be an unpardonable sin.

The mother and father of Roy Jones are of brave and sturdy pioneer stock. They can give up their son, finding some consolation in the thought that he died on the line of duty, faithful to the lives of the men under him and to the great tradition of the Navy. It is a grave injustice to them to suggest that their son was to blame in any way for this disaster and an insult to the intelligence of thoughtful people.

As for these parents and the parents and loved ones of the other men who lost their lives, I think they have a right to ask:

First. Why was the destroyer permitted to enter the area set aside for submarine experiments?

Second. Why was deep-sea diving permitted as an experiment without salvage vessels at hand?

Third. Why did the Navy Department fail to have pontoons at hand?

Fourth. Why were the cold, stormy waters of Provincetown selected as the scene of the experiments?

Fifth. Why did not the Navy have safety devices other nations have at hand for use in disasters of this nature?

Sixth. Why were there no tenders on hand or measures taken to warn surface vessels away from the path of the submarine experiments?

Lieutenant Commander Jones was making speed tests. He no doubt felt and had a right to feel that no surface craft would be there to cross his path. The testimony shows that under the condition it was likely very difficult for the S–4 to detect the presence of another craft, either by means of the periscope or listening devices.

Regardless of the merits of safety devices or of methods of recovering sunken submarines after a disaster, the real blunder appears to be that some one failed to keep other vessels out of the path of the S–4. The Provincetown disaster would have been terrible enough in times of war, but to permit such a thing to happen in peace times is a blunder which has done much to discredit the Navy in the minds of the American public.

We must go to the bottom of this. We must restore to the American people confidence in their Navy. We must assure those who have loved ones with our great fighting fleets that the Navy is taking every human precaution to protect the lives of the men in the service.

Mr. Chairman, I have no quarrel with the Navy, nor am I a pacifist. I want not only a reasonably strong Navy but an efficient one. And it is an open secret that we have neither. Yet Congress has been extremely liberal in the way of appropriations for support of the Navy. The other day we appropriated more than $13,000,000, without a roll call, to raise a few guns and repair a couple of old, slow, delapidated warships which would be practically useless in case of war, because the Navy Department insisted on spending the money. No doubt these old, out-of-date, cumbersome ships will be taken out and sunk within a few years. Still some of you have the temerity to say we have an efficient Navy!

Yesterday I was astounded to hear the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN] declare on this floor that he could place his hand on the men in the Navy Department responsible for the backward policy of the Navy. Possibly the country will also be interested in the same gentleman's suggestion that possibly the Navy Department is purposely making the submarines unsafe, and that officials of the Navy may think as Admiral Melville thought in 1905, that if the submarine is made an effective naval vessel the appropriations for battleships, cruisers, and destroyers will cease.

It has been suggested on this floor that the submarine should be abolished as an instrument of war by all civilized governments, and that we might secure an agreement with the nations of the world to outlaw the submarine. This is a very beautiful dream and one that I wish might come true in my generation. But a few months ago I had the honor of being 1 of the 20 delegates from America to the Interparlimentary Union Peace Conference in Paris, where representatives of 41 so-called civilized governments sat in conference. From my observation there, it is my sincere conviction that militarism yet has its terrible and unholy grasp on the countries of the Old World, and we can hope for little in the reduction of arms by conference.

I have little faith in solemn agreements that in the past have been treated as "scraps of paper." In this connection, might I remind you that a few years ago we had a disarmament conference here in Washington. As a result, Harding, Hughes, and company went out and sank our Navy—or at least a goodly part of it—while Europe looked on and laughed. The history of the Old World is a history of peace treaties and the destruction of fortresses of war, only to rebuild them again.

I have no desire to criticize the Navy unjustly. But I am convinced that too much red tape now entangles the department. Moreover, it occurs to me that certain precautions and safety devices could and should be provided for those who go out in submarines. Submarine experiments should be held in warmer waters, away from the lanes of commerce; every precaution should be taken to keep the scene of these experiments free from ocean traffic, and salvage ships, pontoons, divers, and every agency of rescue should always be kept close at hand while submarines are making these dangerous experiments.

Let the proposed investigation by experts be thorough and sincere. Let the board gather all of the information possible on submarines and submarine safety. Then, when it is found what additional safety devices and safety regulations are necessary, Congress will not hesitate, I am sure, to provide the Navy Department with sufficient appropriations for new salvage ships, pontoons, additional diving equipment, or any other equipment or alterations in submarine construction that may be necessary and advisable.

Let us assure the American people that this great and wealthy Nation will in the future do everything humanly possible to protect the lives of our seamen. Let us pledge ourselves and the country that the Congress will bend every effort to make sure that another terrible disaster like the S–4 tragedy will never come to America again.

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

SATURDAY, January 7, 1928

The House met at 12 o'clock noon and was called to order by the Speaker.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty and most merciful Father, as yesterday is merged into the promise of to-day, we bow in Thy holy presence with faith in Thine unchangeable character and with renewed confidence in Thy Holy Word. As it lies before us fresh from Thine hands, may we keep it spotless. We recall the incomparable life of Thy Son! We would move forward in the light of the truth revealed by Him! There is a silent witness in every breast that sanctions every good deed; increase its strength and make it more susceptible to holy influences. Impress us that dreams are often shadows that dazzle for a day, but, oh, for the deed that comes through, crowned with wisdom and skill. This is the man! God help us to be such. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ACQUISITION OF LAND IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer a conference report on the bill H. R. 483 for printing under the rule.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana submits a conference report on the bill H. R. 483 for printing under the rule. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 483) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to acquire certain land within the District of Columbia, to be used as sites for public buildings.

The SPEAKER. Ordered printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I wish to submit a unanimous-consent request concerning the business of the House. Members will recall that at the end of the last session of Congress a considerable number of bills that had been on the Private Calendar had been passed by the House, most of them by unanimous consent. They went to the body at the other end of the Capitol, and for one reason or another failed to pass; largely owing to the jam of business at the end of the session. The committees of the House have very promptly reconsidered a large number of these bills and placed them upon the calendar.

In order that these bills may have prompt consideration I ask that on Monday and Tuesday of next week it shall be in order, after the disposal of business on the Speaker's table and all privileged matters, bills not objected to on the Private Calendar may be considered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Does that displace the pending appropriation bill?

Mr. TILSON. Not at all.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Is it the intention to have the appropriation bill read by paragraphs beginning Monday?

Mr. TILSON. Yes; if not completed to-day, and continue until it is finished, whenever that may be.

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Speaker, I understand, then, that my committee has the floor until the appropriation bill is finished?

The SPEAKER. Yes. This will not displace that. Monday is District day.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. So far as I know, there is no objection on this side.

Mr. TILSON. Doubtless we shall have to devote a number of Fridays to appropriation bills hereafter. So if we are able to utilize whatever time may be left after privileged business is disposed of on Monday and Tuesday of next week to consider Private Calendar business it will be a good thing.

Mr. BEGG. I do not understand that it is definitely understood that the order will not go into effect if the appropriation bill is not finished. In the gentleman's request did he say that?

Mr. TILSON. I believe I said "matters on the Speaker's table and privileged matters," which, of course, includes appropriation bills. Those are privileged matters, as we all know. As long as appropriation bills are under consideration or are ready for consideration they should have the right of way.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Of course, any privileged matter, even under this order, would be under the control of the Speaker of the House.

Mr. TILSON. Yes. Mr. Speaker, I renew my request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent that on Monday and Tuesday of next week, after the disposition of business on the Speaker's table and matters of privilege, it shall be in order to consider bills on the Private Calendar unobjected to. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, the request I made was intended to provide that unobjected bills may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. If that has not been understood, I should like to add that to my request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut adds to his request the proviso that bills on the Private Calendar on Monday and Tuesday shall be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ANNOUNCEMENT

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to make an announcement. Acting under the authority of House Resolution No. 78, the Chair would designate Hon. Calvin D. Paige to administer the oath to FRANK FOSS, of Massachusetts. Mr. Paige was a former Member of this House.

COMMISSIONERS IN THE COURT OF CLAIMS

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Joint Resolution No. 82, it having heretofore passed the House, and move that we concur in the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri calls up House Resolution 82, with a Senate amendment, and moves to concur in the Senate amendment. The Clerk will report the joint resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 82) to continue commissioners in the Court of Claims

Resolved, etc., That the provisions of sections 1 and 2 of the act approved February 24, 1925 (February 24, 1925, ch. 301, par. 1, 43 Stats. 964; United States Code, p. 899, sec. 269), providing for commissioners in the Court of Claims, their appointment, powers, and procedure, be, and the same are hereby, continued in full force and effect for the term of five years from the date of the approval of this joint resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate amendment.

The Senate amendment was read.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the Senate amendment.

The Senate amendment was agreed to.

COMMISSION TO INVESTIGATE "S–4" DISASTER

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, under the unanimous-consent order of Thursday last I send to the Speaker's desk House Joint Resolution 131. Pending the reading of the resolution, I would like to have the attention of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], who will have charge of the time on the other side in the consideration of this resolution.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, at this juncture I make the point of order that there is no quorum present. I think we ought to have a quorum present in the consideration of this important matter.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] It is evident a quorum is not present.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, perhaps we had better have the resolution read for the information of the House. After the reading of the resolution I will try to make an arrangement with the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] for the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Will there be another reading of the resolution for the purpose of offering amendments?

The SPEAKER. The resolution is now being read for information.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized and requested to appoint a commission which shall be composed of five members, three of whom shall be selected from civil life and two shall be retired officers of the Navy. Vacancies occurring in the membership of the commission shall be filled in the same manner as provided for original appointments.

SEC. 2. It shall be the duty of the commission to investigate and ascertain the methods and appliances adopted and used by the Navy in the operation of submarines to prevent collisions, to protect the lives of officers and crews, and to salvage the vessel in case of disaster; and to make recommendations wherein these methods and appliances now in use may be changed and improved for the good of the service and the better protection of human life.

SEC. 3. It shall be the further duty of the commission to investigate the full facts of the sinking of the submarine S–4 in collision on December 17, 1927, with the United States Coast Guard destroyer Paulding off the Massachusetts coast, and the rescue and salvage operations carried on by the United States Navy subsequent thereto, to supplement the investigation now being made by a naval court of inquiry.

SEC. 4. To carry out and give effect to the provisions of this resolution, the commission hereby created shall have power to issue subpœnas, administer oaths, summon witnesses, require the production of books and papers, and receive testimony taken before any proper officer in any State or Territory of the United States.

SEC. 5. The members of the commission shall select a chairman from among their number; they shall serve without compensation as such, but shall be paid out of the amount appropriated their actual and necessary traveling, hotel, and other expenses incurred in the discharge of their duties. Nothing herein shall reduce the pay or allowances of the commissioners selected from the Navy. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated the sum of $20,000, to be expended by such officer of the Supply Corps of the Navy as the Secretary of the Navy may designate, upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the commission, which approval shall be conclusive upon the General Accounting Office in such amounts and for such purposes incident to its duties as the commission in its discretion may deem proper, notwithstanding any other provision of law. The President is authorized, upon request of the commission, to designate such personnel of any department or Government establishment, including the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, and Coast Guard, as may be necessary to assist in carrying out the purposes of this resolution.

SEC. 6. The commission shall, as soon as practicable, submit a full report to the President, who shall transmit the same to Congress, giving the results of its investigation and its recommendations. All records of the commission, upon the completion of its duties, shall be deposited with the Secretary of the Navy.

SEC. 7. The commission hereby created shall be dissolved upon the submission of its final report to the President.

With the following committee amendments:

On page 3, line 20, at the beginning of the line, insert the words "but not later than May 15, 1928."

On page 3, line 20, strike out the word "full."

On page 3, line 21, after the word "same," insert the words "and all other reports of said commission."

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this resolution may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that this resolution may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I shall not object, I think, provided we can have an understanding—which I am sure will be agreeable to the gentleman from New York—about the offering of amendments. I understand there are one or two bona fide amendments to be offered to the resolution, and we should have some understanding about that.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to state to the House the conversation I have had with the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] relative to the consideration of this resolution. While we do not intend to waste any of the time of the House, it is not my desire to cut off any legitimate discussion of the resolution, and in order that it may be conducted in an orderly manner I intend to keep control of the time by asking unanimous consent for one hour of general discussion, one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] and one-half by myself. At the end of that time, if it is disclosed that we need more time, I will ask that the time be extended and during the time of general discussion allow any Member who has a legitimate amendment to present it to the House. At the end of general debate and after action on one or two small committee amendments I will ask leave to vote on each amendment offered before moving the previous question. It has seemed to me that would be absolutely fair to everybody in the House and give every man a reasonable opportunity to offer an amendment.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Mr. Speaker, if the bill is considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole, it will be read by sections and every Member will have the absolute right to offer amendments. It will not rest within the discretion of the gentleman from New York to permit the offering of any legitimate amendments to the resolution. Mr. Speaker, I propound that as a parliamentary inquiry. Is that not the rule, that if the resolution is considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole the resolution will be read by sections, and any Member who receives recognition from the Chair will have the right to offer an amendment?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that is the correct view.

Mr. SNELL. If it is desired that the resolution be read section by section, I have no objection to that.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I would object to the request if that were not true.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. If I may be permitted, I think that would be the rule, and I think it is desirable that it be clearly understood by the House that the bill will be read by sections at the conclusion of the general debate, whereupon it will be in order to offer amendments to it. It does not take an agreement to do that.

Mr. SNELL. That will change my unanimous-consent request.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. There is no general debate when we consider a bill in the House as in Committee of the Whole. We begin at once the consideration of the bill under the five-minute rule, and if the gentleman wishes to have any general debate he should make that request.

Mr. SNELL. I was about to say that if we are going to consider the resolution in any other way, I should, perhaps, change the request.

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman will permit, the gentleman from New York, in the House, could move the previous question.

Mr. TILSON. Oh, yes.

Mr. BLANTON. This would cut off everything. He could not do this if we were in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman from New York has no desire to cut off any legitimate debate or prevent any legitimate amendment being offered.

Mr. BLANTON. I am sure of that, but under the gentleman's proposal only those who were able to secure time from their side of the House—and each side has only 30 minutes as a total—could offer legitimate amendments.

Mr. SNELL. I made the statement if it developed we needed more time I would ask that the time be extended.

Mr. BLANTON. There is one important feature of this bill that takes from the Comptroller General the power to audit expenditures, which Congress has given him. Some of us may want some time on that provision. I want some time on that proposition, because I think it is a serious one. It is a departure that, in my opinion, we ought not to embark upon. Does not the gentleman think we should go into Committee of the Whole, and would we really not save time by going into Committee of the Whole?

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman from New York thought the plan which he suggested was the easiest, most logical, and most normal way to consider the resolution.

Mr. BLANTON. I shall not obstruct the gentleman's program.

Mr. SNELL. But if the House desires to do otherwise, I shall not object.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, with the permission of the gentleman from New York, I should like to make a brief statement. I desire to submit, particularly for the information of Members on this side of the House, that in my conference with the gentleman from New York with reference to the offering of amendments to this bill it impressed me that, coming from the chairman of the Rules Committee, the gentleman was rather unusually liberal with reference to the agreement that had been made, and it seems to me that under the unanimous-consent proposal, which the gentleman has submitted, especially asking that we consider the bill as in Committee of the Whole, every Member would have a much better opportunity to offer amendments and to discuss them, as well as discuss the merits of the bill, than is usually the procedure in considering a resolution from the Committee on Rules, and I hope no objection will be made to the request.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Mr. Speaker, we may as well understand what it means to consider a bill in the House as in Committee of the Whole. The only difference I see is that in the House a quorum would require 218 Members, a majority of all the membership, and it would perhaps change the rule as to general debate; but so far as reading the bill and amending it, I know of no difference in considering a bill in the House as in Committee of the Whole and in considering it in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks, without opportunity for careful consideration, the only difference would be, in considering this bill in the House as in Committee of the Whole, that there would be no general debate unless by unanimous consent. The Chair thinks a quorum would be 100, as is the case in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, would not the same rules apply with reference to record votes as in Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. Oh, precisely. Will the gentleman from New York again submit his request?

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I request unanimous consent that the bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole, with general debate of one hour, at the conclusion of which the resolution will be considered under the five-minute rule.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will not the gentleman incorporate that portion of his original request with reference to control of the time?

Mr. SNELL. Yes; one-half of the time to be controlled by the gentleman from Alabama and one-half by myself.

Mr. SHREVE. Pending that, may I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. SNELL. Certainly.

Mr. SHREVE. Numerous Members of the House are interested in the matter of the consideration of the appropriation bill and are desirous of knowing whether we are going to take up that bill this afternoon.

Mr. SNELL. I wish I could give the gentleman that information, but I have not the information at present. It will depend upon how much debate develops on this resolution.

Mr. SHREVE. Does the gentleman think the debate on the resolution will run along until 3 or 4 o'clock in the afternoon?

Mr. SNELL. I can not make a definite suggestion about that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the resolution be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole, and that there be general debate limited to one hour, one-half to be controlled by himself and one-half by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD]. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. And at the conclusion thereof, it be read under the five-minute rule for amendment.

The SPEAKER. That follows. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker and ladies and gentlemen of the House, the general purport of this resolution, of course, is well understood by all Members of the House. I desire to take a short time to explain the various sections of the resolution.

Section 1 provides and authorizes the President of the United States to appoint a commission of five members, three of whom shall be from civil life and two shall be from retired officers of the Navy.

Section 2 provides for a general investigation to ascertain and investigate the methods and appliances adopted and used by the Navy in the operation of submarines to prevent collision, to protect the lives and officers of the crews, and the general work in salvage of vessels in case of disaster.

Section 3 provides for a specific investigation of the full facts connected with the sinking of the submarine S–4, and work done by the Navy in salvaging the same.

Section 4 provides that this commission which is hereby created shall have the power to issue subpœnas, and so forth, as carried in the usual investigation resolutions.

Section 5 provides for general organization of commission and that the members of the commission shall receive as pay only the necessary traveling, hotel, and other incidental expenses incurred in the discharge of their duties. It also provides for an authorization of $20,000 to carry on the work of the commission, the same to be paid out by a Supply Corps officer designated by the Secretary of the Navy, and the same to be paid out upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the commission.

Section 6 provides for the report. It provides that a report shall be made as soon as practicable and that some report must be made not later than May 15, 1928; and that the President shall submit that report and all subsequent reports of the commission to Congress.

Section 7 provides that the commission shall be dissolved upon the submission of its final report to the President.

This resolution provides for a complete general investigation of the appliances, devices, and machinery used in the construction, manufacture, and operation of submarines. It also provides for a separate and distinct investigation of all of the work of the Navy in connection with the much-regretted disaster of submarine S–4, not only the work in trying to save lives, but the salvage of the boat.

In my judgment it provides for as complete, thorough, and searching investigation as any resolution that has been presented to the House. It provides that the investigation will be made by the most able and experienced engineers to be obtained.

It provides for making a definite report to the President, and, in turn, that that report shall be submitted to the Congress. It also suggests that the report shall be made at as early a time as it is humanly possible to make it.

This resolution has the indorsement of the President of the United States; it has the indorsement of the Navy Department; it has the indorsement of the Naval Committee of the House. It also has the unanimous approval of the Rules Committee. In my judgment it will meet the demands of the country if they are desirous to have an investigation made, and I hope that the resolution will receive the unanimous approval of this House.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. I will.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I notice that section 2 provides for a complete investigation by this commission of everything relating to the submarine itself and its appliances and that there are no restrictions or qualifications. However, in the next paragraph, which relates to the investigation of the sinking of the submarine S–4, there is a restriction or qualification.

It says that this is—I quote—> to supplement the investigation now being made by the naval court of inquiry.

Now, a supplement is not supposed to go over the same subject matter that is in the original. It is supplementary; it is new. Why should there be that supplementary restriction when it comes to an investigation of this terrible tragedy?

Mr. SNELL. It is not intended to have any restriction whatever, but to make a complete, thorough, searching investigation of that disaster and every other thing pertaining to and connected with it.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I invite the gentleman's attention also to section 6, line 20, where the original resolution provided that "the commission shall submit a full report to the President." But as reported the word "full" is stricken out, so that the commission will simply submit a report of their supplementary investigation.

Mr. SNELL. Let me explain that. I think I can straighten that out all right.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. In the last two lines of section 3 "supplement" means to cover a deficiency in the investigation now being made by the naval court of inquiry. It seems to me that those words should be stricken out of the resolution and that an amendment to that language would be appropriate. I think the dignity and independence of the House suggests that as appropriate procedure.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, in answer to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] relative to section 6, the original resolution provided for a full report. On more careful consideration we were afraid that they would not be able to submit a full report during the present session of Congress. Therefore we made a definite provision that the commission should submit some report before May 15 in order that we might have it this session, but we in no way relieved them from eventually making a full, complete, and final report.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The only investigation which would affect the personnel of the Navy is the investigation as to that accident, how it was caused, and who, if anybody, is responsible for this. The investigation of this commission is to be supplementary to the investigation conducted by the naval officers themselves. Why was not that supplementary restriction put into the investigation concerning the condition of the hull and the way that the boat is constructed?

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, there is no desire upon the part of anyone with whom I have talked to limit or restrict this investigation in any way. Later, if it seems better to strike that out, as far as I am concerned, I am willing that it should be stricken out. There is no desire on the part of anybody in connection with the administration, with the Committee on Naval Affairs or with the Committee on Rules, to place any restriction or limitations upon this investigation.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Will the gentleman tell me why the time within which they shall make some sort of report was put off until May 15?

Mr. SNELL. When I looked over the original resolution, I drafted an additional section that the commission should make a report within 90 days, but upon careful consideration and consultation with the Judge Advocate General of the Navy, it was found that they could not make a full and complete report until the submarine S–4 is salvaged, and it is possible that it will not be salvaged within three months. That is the reason we changed that provision in that section.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Then it is possible that the commission may carry on after the adjournment of this session of Congress? This first report will come in just before the adjournment of this session.

Mr. SNELL. It is the intention that that report will be made just as soon as is humanly possible, but we do not want to place any restrictions upon them and force them to make a report that is not complete in every detail.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER. The purpose of this resolution is to expose to the country not only the cause of this disaster, if it can be solved and made known, but also to make suggestion to the country how future accidents like this may be avoided.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU].

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, on a December morning the submarine S–4 after a collision with another ship went to the bottom with its crew, and the Navy Department and the Nation have been compelled to stand by helpless as those men slowly died. That disaster constitutes a challenge to American genius, and this resolution, it seems to me, provides the proper way to approach the subject. It lays the foundation for action by Congress which will, in so far as is humanly possible, prevent a recurrence of a disaster which has shocked the Nation. Whether it be true or not, of course, I can not say; but I have heard it repeatedly stated by gentlemen who ought to know that certain foreign nations are considerably ahead of America in respect to safety devices which provide for the raising of submarines and the saving of the men who are trapped in sunken submarines. If that is so, and if that information can be obtained, God knows that this commission that is to be created should obtain the information.

I think that I speak the feeling of this House when I say that regardless of expense, if the submarine is to continue—and it looks as though it is, as though it may in the end make the battleship obsolete—if the submarine is to constitute a major agency in warfare, then something should be done, if it can be done, to prevent the sending of men to their deaths, trapped as these men were.

Of course, this committee will report as speedily as possible. The country demands as quick action as is consistent with thoroughness, and whatever recommendations this committee may make, I think the House may rest assured they will have serious consideration and prompt attention by the Committee on Naval Affairs, whose chairman has been here for so many years and who is an honor to his State and this House. [Applause.]

As has been said by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL], the chairman of the Committee on Rules, there was no division in the Committee on Rules with respect to the reporting of this resolution. I apprehend there will be no division in the House. Let us answer the demand of the Nation that something be done by favorable unanimous action upon this resolution.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. SEGER].

Mr. SEGER. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, about three weeks before I came to this session there was unveiled in my district a monument to the inventor of the first practical submarine ever constructed, known as the Fenian Ram. The inventor of this underseas craft was John P. Holland, who came from Ireland to become a resident and citizen of the city of Paterson, N. J. Through the generosity of Mr. E. A. Browne, a citizen of Paterson, this original underseas boat, 36 feet long, was rescued from a junk yard and mounted on a concrete block alongside the tribute of granite and bronze. I have not been interested in submarine perhaps from this source alone, for my two boys were in the Navy during and after the World War. They were not in submarines, but they were in boats often partially submerged during the pulling up of the mines in the North Sea and off the coast of Ireland.

There has been considerable criticism, some charges have been made, many have written to me regarding the tragic fate of the S–4. Members of Congress have found fault with what has been done by the Navy in submarine operations, but everything that has been done and everything that has been written and all the criticisms and charges that have been made are not going to bring back the boys who passed away in the S–4.

Before the holiday recess I introduced a resolution asking the Secretary of the Navy pertinent questions to be answered to this Congress. I have no criticism to make of the Navy. I admire the Navy. I think we have the best Navy in the world. [Applause.] I am particularly interested not in the criticism, not with what has been found fault with in the past, but what will be recommended to safeguard in the future the lives of our boys who go down in submarines. I am glad to make way and I am willing that the committee shall not act upon my resolution, because I believe the resolution before the House to-day, sponsored by the President, is more comprehensive and more complete than any of the resolutions that have been introduced here on this subject. I hope that the resolution will be adopted without delay. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the remainder of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New Jersey yields back one-half minute.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MCCLINTIC].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Oklahoma is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, Mr. and Mrs. John M. Jones, of Hennessey, the parents of the commander of the ill-fated S–4, live in the State of Oklahoma. Unsolicited I have received a communication from them asking that I keep them posted as to what will be done in respect to this great disaster. In addition I have received a great many letters from people all over the United States lamenting the cause of this sad accident, and I want to make a suggestion regarding this resolution, and with due respect to the gentleman whose name I am going to call. We all know that when a person has occupied a similar position, serving as a member of an investigating committee and made a report concerning a naval disaster, we have a pretty good idea as to what kind of a report can be expected in this instance should this person again serve in this capacity. Now, I am told unofficially that a certain naval officer who has been recently retired is slated for an appointment on this investigating board. We all know that Admiral Hillary Jones was a member of the committee investigating the recent Shenandoah disaster, and we know that some criticism was made of him because of the way that hearing was conducted. So I think that this information ought to be brought to the House, so that those charged with the responsibility of selecting the two representatives of the Navy should know that the public mind would disapprove such an appointment. I hope it will not be necessary to offer an amendment to this resolution, because I am in favor of the resolution. I want to commend those who are responsible for bringing it in here at such an early date. I think it is a step in the right direction. But I do hope that when this committee has been selected no person will ever be appointed on it who has already served in the same capacity on a board that investigated the loss of life in connection with the Shenandoah disaster. It was for this reason that I asked for a few minutes of time in order to give voice to this sentiment.

Now, Mr. Speaker, everybody regrets that we have had this recent disaster, and I am sure the right kind of representatives will be selected to perform this great service and that no Member of the House shall ever be criticized for failure to do his duty.

Mr. Speaker, if I could have my way every submarine in the world would be outlawed, as civilization has no need for such a death-dealing instrument of warfare. Of course, as long as other nations have such ships the United States will have to maintain this branch of national defense. The State of Oklahoma has given to the service Commander Roy K. Jones, and this disaster has shocked the sensibilities of the entire Nation. It may be true that the Navy Department did everything possible for the rescue of this ship, but it seems to me that those in charge of this branch of this service have been woefully deficient in providing the kind of safety appliances that could be used in such a disaster as the sinking of the S–4. The tragic log of the S–4 tells the story, unparalleled in the history of this Nation. It is as follows:

TRAGIC LOG OF S–4 TAPS IS EPIC OF NAVY HEROES—"PLEASE HURRY" AND "OXYGEN TANKS EMPTY," HAMMERED BY LIEUTENANT FITCH, TOLD OF DESPERATE FIGHT WITH DEATH—MADE PUBLIC BY WILBUR

The story of a hopeless fight became public yesterday when Secretary of the Navy Wilbur made public the signal log recording in full the messages exchanged between survivors of the doomed submarine, S–4, the divers trying to rescue them and operators of the oscillator signal system on the submarine S–8 and the rescue vessel Falcon.

In issuing the log it was explained that communication with the six trapped sailors in the torpedo compartment had been greatly facilitated by Lieut. Graham N. Fitch, Washington, D. C., last surviving officer, who knew the signal-code taps. Copies of the tragic document have been furnished the parents of Lieutenant Fitch, Col. and Mrs. Graham D. Fitch, of this city, the log including transmissions of messages from his wife and mother, and his acknowledgment of them.

It will be remembered that the rescue group was unable to determine at first whether the men left alive were conversant with the signal code, but in a short time it was apparent to the surface vessels they knew it and were able to tell of their plight to the outside world.

The submarine S–8, sister ship of the S–4, first established communication with it by answering signals sent to the surface from a system of knocks from the hull of the S–4. Three taps meant an answer "yes"; five, "no"; and seven, "I don't know."

Tapping signals to the prisoners began on the afternoon of December 18, the day after the disaster. "Is control-flooded room flooded?" was signaled, and at 5 o'clock an answer of seven taps signified they did not know.

Then follows the pitiful story compiled by Rear Admiral Frank S. Brumby, directing salvage operations at Provincetown Harbor, grave of the S–4, giving the time and dates the messages were sent and received:

"Q. Is water in torpedo room?—A. Three taps sent at 5.11 p. m. on the 18th of December.

"Q. Are you in torpedo room?—A. Three taps sent at 5.30 p. m., December 18."

Due to the ability with which signals were received in the torpedo room, it was figured that Lieutenant Fitch was there, as he was torpedo officer, so that a better system was started by telling the S–4 to signal by international code, using two knocks for a dash and one knock for a dot. At this time the U. S. S. Falcon took over the communications by using an oscillator for communicating:

"Q. Is there any gas?—A. No; but the air is bad. How long will you be now?"

Sent at 6 p. m. December 18.

"Q. How many are there?—A. There are six. Please hurry."

Sent at 6.10 p. m. December 18.

"A. Compartment salvaged air is being hooked up now."

Sent at 6.43 p. m. on December 18 from Falcon.

"Q. Will you raise us soon?—A. We are doing everything possible."

Taps were heard at 8.25 and at 10.18 p. m. on December 18.

The Falcon made no signals, as a diver was down. When communication was resumed:

"Is water still coming in?" was signaled, and the answer was, "Slow. Hurry." It was sent at 11.51 p. m. on December 18.

"Q. We are working as fast as possible. Have you light?—A. We have no light. The air is very bad."

Sent at 12.02 a. m. on December 19.

"Q. Can you tell us the names of those with you?—A. Names are Fitch, Short, Crabb, Pelnar, Snizek, Stevens."

Sent at 12.50 a. m. December 19.

"Q. Have you tried removing gag from compartment salvage air line?—A. Salvage air line is flooded."

Sent at 1.30 a. m. December 19.

"Q. How deep is water in compartment?—A. The water is about 18 inches deep. Air is very bad."

Sent at 6.09 a. m. December 19.

At this time the Falcon had to leave the scene of the operations with Diver Michaels injured, imprisoned in the wreckage during the rescue operations, and the U. S. S. S–8 was ordered to keep in communication with the S–4. At this time the weather conditions on the surface made diving impracticable.

OXYGEN BOTTLE EMPTY

"Oxygen bottle empty. Can you send down a couple," came a call at 9.38 a m. December 19 from S–4.

The S–8 asked the S–4 to make more space between letters and to make 10 taps if they did not receive message.

At 9.40 a. m. December 19 the S–8 again received a message:

"Can you send down a couple?"

During this period the U. S. S. S–8 had difficulty in reception, no doubt due to the weakness of the personnel on the S–4.

An intermittent conversation was kept up by the S–8, now hoping that by concentrating on the signals the time would pass easier for the imprisoned men.

The times of these messages was Monday forenoon, December 19.

The following are the messages sent during the period:

From S–8. Two floating cranes are on the way now.

From S–4. Where are cranes coming from?—A. From New York.

From S–8. Will air last until to-night?—A. It will last until 6 to-night.

From S–8. Much noise. Will call you in 10 minutes. Time is now a quarter of 11, Monday a. m.

From S–4. How is weather?—A. Choppy.

From S–4. Is there any hope?

Sent at 3 p. m. Monday.

"A. There is hope. Everything possible will be done."

From S–8. How many torpedoes on board and where stowed?

Sent at 5 p. m.

The S–8 could not get an answer to this message.

From S–8. There is hope.

From S–8. Did you get last message?

Sent at 5.45 p. m. Monday.

S–4 answered with a number of taps very distinct.

From S–8. Will call you in a few minutes. Water splashing against boat drowns out our taps.

From S–8. Can you hear me now?

The S–8 then heard taps, but was unable to make them out.

From S–8. Everything possible has been and will be done.

From S–8. S–51 pontoons have arrived. Time is 3.15 Tuesday morning.

S–4 answered by three groups of three taps each.

From S–8. Have you a message?

The S–8 then heard sounds like some one moving something around.

FITCH MESSAGE RECEIVED

At 10.50 Monday night the S–8 received the following from the commander control force: "Transmit, if possible, the following message for Lieutenant Fitch on the S–4: 'Your wife and mother constantly praying for you.'" This was sent to the S–4 at 12.10 a. m. December 20, and it was asked, "If you received this, send taps until I stop you: if not, send taps like this 1 . . . . . AR."

From S–8. Did you get that?

Sent at 12.30 a. m. No answer from S–4.

From S–8. Did you get that message?

Sent message for Lieutenant Fitch again. No answer. Sent at 12.45 a. m. December 20.

Listening by S–8 has been difficult since 10.30 p. m. December 19.

At 2 a. m. December 20, repeated message for Lieutenant Fitch. Did you get last message? Send taps. No answer from S–4.

This message was sent at intervals until, at 6.10 Tuesday morning, December 20, the message was sent again with request that three taps be given for yes and five for no, and

At 6.15 a. m. December 20 from S–4 three groups of three dots each were received, indicating yes.

From S–8. At 6.20 a. m. December 20. Diver will try to connect air to S. C. tube. Three taps for yes; five for no. At 6.20 a. m. the S–4 answered yes.

TAPS FINALLY FADE AWAY

From S–8. At 7.40 a. m. December 20. Weather slightly calmer than last night. Still choppy but calming down slowly. Time 7.45. No answer from S–4.

At 8.15 a. m. December 20 the S–8 thought that they heard taps but were not certain.

At 10.15 a. m. from S–8. Cranes are here. Time 10.30. The S–8 heard faint indistinct tappings occasionally. The S–8 now tried to call the S–4 intermittently but could get no answer until at 4.05 p. m. the 20th of December the S–8 sent: Are you all right O. K.? The S–8 then heard three taps very distinctly.

At 4.30 p. m. December 20: Are you all right O. K.? The S–8 was sure that an answer of three taps was heard.

At 6.30 p. m. December 20 the S–8 heard taps at random.

At 6.35 p. m. December 20, the S–8 quit sending so as to listen to determine if taps continued.

At 2 a. m. December 21, called S–4 for 10 minutes, but no answer. Nothing was heard during the remainder of the night.

On Wednesday morning, December 21, the Falcon took over the listening, but heard nothing further from the S–4.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman used four minutes.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GIFFORD].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Speaker, referring to the subject matter of my remarks last Wednesday, it may be recalled that I read part of an editorial into the RECORD. If you have read the whole editorial, you will have noticed that stress was laid on the point that we not only have a full investigation but that it be an investigation "out of uniform." I want to reread a part thereof:

If Congress shall decide that there shall be another kind of investigation—

In addition to the naval court of inquiry—with expert engineers and the best ability the Nation can provide, but out of uniform, it will be well for the naval authorities to accept the decision in good spirit, to cooperate in every way in the process of the examination. That way probably lies the restoration of the prestige of the Naval Establishment.

I do not know that the suggestion is pertinent, Mr. Speaker, but I do know that in most of this type of investigations heretofore Congress has been represented. At times the wish has been expressed that officials of the departments might personally appear before us so that additional information might be obtained not merely from what they said but from their personalities and the way and manner of their testifying.

I may say that the editorial from which I have read has influenced me considerably. Because the S–4 was sunk in my own district, I have naturally taken particular interest in the tragic affair and have purposely gathered together a large number of news stories and editorial relating to it. They are contained in this book of clippings, which are most interesting. Many of the editorials bear the heading "Horrible," or words of similar import. Among the many, one or two only have been critical of the position which I have taken.

It has occurred to me that it might be well to have one Senator and one Representative on the proposed investigating committee, although none of us may desire such a position. Still, we who have created the Navy and are vitally interested in the service and its improvement should, it seems to me, not be divorced from the work of investigation. We have a great deal of responsibility in connection with the Navy and this proposed inquiry alike, and shall ultimately have to pass on the recommendations which will be made. I do not wish to offer an amendment along the lines which I am suggesting, however, unless it is likely to be favorably received.

The second thought that I wish to express has reference to the notable speech which the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] made on Wednesday and which indicated that he had a thorough grasp of his subject because of his trip on the submarine. His speech has caused much newspaper comment, but it would seem that in some cases the chief conclusion drawn from it was to the effect that no one not in the naval service had a right to make criticisms or suggestions. I am sorry to have those of us who have voiced honest opinions, with a view to being of some assistance, and who have tried to be moderate when we felt that we should condemn, placed in so unfavorable a light. Statements are frequently exaggerated and highly colored in the press, and I am sure that, as regards my own criticisms made here in the House the other day, one could not discover any particularly virulent condemnation of the Navy.

My argument was perhaps based a good deal on sentiment, but I tried to present the facts just as I found them, things which I felt you should know about and which should be considered in the event of an investigation. Surely my criticism could not properly be construed as based on the belief that I was personally capable of running a submarine or effecting its rescue from the House Office Building. Nevertheless I do not feel that any of us should be frightened into withdrawing our active interest or separating ourselves from this investigation because of any attack based on the idea that we who are not Navy men have no right to utter criticism or suggestion. I ask the House to think this over, and I offer the suggestion that Congress should not be without representation on the membership of the proposed commission, since we know how effective it has been to have representatives of this body on commissions investigating matters which have finally had to be passed upon by the Congress. Thus we personally knew some of the men who had considered all the evidence, and when they appeared before us and presented their report we could listen to them with confidence and were not obliged to depend wholly on what was set down in cold black and white in the printed statement. I say again that it is the personality of the men who compose such commissions and the manner in which the investigations are conducted which counts heavily. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE]. [Applause.]

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Speaker, I am constrained to submit to the House that the criticism made by my friend from Oklahoma [Mr. MCCLINTIC] of Admiral Hilary B. Jones is not justified. I do not wish to engage in any controversy with the gentleman. Admiral Jones is an honored constituent of mine. He and his family, his father ahead of him, have been among the most honorable and patriotic people who have resided in the Commonwealth of Virginia. [Applause.] I think it may be said that Hilary B. Jones is the foremost naval officer in the American Navy.

Mr. BUTLER. Admitted to be so.

Mr. MONTAGUE. He is retired, I think. His talents, his keen perception and judicial balance have been recognized in conferences. He was at the preliminary Geneva conference and at the last Geneva conference on the limitation of armaments. I suspect that if I could speak confidentially to my friends I might say he did about as much for this country as any man on that commission at Geneva. [Applause.]

Under these circumstances I have done what any of my colleagues would have done, namely, to speak truthfully of a great officer and a fine gentleman. I imagine that Admiral Jones does not desire to serve upon this commission, and that should he be requested to do so he would only comply under a supreme sense of duty.

Now, one other thought. I am in favor of this resolution and I hope it will be unanimously approved. I concur in the President's recommendations as to the organization of the commission and its scope of activity provided for. There is one sentence, however, in the resolution which I would like to see omitted. I had thought and conversed about it before the suggestion of my distinguished friend from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER]. I think we should strike out the sentence in the third section, beginning in line 14 and running to the end of line 16, "to supplement the investigation now being made by a naval court of inquiry." I think we should disassociate this investigation from the naval investigation.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. I think, perhaps, that is a reasonable suggestion and, as far as I am personally concerned, I have no opposition to it whatever.

Mr. BUTLER. And it will leave the resolution as it was originally introduced.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I think that sentence should be omitted. If it is omitted, it will put the House in a more dignified position, and the investigation will have more scope and independence of action. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BLACK]. [Applause.]

Mr. BLACK of New York. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, the executive branch of government is under investigation, but through this resolution it will investigate itself. It would be better for a commission of experts appointed by a congressional committee to handle this inquiry, but due to the administration control of this House, except in tax matters, I take it this will be the only resolution of this nature that can pass. It is better than none at all; at least, some facts will be uncovered no matter what the subsequent recommendations are.

I hope the commission will be made up of marine engineers unconnected with Government contracts and free of pressure direct or indirect. It seems to me generally in shipping, relief is immediately needed. The shipping of the country cries for leadership. A strong Secretary of the Navy could restore our maritime prestige. The President could render the country no greater service than by inducing the resignation of Wilbur—give us a leader in the Navy Department instead of a duddie-fuddle. [Laughter.]

I have two amendments to offer to this resolution. The first concerns the interest of possible appointees under Government contract. The second provides that any widow or parent of any of the crew or officers of this ship may appear by counsel and examine and cross-examine witnesses and have the commission send for exhibits and persons.

This is in line with congressional procedure. Doheny, Fall, and Sinclair had counsel; VARE, GOULD, and SMITH had counsel; Fenning had counsel. I do not want these boys who were sent to the bottom of the sea to be made the goats of this investigation, and I am going to do my best to see to it they are protected by the amendment I have suggested. [Applause.]

I yield back the balance of my time, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, there being no further requests on my side of the House for any time upon the discussion of this resolution, I desire to ask the indulgence of the committee for just a moment to restate more largely than to present any new matter, at least the attitude of the minority members of the Committee on Rules in voting to favorably report this resolution.

It is a proposition, of course, in which there can not possibly be any element of partisanship. It is a matter that has been brought to the attention of Congress by a very great and tragic disaster in our naval forces, a disaster, gentlemen, which, I am sure you will agree with me, was surrounded by very unusually pathetic and pitiful circumstances. It has been an incident that has aroused the interest and the concern of the American people to a very large degree, as reflected in comments in the newspapers, editorially, and in their own news service.

It presents a problem that necessarily, by the very nature of it, calls for some character of response from the Representatives of the American people; and it seems to me that it is as little as we can do, gentlemen, to undertake by appropriate legislation to set up an instrumentality for a fair, calm, scientific, disinterested investigation of all the matters which are placed within the jurisdiction of this commission by the terms of this resolution.

Some objection has been made, and the point has been raised by the gentleman from Massachusetts, that probably no naval officer, either retired or in the active service, should be upon this commission; and although I was not in any wise responsible for the framing of this resolution, I imagine that the thought actuating the inclusion of naval officers on this commission was that in the investigation of highly scientific and technical questions it would be entirely appropriate, and indeed essential, to have the advice and judgment upon the commission of men who had spent their lives along these lines. I imagine they were not included for the purpose of giving the Navy any special pleaders upon the commission, but the thought was entirely the one which I have suggested.

This may not meet with the approval of a majority of the Members of the House, but I am sure, as I have briefly stated, this was the impulse which actuated the inclusion of retired naval officers on this commission.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question right there?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I will be very pleased to yield to the chairman.

Mr. SNELL. I am glad the gentleman has made that statement, because that is exactly the opinion I have had in connection with it. On account of their experience and long service, they would furnish technical information which would be hard to get anywhere else; and in view of the fact there are three men from the outside on the commission, they could not dominate it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I am very glad to have the gentleman make that additional statement to the argument I have presented.

Gentlemen, there is one phase of this matter which I think I can state without violating any of the proprieties with reference to our proceedings in committee. I was responsible, I think, for the amendment which appears in section 6 of the bill, putting in the limitation that at least a preliminary report by this commission shall be submitted to the President, and by him in turn to Congress, not later than May 15 of this year.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Will the gentleman yield for a question on that point?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I notice that section 7 of the bill provides that the commission shall be dissolved upon the submission of its final report to the President.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I was wondering if the gentleman would approve of an amendment to make that report not later than the date of the opening of the second session of the Seventieth Congress.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Personally I should have no objection to such an amendment, but I will state to the gentleman from Texas that in arguing this matter before our committee we felt that the members of this commission, who are working without pay and who presumably, at least, will be men of very high type, men of courage and candor and intelligence, would by the very terms of the resolution as now drafted, seek to expedite as much as possible their investigation and their report to the President. I agree with the gentleman that it seems that certainly the first Monday in December of 1928, as the gentleman proposes, should be ample time for them to make a full and complete investigation and thereupon be dissolved.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. I really think we should place that limitation in the bill. I do not think we ought to limit them to too short a time, but under the wording of the resolution there would really be no limitation upon them so far as submitting their final report is concerned.

Mr. BANKHEAD. As I have said to my colleague from Texas, personally, I would have no objection to such a limitation.

I was upon the point of stating, when the gentleman from Texas rose, the purpose of putting in this amendment to the original resolution providing that not later than May 15, 1928, a report should be made by this commission to the President.

I know personally that the thought was that certainly within three months at the latest from the organization of the commission, acting with the facility which we expect of them, that they would not only be able to make a preliminary report, but my hope was that they would be able to make a final report. Upon this theory that it is probable this session of Congress will adjourn by the 1st or the 15th of June, and if it were possible for the commission to complete its full investigation and report to Congress it might give us an opportunity for the Naval Affairs Committee to bring in remedial legislation and carry out the recommendations of the commission.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I will be glad to.

Mr. BUTLER. I have had some talk with the gentleman from Alabama about it, and I hope that there will be no undue limit of time placed upon the commission for a report, but give them ample opportunity to make an examination of all the facts and give them to the country. I hope that they can do it within four months, that we may know and respond to what is necessary. I think the gentleman from Texas has been very liberal in making it four or five months. I think in that time the public may know where the responsibilities are and what this Congress is to do hereafter.

Mr. BANKHEAD. In response to that I beg to suggest to my friend that under the agreement for the consideration of this bill it will be thrown wide open for the consideration of any amendment which in the judgment of the House may make it more satisfactory as a resolution.

Now, in conclusion, I think the purpose of the resolution has been thoroughly explained. I hope in its main terms and purposes it will meet with the approval of the House. It is certainly a matter of such major importance and solicitude to the minds of the American people that it seems to me it ought to have the unanimous approval of the House.

I wish to say this, although it does not bear directly on the subject: If I had my will about this resolution it would not be to appoint a commission to study and investigate this disaster, but to appoint a commission to negotiate with other civilized nations of the world to forever destroy the submarine as an agent of civilized warfare. [Applause.]

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I will.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. Did the committee take into consideration a provision for submitting to the Senate for confirmation the names of the men appointed by the President to the commission?

Mr. BANKHEAD. No, we did not; I will say to my friend.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. Inasmuch as this is a matter which every man, woman, and child in the country is interested in, does not the gentleman think that this question should be considered here?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Ordinarily I would say that I believe in the provision for senatorial approval of Executive appointments, but in the nature of the case I feel, under all the circumstances, and in the interest of expediting the investigation, that we can safely leave all this to the discretion of the President.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. In view of the fact that there is so much criticism throughout the United States of certain officers, does not the gentleman think it would be more satisfactory to the public generally if the names of the gentlemen which the President selects were submitted to the Senate for its approval?

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is apparently the gentleman's view of the subject, and if he thinks it is of sufficient importance he can offer an amendment. I do not think I would support an amendment of that kind. Mr. Speaker, I now yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. GREEN].

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. TILSON). The gentleman from Florida is recognized for five and one-half minutes.

Mr. GREEN of Florida. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, we are all interested in our Army and our Navy and their welfare. These great wings of defense are all important and all necessary in times of peace and in time of war, therefore I am not going to criticize our Army or our Navy. I would be the last one to do it. I would like to commend it, I would like especially to commend the Navy, which some 10 years ago, under the great Secretary Daniels, transported some 2,000,000 men across the water without a casualty. [Applause.]

We have recently had something like 90 casualties of submarines, but I hope that this is the toll of progress. All of our great progressive movements take their toll of humanity—like aviation, submarines, and all those developments. It seems terrible that in our great civilization the men in the ill-fated S–4 for hours and hours were able to impart their intelligence to those on the outside with messages like these: "Is there any hope; how long will it be?" And then in turn their relatives sending up prayers. Surely our great civilization will be able to in the future find methods of precaution and prompt relief in similar situations.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to see the resolution so amended that this commission may be able to adjudicate and recommend the payment of the claims of the relatives of those who lost their lives in this disaster. I support the resolution and believe there should not be a dissenting vote. Differing from some Members of the House, I commend the Army and the Navy. Especially do I commend the Army when I realize that the Chief of Staff of the Army is a constituent of mine, a son of the second congressional district of Florida, Gen. Charles P. Summerall. [Applause.] And especially do I commend the Navy when I realize that one of its most distinguished admirals is a son of my own congressional district, the great second congressional district of Florida.

I refer to Admiral Cone. Why should I criticize the Army and the Navy? At its last session Florida's Legislature passed a bill authorizing $500 for the purchase of a gold saber to be presented to Gen. Charles P. Summerall. On January 17 next this gold saber will be presented to him in Jacksonville, Fla., by Florida's chief executive, and with proper ceremony. This saber will be presented in recognition of the great and courageous services of General Summerall during the World War and in recognition of his worthiness as one of Florida's noble sons.

Mr. Speaker, the resolution should pass. It should pass to help the Army and the Navy, and I believe it should pass with the amendment which I suggest, so that the claims of the relatives of those who lost their lives may be considered by this commission and be adjudicated and then in turn recommended to this Congress for payment. [Applause.]

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KING].

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, I have only a few remarks which I desire to make, and I do so mostly on behalf of Mr. E. T. S. Mason, of Galesburg, Ill., the inventor of the open subway of Chicago. Mr. Mason has sent in some three different suggestions as to the submarine question, and his letter to me submitting those suggestions I append hereto as a part of my remarks:

GALESBURG, ILL., January 4, 1928.

Hon. E. J. KING, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR ED: I am inclosing sketches of three devices which would have saved the victims of the recent submarine disaster if they had been installed on that submarine.

It is a very reprehensible thing that no safety devices are installed on our submarines, and no doubt Congress will do something very quickly to guard against future disasters of this kind.

Wishing you and yours a happy new year and many of them, I am

Yours truly,

E. T. S. MASON.

SALVAGE BRACE RAILS FOR RAISING SUBMARINES FROM ANY DEPTH

Salvage brace rails are steel brace rails extending from stem to stern on submarines, running through supports about 4 inches above the surface of the submarine, bracing the submarine, giving grappling hooks a chance to catch easily and raise submarine.

Three should be placed on all submarines, one at the top and one at each side.

Small surface boats should have one at each side.

In case of sinking of a submarine large vessels or cranes could raise it quickly with grappling hooks from any depth from 100 feet to 600 or 700 feet. No divers needed.

The submarine could be dragged to shallow water if only one vessel at hand.

Grappling hooks made like four-barbed fishhooks would catch on the salvage brace rails when dragged across a submarine in any depth of water and the submarine raised or dragged to shallow water.

ESCAPE DRUMS OR TORPEDOES TO ENABLE SAILORS TO ESCAPE FROM SUBMARINES FROM DEEP WATER

Steel drums or torpedoes large enough to take in from four to six men to enable sailors to get out of submarines from deep water if necessary.

A chamber at top of submarine with port to receive drums from inside of submarine and a port at top or end to let the drum escape and ascend to the surface of the water or be pushed out like a torpedo after water is let in, pressure removed, and port opened.

Rings at top of drums so that rescuing ships can lift out of the water.

Each man is supplied with oxylite, which gives off oxygen and absorbs carbonic gas, on entering steel drum.

The steel drums can be made in decreasing sizes so that they and the ports would nest together, saving space.

By these devices men could get out of submarines themselves from any depth of water.

AIR-DRUM REELS TO TAKE LINES, PHONE WIRES, OR HOSE TO SURFACE FROM SUNK SUBMARINES

Marking lines, phone wires, or even air hose on drum reels can be released from submarines from any depth marking the location and establishing communication and even air connection with rescuing ships.

Air hose of 200 to 300 feet on air-drum reels can be released and air thereby pumped into sunken submarines.

The air-drum reels are fitted with loose running collars through which lines, wires, or hose run, thus preventing tangling.

The air-drum reels on which are wound lines, wires, or hose are installed in water-tight chambers on top of submarines.

In case of an accident water is let in, pressure removed, ports opened, and air-drum reels allowed to rise to the surface to rescuing ships.

The rescuing ships could note location, establish communication, attach grappling hooks, and raise the submarine.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I have no more demands for time. I ask for the reading of the resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized and requested to appoint a commission which shall be composed of five members, three of whom shall be selected from civil life and two shall be retired officers of the Navy. Vacancies occurring in the membership of the commission shall be filled in the same manner as provided for original appointments.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STEVENSON: Page 1, lines 5 and 6, after the word "members" in line 5, strike out the words "three of whom shall be selected from civil life and two shall be retired officers of the Navy," and insert in lieu thereof "whose appointment shall be confirmed by the Senate."

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, there is considerable criticism of the proposition to write into this resolution a provision that two retired naval officers shall be required to be on this commission. In fact, you are going to find a good deal of criticism of this Congress for abdicating its right and power to investigate this transaction itself and turning it over to the President, who will naturally confer with the Secretary of the Navy, and therefore it is conferring authority upon the Secretary of the Navy to investigate himself. But now, when you go further and actually require that certain officers of the Navy shall be on the commission, it seems to me that we are going a little beyond what we should. I am willing to risk the President if you have these men confirmed by the Senate of the United States. Therefore, I offer this amendment to strike out the provision that designates two ex-officers of the Navy to be on the commission and then leaving the President absolutely free to name three other officers of the Navy, who will be suggested to him, possibly, by the Secretary of the Navy, because naturally the President must rely upon the Secretary of the Navy to advise him in these matters. That is the reason I offer the amendment.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, the purport of this resolution is to put the responsibility squarely upon the President of the United States for the personnel of that commission. Furthermore, the only reason for the suggestion of two naval officers was explained by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD]. The two naval officers would furnish a certain amount of technical information which has come to them from their experience in the Navy that probably could not be obtained from any other source. Furthermore, the number of naval officers on the commission was limited to two, because we did not want the commission to be controlled by ex-officials of the Navy. The three who are to be appointed from civil life will be strong, representative men, experienced in engineering affairs, who will bring an ability to the commission that could not be obtained from any other source. Furthermore, we want this commission to be appointed and organized immediately and set to work. I think the matter should be left exactly as it is at the present time.

Mr. STEVENSON. The gentleman will notice that the amendment which I have offered does not prevent the President from appointing retired naval officers. It gives the President full sweep all over the population of the United States and puts the responsibility upon him and upon the Senate of the United States to confirm them.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. It shall be the further duty of the commission to investigate the full facts of the sinking of the submarine S–4 in collision on December 17, 1927, with the United States Coast Guard destroyer Paulding off the Massachusetts coast, and the rescue and salvage operations carried on by the United States Navy subsequent thereto, to supplement the investigation now being made by a naval court of inquiry.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GRIFFIN: Page 2, line 16, after the word "inquiry," insert "All hearings before the commission shall be open to the public."

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I understand the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE] has in mind also a resolution to strike out the language of the bill to supplement the investigation now being made by the board of naval inquiry.

Mr. MONTAGUE. That does not interfere with the gentleman's motion.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker, I will withhold my amendment until that of the gentleman from Virginia is considered.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I thank the gentleman from New York. I offer an amendment and ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] to strike out the word "thereto" in line 14 and the words following, the words "to supplement," and all of lines 15 and 16.

Mr. SNELL. I have no objection to that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MONTAGUE: Amend, page 2, line 14, after the word "thereto" by striking out the remainder of line 14 and all of lines 15 and 16.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN] is recognized.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GRIFFIN: Page 2, line 14, after the word "thereto," insert "All hearings before the commission shall be open to the public."

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker, I do not know that I want to talk upon this amendment. It is obvious that a subject as important as this ought to be considered in the open for this reason: This terrible disaster has aroused a great deal of sympathy, as well as interest, in the scientific world, and I think if the public were permitted to follow the proceedings from day to day as recorded by the press it would result in many valuable suggestions being made to the commission.

Mr. SNELL. I will state to the gentleman from New York that in all probability the hearings will be open. I have no objection to his amendment, and I do not think anybody else has.

Mr. RAMSEYER. This amendment would not apply to executive sessions.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Certainly not.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin rose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin is recognized.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, it is of the greatest importance that this investigation shall be open and of the most searching character, for this was an awful tragedy. I doubt whether any Member of the House has ever read—certainly, I never have read—anything more touching and tragic than the report in the papers yesterday and the day before of the testimony taken before the board of naval inquiry. One of the victims down in the hull of the sunken submarine asked, "How long will it be?" "Is there any hope?" and then said, "Please hurry." Again, a little later, "Please hurry." Gradually the sound grew fainter and fainter, "Please hurry." At last it ceased. Officers and crew were dead.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA], in his speech on Wednesday last, told the House facts about the sinking of the S–4 which we ought to be reminded of now. There is a mile marked out for a test course at the end of the hook of Cape Cod. There are two posts, and when the submarine comes abeam of the posts it is timed and continues to run until it arrives at the other end of the course, which is similarly marked. There are four large markers, and the location is known as the submarine course for test purposes. Another submarine, the S–8, had just finished its tests. This submarine, the S–4, was making her test of speed submerged, going at full speed. Her two periscopes—mark that—her two periscopes were out of water and visible. And yet a Government vessel, under the command of officers of the United States Coast Guard, came directly across this submarine course, struck the submarine, which was still under water, and sent it to the bottom, some of the crew to be drowned and the others to be slowly smothered to death in that great iron coffin.

Do not tell me that the only question here of importance is as to why they did not haul the S–4 up after it had been sunk! No, Mr. Speaker, another and vastly more important question to be answered here is, Who is responsible for a United States Coast Guard vessel rushing across that submarine test course—a course marked out for that purpose and well known—while a submarine was making a test there and was still submerged?

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. WAINWRIGHT. Can there be any question, I will ask my friend from Wisconsin, that all the facts relating to the liability of anybody, whether in the naval service or any other service of the Government, can be brought out in that inquiry?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes; there is a possibility of a question, because I have in mind other investigations of cases where other vessels have been sunk. I make no attack upon the Navy. I know many of its officers. There are no finer men in the service of any country, model gentlemen, gallant, fearless, patriotic. I do not criticize them. But somebody, somewhere, is responsible for failure to warn that Coast Guard vessel and all other vessels not to go across that test course while that submarine was still under water. It should have been made known to the officers of every Government vessel in that vicinity that that submerged test was then in progress. But this submarine with its periscope out of water and plainly visible was sunk by one of our own Government vessels and 40 or more men sent to their death.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLACK of New York: On page 2, line 16, after the period, insert "Any widow or parent of any of the officers or crew of the S–4 may be represented by counsel, who may examine witnesses and procure through the commission subpœnas for persons and exhibits."

Mr. BLACK of New York. Mr. Speaker, the amendment speaks for itself.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. To carry out and give effect to the provisions of this resolution, the commission hereby created shall have power to issue subpœnas, administer oaths, summon witnesses, require the production of books and papers, and receive testimony taken before any proper officer in any State or Territory in the United States.

Mr. McSWAIN. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from South Carolina offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. McSWAIN: On page 2, line 22, after the word "States," strike out the period, insert a comma, and add the following: "and no naval officer or enlisted man shall be prejudiced in his record, service, prospects of promotion, or advancement on account of any testimony given, information offered, or assistance rendered by any such person before or to the commission, or any member thereof, or agent or officer thereof.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend the gentleman's amendment by striking out the last two words. In that connection I want to say that there is an element of reason as well as ample experience for the gentleman's amendment. I will not vote for it, yet I will not say that I am against it; but I do say there is a certain degree of justification for the gentleman's anxiety.

Now, I have in my hand the report of Commander Edward Ellsberg, of the Navy, that brave and accomplished officer who is now engaged in the salvaging of the S–4. He is the officer who salvaged the S–51 during the winter of 1925–26, after she was sunk by the City of Rome on September 25, 1925. It is well to note that she was not finally raised from her grave in the mud and silt off Block Island until July 5, 1926, nearly a period of 10 months. Furthermore, in towing her through Hell Gate she struck a rock and sank again, and the salvage operations had to be renewed.

As I said, I have here the report of Commander Ellsberg upon the work in salvaging the S–51. It is a very interesting document, going into all the details, describing the pontoons and devices used, and then he makes this final statement:

For future operations it is possible that the experiences set forth above may be of value, but for a correct estimate of the whole job it is desired to state that the success of the job was far more due to the courage, the energy, and the devotion of the men engaged, both as divers and on deck, than to material employed.

If that shows anything at all, it indicates that he was at that time not satisfied with the paraphernalia with which he had to work.

Commander Ellsberg was before the naval court of inquiry yesterday, as an expert witness, on the sinking of the S–4. In his testimony, as reported in this morning's papers, he said the submarines of S and V classes in the United States Navy have more safety devices than those of any other nation. The V type has nothing to do with the case, for they are dealing with the S type. Everyone in the Navy knows that the S type has no safety devices whatever. Speaking of accidents to American submarines he is reported as saying: "When an American submarine has been sunk and the crew remained in control of the vessel, one or both ends of the vessel have always been raised and the crews saved."

Neither does that happen to be true. I have put on the bulletin board in the corridor a summary of submarine disasters, which I will insert in my remarks. This shows that we have had all together, since 1904, 11 accidents to United States submarines, and that in 5—all within the last 12 years—there was a loss of life of 99 brave sailors. Since 1925 we have had four accidents to submarines, in only two of which did the crew go unscathed, while in the remaining two we lost 73 men.

Commander Ellsberg must have knowledge of this, and yet for some reason or other seems to be afraid to tell the truth.

Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes.

Mr. ROY G. FITZGERALD. In that connection I wish to state that a naval officer told me a few days ago—one who has had considerable service on submarines—that if the truth was known this was caused by the lack of keeping proper lookout through the periscope, but that it would never be told. If the suggested amendment of this resolution will assist the morale of the Navy to get the truth to Congress, I see no harm in it. I agree with my friend from Iowa. When these hawks go out and are killed and the tigers of the jungles are killed there is something wrong with the Navy.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I will now insert the summary of submarine disasters, which will give a true picture of the "Safety of the American submarine":

ACCIDENTS WITHOUT LOSS OF LIFE

Mr. GRIFFIN. Besides the five disasters to American submarines, in which 99 men lost their lives, there were the following sinkings in which there was no loss of life:

First. September 2, 1920. S-5 off Delaware Capes, in 168 feet of water, due to defective valves. Note: This is a very significant accident. Only one end sank; the stern remained above the surface. The crew were imprisoned 44 hours and were not rescued until a hole was drilled in her hull by W. G. Grace, chief engineer of the steamship George W. Goethals. Please note that the rescue was not made by the Navy, but by volunteer help.

Second. March, 1921. N-2, O-7, and O-8 ran on rocks.

Third. February 2, 1921. L-1 off Cape Henlopen. Collision with pilot boat Philadelphia. Crew saved.

Fourth. December 7, 1921. S-48 off Bridgeport, Conn. Neglect to close one of the hatches was the cause of the accident. The crew of 43 men saved by shifting ballast and thus floated the bow above the surface. The crew then crawled through the torpedo tubes.

Fifth. January, 1925, S-19 off Nauset Beach Light.

Sixth. January 29, 1925. S-48 ran on rocks off Portsmouth Harbor.

With those few exceptions, where good luck was on our side, the loss of human life in submarine disasters is appalling; and it surpasses human belief that an enlightened nation should continue to build their vessels without the slightest concern for the lives of the crews or the salvaging of these valuable vessels.

RECAPITULATION AS TO AMERICAN SUBMARINES

Five disasters, with loss of lives	99
Six sinkings, without loss of lives	0
Total	99

I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, no one is going to object to the sentiment expressed by the gentleman from South Carolina, but that is not the question before the House at this time. The question is whether the amendment presented by him will aid in the thoroughness, effectiveness, or results to be obtained by the present resolution before the House. In my judgment it will not change conditions in any respect whatsoever. If a man is going to carry something in the back of his head unfriendly on account of some testimony given somewhere and some time, as suggested by my friend from South Carolina, he will carry it just the same whether this amendment is in the resolution or not. Everyone knows that the officers and men in every department of the Navy are supposed to tell the actual, honest, and full truth, and if they do not do it that is something for them to answer for—not I. Furthermore, this amendment carries an implication against these brave and honorable men who are in the Navy at the present time that I consider is entirely uncalled for at the present. I expect and firmly believe that these men, under oath, will tell the exact truth and let the results fall where they belong. It is not only my expectation that they will tell the whole truth, it is the expectation of the President of the United States, is the expectation of the Secretray of the Navy, and, above all, it is the expectation of the American people, and I hope that this amendment will not be agreed to at this time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. The members of the commission shall select a chairman from among their number; they shall serve without compensation as such, but shall be paid out of the amount appropriated their actual and necessary traveling, hotel, and other expenses incurred in the discharge of their duties. Nothing herein shall reduce the pay or allowances of the commissioners selected from the Navy. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated the sum of $20,000 to be expended by such officer of the Supply Corps of the Navy as the Secretary of the Navy may designate, upon vouchers approved by the chairman of the commission, which approval shall be conclusive upon the General Accounting Office in such amounts and for such purposes incident to its duties as the commission in its discretion may deem proper, notwithstanding any other provision of law. The President is authorized, upon request of the commission, to designate such personnel of any department or Government establishmeat, including the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, and Coast Guard, as may be necessary to assist in carrying out the purposes of this resolution.

Mr. BLACK of New York. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLACK of New York: Page 3, line 4, after the word "Navy," insert: "No member of the commission shall be financially interested in any contract with the United States."

Mr. BLACK of New York. Mr. Speaker, there must be no question of a whitewash about this inquiry. The people of this country are insistent that this be a very, very thorough and sifting investigation by an impartial body of men. Unfortunately the administration that is under attack because of the situation by this resolution will appoint the men to make the investigation. Congress should see to it that these men have no financial interest in any Government contract; that they shall be under no kind of pressure direct or indirect. The Members of this House may not be interested in any contract with the Government. Therefore these men who are but delegates of this House and of the Senate should have no right to have any interest at all in any form of Government contract.

I thought when I offered the amendment to permit the widows or the parents of the crew to be represented by counsel, that I was suggesting something that this House would adopt in the interest of fair play. The House refused to adopt it. I do not see how the House can turn down this amendment. We, ourselves, are under the same constraint, and we should be. So, should the members of this commission in this very crucial time.

Mr. HUGHES. Does not the gentleman know that that is already the law—that that is the general law?

Mr. BLACK of New York. I do not understand that it is the law in regard to any such commission as this.

Mr. HUGHES. It is the law.

Mr. BLACK of New York. And I hope that the President, no matter what happens to this amendment, will bear in mind that it is the sentiment of this House, and we will show that it is the sentiment of this House if you agree to my amendment, that no such person should be on this commission.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I challenge my friend from New York [Mr. BLACK] to point to a single word in this resolution or to any suggestion that has been uttered on the floor of this House which would give any indication that anybody wants this investigation to be a whitewash.

Mr. BLACK of New York. The whole form of the resolution indicates it.

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman can not point to one definite statement or word to that effect. Every suggestion made here has been to the opposite, in every respect, and the gentleman knows it.

Mr. BLACK of New York. The gentleman surely does not think that I believe that any gentleman who is interested in covering the administration will admit that this is going to be a whitewash.

Mr. SNELL. I challenge the gentleman to mention one word.

Mr. BLACK of New York. And I challenge the whole form of this resolution, the source it comes from—the Navy Department, now under criticism, and the Secretary of the Navy. The House gives itself right over to the Secretary under investigation.

Mr. BUTLER. Let the House express its view and then we will know whether or not it is to be a whitewash.

Mr. SNELL. All right. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BUTLER) there were—ayes 6, noes 146.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. I have refrained from saying anything about this matter. I expect to vote for this resolution. I do not think that we are going to shift this responsibility of Congress onto the President by simply passing this resolution.

Now, when this unfortunate accident has happened and the country has become aroused, Congress all of a sudden wakes up and comes in here and takes the Navy to task. Some of us in this House have been complaining of the extravagance in the Navy and in the Army for the past six or seven years, but our complaints have gone unheeded. Congress is responsible for conditions that exist in the Navy. A few of us on the floor of this House have contended time and time again that the Navy has spent its money lavishly and wastefully, and that the Army has spent its money lavishly and extravagantly. And when there are great internal improvements needed in this country, great activities of the Government in its internal affairs, which the Budget Bureau cuts down to the last notch, and saves money we permit the Army and the Navy immediately to walk in and carry it off. We are forced in our civil matters, in our civic appropriations, to pare to the very core, but as soon as a surplus is visible, why here is a great program from the Army and the Navy to carry it off, and as soon as the Navy gets an appropriation the Army wants one equal to it to carry on the same activities.

Eight years ago in this House I contended that the Army and Navy both could be improved if you would train in industry the graduates of the Military Academy and the Naval Academy—if you would give them five years' leave of absence and put them into the industries of this country, so that when war came on or a great emergency came on those men would have practical information about the business of the country and know how to marshal the war materials of the country in time of war. It has been claimed that when the World War broke out we had one instance where they were calling for contracts on the building of these cantonments which contained specifications for a particular size of window glass which the manufacturers of glass in this country had not manufactured since the seventies. It is said the Navy called for canned goods to be packed in a certain size of container which the trade in America had not manufactured in years.

I do not think it is an opportune time now, just because an unfortunate accident has happened, that Congress, upon whose shoulders rests responsibility for making appropriations for the Navy, should dodge its responsibility of seeing that proper appropriations are made and that the money is properly expended. When appropriations are requested Congress answers with a lavish hand because asked by the men who have in their charge the defense of this Nation.

When an accident, perhaps unforeseen and unpreventable, comes up we ought not to want to go out and stir up the country against the Army and the Navy. There are brilliant men in the Army and in the Navy, but I say to you here now that they spend too much money without regard to how money is made or earned in this country. They have no comprehension of the toil it takes to get the money which they spend. "But," they say, "it does not hurt the farmers; they do not pay anything, only the big business men pay it." Gentlemen, keep on pursuing that policy further and put the money into the Army and the Navy and into armament and you will find when the time comes that these great other matters that require internal improvement will provoke the people to rise up and ask you for an accounting.

I do not know what caused this accident. You do not know what caused it. You have your guess about it. I hope this investigation will be made. I will vote for the resolution. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment to section 5, page 3, to strike out the following language:

> Which approval shall be conclusive upon the General Accounting Office in such amounts and for such purposes incident to its duties as the commission in its discretion may deem proper, notwithstanding any other provision of law.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Amendment offered by Mr. BLANTON: Page 3, line 10, after the word "commission," strike out the following language: "Which approval shall be conclusive upon the General Accounting Office in such amounts and for such purposes incident to its duties as the commission in its discretion may deem proper, notwithstanding any other provision of law."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I quite agree with the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] that there is nothing suspicious about this resolution in the main; that it is wholly a proper one in its purpose and should be passed. But I can not agree with him that there is nothing suspicious about this particular language. There is something suspicious about this particular clause. It did not come from my friend from New York. It did not come from his great Committee on Rules. It did not come from the great Committee on Naval Affairs. It did not come from the President. It came from the Secretary of the Navy, who for several years here since he has been in office has been trying to cut down and destroy our General Accounting Office, the office of the Comptroller General of the United States. You can support him if you want to. He sits across the table from the Comptroller General constantly, day after day, and tries to browbeat and turn down your Comptroller General, and when the Comptroller General upholds the law and carries out the will of Congress this great Secretary of the Navy sends his emissaries into court and tries to set aside on every occasion and in every possible way the orders of the Comptroller General.

To do what? To obey the law? No; to disobey the law. To spend money honestly and in accordance with the law? No; to spend money in violation of the law passed by Congress. And that is what the Secretary of the Navy has done in this case, sought to get around the Comptroller General again.

This is going to be an honest commission, I believe, and if it is an honest commission it will know how to spend this sum of $20,000 in an honest way and in accordance with the law. It does not need this provision, which says it can spend it without any supervision of the Comptroller General and regardless of the law.

What is there about my amendment, to strike this language out, with which you can not agree?

Mr. SNELL. I will tell the gentleman in a minute.

Mr. BLANTON. I yield to the gentleman now.

Mr. SNELL. I will make my speech in my own time.

Mr. BLANTON. I would like the gentleman to make it now, so I may answer him. Does he not want the money of the people from his district in New York spent in accordance with the law? He has helped Congress to create the Comptroller General to see to it that all public money is spent in accordance with the law, and there is not a week that passes but what this great Comptroller General of the United States, the creature of Congress, calls this Secretary of the Navy to time and says, "Mr. Secretary, you can not spend this and that because you are trying to spend it in violation of the law." And the Secretary of the Navy does not like to be thus hampered. Do you not want the money of the taxpayers spent in accordance with law? I will ask the chairman of the Rules Committee if he does, why is he afraid of his Comptroller General? Why is he afraid of the Comptroller General passing upon the expenditure of this sum? He can smile and he can get up here, as the chairman of the great Rules Committee, and throw cold water on the proposition and say this is such a small sum that he wants the commission to spend it without limitation and restriction, but that does not answer the question I am asking him. Does he want it spent according to law? If he does, Congress has appointed the Comptroller General, nobody else—Congress has created the General Accounting Office and no other agency—to see to it that the executive departments shall obey the law when they expend the money of the people of this country. Why not strike it out? That is a question the gentleman can not evade by argument.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I can explain to the gentleman the purpose we had in putting that language in the resolution and then let the House decide itself. In the first place, I will say that I have just as much confidence in the Comptroller General as any man in this House, and I have always supported him in his work, and there is nothing here that in any way reflects on him or his work. The resolution as it originally came up—and which is supposed to have been drafted in the Navy Department, but I do not know whether it was or not—did not contain the provision that is in the resolution at the present time, and that is objected to by the gentleman from Texas. So the gentleman from Texas is entirely mistaken in his supposition, as he usually is, with respect to matters at which he strikes at random, and upon which he has no definite knowledge.

Mr. BLANTON. How does it come to be in the resolution?

Mr. SNELL. I do not yield to the gentleman. I will state the situation we want to cover—and it is one of common sense—and then let the House do just as it wants to do, because it does not make any particular difference to me. We are going to ask some of the most experienced, high-grade, and well-known engineers in the United States to act on this commission. Every single thing they get as compensation is their hotel bills and their traveling expenses. Unless we put this provision in the bill they will be limited to $7 a day for hotel and living expenses.

Mr. BLANTON. That is a pretty good allowance.

Mr. SNELL. This commission will sit mostly in Washington, New York, and Boston, and every man with common sense knows that a commissioner can not live there, as he would be expected to live as a commissioner of the United States, on $7 a day. Now, I do not understand that the question raised by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER] will in any way be affected by this resolution. The question of the pay of witnesses, and so forth, is not provided for, and I understand they will all be on the same basis. I only know that the thing which it was intended to cover by this exception was the matter of the traveling and hotel expenses of the commissioners themselves, and for that reason it was thought reasonable, fair, and the only decent thing we could do was to put in this exception. If it is necessary to put the responsibility on anyone, I am willing to assume it.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. RAMSEYER. The use of this $20,000, I think, is explained on page 3, in the first two or three lines. It can only be used to pay the commissioners' necessary traveling expenses—hotel and other expenses—incurred in the discharge of their duties. I can not find therein any provision covering the pay of witnesses.

Mr. McSWAIN. Will the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. McSWAIN. While it is true $7 a day is the general limitation under the general statute, would it not be entirely appropriate to prescribe a limitation here of as much as $20 or $25 a day to take care of the living expenses at the best hotels?

Mr. SNELL. It does not seem to me that is necessary.

Mr. McSWAIN. On account of this being a special law.

Mr. SNELL. This is a special appropriation for a special purpose, and we must remember that, of course, the members of this commission will use common sense; if we do not attribute that to them, they ought not to be on this commission.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. SNELL. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The members of this commission will be gentlemen who are not accustomed to the methods, the limitations, and a great deal of the red tape of governmental procedure.

Mr. SNELL. That is absolutely correct, especially those coming from private life.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. And if we take this language out of the resolution, we are going to subject them to all of the little disagreeable incidents that we know exist in all matters relating to Government accounting.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Yes.

Mr. LEHLBACH. The General Accounting Office would have them itemize the shines and the shaves which they paid for.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Certainly. Let me add this word: If these gentlemen were officials of the Government, accustomed to the requirements and methods of the General Accounting Office, I would be in favor of striking out this provision, but as it is we are calling men from civil life to serve for a specific purpose and we ought not to subject them to such restrictions and limitations, especially when they are serving wtihout compensation whatever.

Mr. BUTLER. Why should we be suspicious of these gentlemen? They will do what is right, and we should not cast suspicion upon the whole thing in this way.

Mr. BLANTON. Then why not abolish the office of Comptroller General?

Mr. BUTLER. Oh, no; I can not stand with the gentleman from Texas on this proposition, although I am usually with him.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were—ayes 28, noes 195.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. The commission shall, as soon as practicable, submit a full report to the President, who shall transmit the same to Congress, giving the results of its investigation and its recommendations. All records of the commission, upon the completion of its duties, shall be deposited with the Secretary of the Navy.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 3, line 20, insert the words "but not later than May 15, 1928."

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from New York state why they have put the date so late as this? I can not understand why the commission could not investigate this matter and report by the 15th or 20th of March.

Mr. SNELL. We considered that very carefully, I will say to the gentleman from Wisconsin. As I tried to explain when I had the floor on the resolution, there are several factors that enter into a report such as we eventually want, and after consideration we finally decided we wanted to have at least some kind of report by that time. We were hopeful we would be able to get a full report, but possibly we may not. There is nothing definitely meant by this date, only an invitation to hurry up as much as possible.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The Republican National Convention is to be held in June and Congress will be very anxious indeed to have its work out of the way, in order to accommodate the Members who wish to attend it. Not only that, but in the latter part of May there will be the usual piling up of business and rush to get bills through the House and the Senate. It will be impossible to bring this matter up under such circumstances, and this may delay action by Congress on the report until December next, or perhaps some time during the following year.

Mr. SNELL. I will give the gentleman the assurance that if there is a report to the House here that needs consideration it will receive consideration at an early date after its delivery to the House. The gentleman need not worry about that.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman from Wisconsin yield?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I yield, if I have the floor.

Mr. BLANTON. I will tell the gentleman one reason for that. We will have to give them a reasonable time in which to expend the $20,000.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 3, line 20, strike out the word "full."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 3, line 21, after the word "same," insert the words "and all other reports of said commission."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MOORE of Virginia: Page 3, line 25, after the word "Navy," omit the period, insert a comma, and add the following: "The same to constitute a part of the public records of the department."

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, at first glance this may seem to be an inconsequential suggestion, but it was developed in the recent trial of Fall and Doheny in this District that in the Navy Department there are public records on the one hand and private or confidential records on the other hand.

It is very true that the resolution has already provided for public hearings, but everybody who has participated in the trial of cases lasting a long time, and when there is a great deal of elaboration, understands that not only do witnesses testify but that documents are filed which are not actually read. The simple purpose of the amendment is to insure that everything that goes into the investigation of every kind shall be open to public inspection; that it shall be under the rule, so to speak, of pitiless publicity.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman does not intend to be as broad as the statement he just made—everything that goes in of every character? Suppose in the course of this investigation there are new designs or new appliances submitted which, from their very military nature, should not be made public; surely the gentleman would not want to make his recommendation as broad as his language suggests.

Mr. SNELL. I do not see any objection to the gentleman's amendment, except the point raised by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA]. There might be devices and appliances which they want to keep secret.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. It seems to me that in a great matter of this sort we can waive that point. Some of the people of the country have been stirred to the very depths of their hearts by the recent tragedy and all people are vitally interested in what has occurred and what may develop. I for one am willing to take the chance suggested by the gentleman from New York rather than incur the possibility that after awhile when there is a call made for documents that may have been presented in the course of the investigation it will be met by the assertion that they are of a private character and ought not to be produced.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. It has been suggested that other nations have appliances and safety devices as to which information which may come to this commission confidentially that ought not to be made public.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Well, to repeat, I am not going to reckon with that possibility. So far as I am concerned I am willing to open the door to the fullest extent and take the risk of anything of that sort rather than for anyone to have ground for assuming that there has been any concealment.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. If the gentleman puts this in the bill, he runs the risk of not getting the information.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I have often heard predictions made of that kind which have not been verified. We ought not to take counsel of our fears in that respect in my humble opinion.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Certainly.

Mr. RAMSEYER. There is an amendment that has gone in already that the hearings shall be public.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I referred to that, but notwithstanding that, every lawyer knows that documents are nearly always presented in the trial of an important case which are not read at the hearing; they are filed, and in this instance might be considered private and confidential and not open to the public.

Mr. RAMSEYER. The only objection I have to the gentleman's amendment is that they might get information that ought not to be made public.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I yield.

Mr. LEHLBACH. Every word of testimony given at a public hearing, every exhibit that is filed and made a part of the record will be incorporated in the report, transmitted by the President to the House, and will be available to every man, woman, and child as a public document.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I will say to my friend that the resolution simply directs that a report shall be made. It does not direct that anything shall be embodied in the report of the character indicated by the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. SNELL. The hearings are absolutely open to the public.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I understand that perfectly.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. GRIFFIN. If the gentleman will bear with me a moment, I want to say that there is absolutely no reason for any secrecy as to safety devices, because they are thrown open by all countries. Furthermore, if private individuals are interested in safety devices they will be patented, and the patents are open to the world. There is no reason for secrecy in regard to matters of that kind.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I would like further to say this: If this matter were left to me I would prefer to create a congressional commission to conduct this investigation. During my time here the most wholesome and productive investigations we have had have been carried on in that way. Should it be replied that the benefit should be had of the service of experts either belonging to the Navy or outside of the Navy, I answer that the experts could be called by the congressional committee. Mention has been made of Admiral Jones. Admiral Jones and Admiral Taylor are, I suppose, our greatest naval experts, and of course they were both born in Virginia. [Laughter.]

Mr. BUTLER. They are strong men; very strong.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. One of them was born in my district and the other just over its line.

Mr. BUTLER. Good! That gives them further standing with all of us.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. And, although I have the greatest respect, as I have often indicated, for the opinion of the President, who recommended this resolution, nevertheless, if I were handling the matter, I would very much prefer that the investigation be conducted by a joint committee composed of Members of the House and Senate, in their own way determining what has occurred and what ought to be done, because the responsibility is really upon us to ascertain the facts and reach conclusions. [Applause.]

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I have no desire to embody anything in this resolution that will in any way curtail publicity; but in my opinion the very amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE] will curtail rather than promote publicity in regard to this entire investigation. One thing that I would oppose this amendment for is because there may be drawings and devices or suggestions which the department may not want to make public. If it is provided by the resolution that it is necessary to make them public, then we will not get those drawings and devices at this time, and a great part of the real object of the resolution will be lost. It is simply a matter of policy, and I am quite sure the policy advocated by my friend from Virginia is wrong. For this reason this amendment should not be adopted at this time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were—ayes 60, noes 195.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. The commission hereby created shall be dissolved upon the submission of its final report to the President.

Mr. BLACK of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLACK of Texas: Page 4, line 3, at the end of line 3 strike out the period, insert a colon, and add the following language: "Provided, That such final report shall not be later than the first day of the second regular session of the Seventieth Congress."

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to that; I hope the report will be in long before that time.

Mr. LOWREY. Mr. Speaker, I am wondering if conditions might not arise which would make it wise to put that limit a few days after the opening of the Congress instead of upon the opening day.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDWARDS. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. EDWARDS: Page 4, after line 3, add a new section to be known as section 8, as follows:

"That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized and requested to at once begin negotiations looking to agreements and treaties with the other nations that will outlaw the use of submarines in warfare, and otherwise, so that they will be discontinued and no longer constructed or used."

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order against that amendment.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Georgia desire to be heard upon the point of order?

Mr. EDWARDS. No.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. GREEN of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GREEN of Florida: Page 4, after the amendment adopted at the end of line 3, insert: "The commission may recommend to the Congress an appropriation for the relief of the families of the crew of the S–4."

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order against the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution and amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Before putting the question the Chair desires to correct a statement he made this morning in answer to a parliamentary inquiry by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK]. At the time the Chair had not had much opportunity to consider the question. In response to the question of the gentleman from Texas as to what would constitute a quorum of the House when the House was considering a bill in the House as in Committee of the Whole, the Chair said:

The Chair thinks a quorum would be 100, as is the case in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

After some consideration and examination of the precedents, the Chair thinks that he was in error. The Chair quotes from the decision by Mr. Speaker Cannon, rendered February 28, 1905, to be found in Hinds' Precedents, section 4925, volume 4. The question arose as to whether a motion to order the previous question was in order in the House while sitting as in Committee of the Whole. Mr. Speaker Cannon said:

The Chair is informed that under prior rulings, under similar orders, when a bill is in the House as in Committee of the Whole the consideration of it proceeds under the five-minute rule, but that the House does not lose its control by a majority over the bill, and that it is in the power of the House to order the previous question upon the bill and amendments pending, if there be any.

When a bill is being considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole, the Chair is of opinion that the only difference between that consideration and the consideration of the bill in the House is that the former consideration proceeds under the five-minute rule and there is no general debate. The Chair thinks that all of the rules of the House, except those two, govern bills that are considered as this resolution is being considered. Under these circumstances a quorum of the House, considering a bill or resolution as in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, would not be 100 but would be 218.

Mr. DENISON. Mr. Speaker, at the same time I proposed a question to the Speaker, and the Speaker seemingly agreed with the view that I then held, that a record vote could not be had. I find that a record vote—that is, the yeas and nays—can be taken on any amendment offered when the House is considering a bill in the House as in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it important that there should be a definite understanding of the situation, and that the only difference between considering a bill as this resolution has been considered and considering a bill in the House, is that in the former instance we proceed under the five-minute rule and that there is no general debate.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. May I suggest that I think there are precedents—at least one precedent—to the effect that a motion to close debate on an amendment is in order? Otherwise there would be no way of closing debate on amendments when the House is considering a bill in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. But the previous question would operate then.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The previous question, as I understand, can only be made as to the entire bill; I think so.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not. The Chair thinks the previous question operates precisely as it does in the House.

Mr. TILSON. What the gentleman has in mind, I think, is that you can not move the previous question on the paragraphs of the bill, because there is no vote on the paragraphs, just as there is none in Committee of the Whole. The previous question can only be made when there is something pending, as an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the resolution.

The resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. SNELL, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the joint resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

SALVAGING THE GERMAN SUBMARINE "U–3"

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including certain extracts from the Scientific American.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by including certain extracts from the Scientific American. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, under leave granted me on January 7, 1928, I file herewith a statement concerning the salvaging of the German submarine boat U–3 for reference and for the information of the Members, and reproduce an account published in the Scientific American Supplement No. 1844 on May 6, 1911.

There has been considerable discussion concerning the German U–3 in connection with the unfortunate sinking of our submarine S–4. Not only on the floor of the House, but in the press throughout the country, comparisons have been made of the equipment and methods employed in the salvaging of these two submarines. The comparisons have created the impression that the method and time of rescue work and the salvaging in the case of the German U–3 could have been employed in the case of the S–4 or the ill-fated S–51. As a matter of fact, the two cases are in no way parallel. Conditions under which the U–3 sank, the depth of water, and all the factors are so different from those surrounding the S–4 that comparisons in the two cases are not only valueless but manifestly unfair.

The S–4 collided with a cutter running at a high rate of speed, resulting in such a terrific impact that it sank instantly.

The U–3 was not under way, but while preparing for a stationary submersion one of her ventilating valves was partially left open, permitting the inrush of water and causing her to sink gradually and in the presence of several warships and heavy traffic not far from the Kiel Canal, all of whom noticed her "irregular movements" before and while sinking.

The S–4 sank in 102 feet of water.

The U–3 sank in 40 feet of water.

The S–4 sank several steaming-hours distant from submarine base.

The U–3 sank in the harbor of its own submarine base with all equipment conveniently available.

The S–4 weighs over 800 tons, and flooded with water would weigh over a thousand tons.

The U–3 weighed about 400 tons.

The S–4 immediately was embedded in mud in 102 feet of water.

The U–3's bow projected from the water for several hours, during which time the 27 men were rescued.

The S–4's compartments were flooded by water entering the tear in her hull.

The hull of the U–3 was in no way impaired and completely intact, thus making it easier to give her buoyancy.

The first cable reports received in this country concerning the U–3 made it appear that the U–3 was quickly hoisted from the bottom of the ocean. By reading the early reports it would appear that the hull was lifted and the men then rescued. As a matter of fact, the bow of the submarine was projecting from the water for a long time; and when she sank entirely, while her stern was at the bottom, it continued to retain an angular position and her periscope could always be seen slightly below the surface.

In passing it is proper to state that eventually the salvage ship Vulcan did not prove to be as satisfactory or successful as was anticipated when she was first constructed. In fact, the Vulcan did not have the power or the capacity to lift the S–4 had she or a similar ship of equal tonnage and power been right on the spot at the time of the collision and sinking. The Vulcan and the Ajax were similar ships. One or both were taken by England at the close of the World War and, as far as can be ascertained, have been dismantled and no ship of the same design constructed by England.

A technical and accurate description of the salvage of the U–3 appears in the Scientific American Supplement, No. 1844, of May 6, 1911. I submit this authoritative account for the information of the House, and particularly urge my colleagues who have used the U–3 as the basis for their belief that similar methods were not employed in the case of the S–4.

Unfortunately, the rules of the printing of the RECORD does not permit the reproduction of diagrams which accompany the article in the Scientific American Supplement, therefore references to the diagrams have been omitted from the article.

SALVAGING THE GERMAN SUBMARINE BOAT "U–3"—AN AUTHORITATIVE ACCOUNT

On January 17, 1911, the German submarine boat U–3 was sunk in the harbor of Kiel by the imperfect closure of the afterventilation pipe. The depth of water was about 40 feet, and the stern of the vessel penetrated several yards in the soft clay bottom. As the boat sank, her irregular movements were observed by the submarine U–1, which hastened to the spot, launched a folding boat to pick up the telephone buoy of the U–3, and then notified a warship, which transmitted the news to the Kiel dockyard so promptly that two steamers and a crane were dispatched 28 minutes after the vessel sank. Meanwhile the imprisoned men had informed the folding boat by telephone that the afterpart of the U–3 was full of water. Communication then ceased.

The disaster was observed also by the lookout stationed on the Kaiser Wilhelm Canal and by the canal pilot steamer, which soon arrived on the scene and endeavored, with the aid of a tug, to tow to shore the foundered submarine, the bow of which had risen to the surface. The attempt failed, as the stern of the submarine was held down by some 100 tons of water. The crane arrived about an hour after the disaster, and with the aid of divers attached to the canal service preparations to raise the sunken boat were commenced.

It appears probable that the extent of the leakage was not at first fully appreciated by the crew of the U–3, as the partly opened valve was invisible and inaccessible, and the mouth of the ventilation pipe, through which the water entered the hull, was covered and concealed by the motor. Hence the inrush of water could only be heard, and the water was not seen until it had reached the floor of the engine room. It was then too late to take effective measures. The boat sank stern foremost, and its position aggravated the evil by increasing the hydrostatic pressure at the leak and in other ways.

The tanks, which had been so nearly filled in preparation for diving that only 1 ton of buoyancy remained before the accident, were emptied by pumping and by compressed air. Meanwhile the compartment bulkheads were closed, the emergency weights dropped, and the telephone and lifting buoys set afloat. An attempt was then made to pump out the engine-room bilge, but the pump would not "draw," owing to the position of the vessel. The water soon shortcircuited some of the accumulators, producing results far more serious than the stoppage of the useless pump. The sudden discharge so heated the forward cells, which were not yet submerged, that several plates became red hot and some of the hard-rubber parts took fire. The heated cells evolved suffocating sulphurous and acid fumes, which caused the commander to order a retreat to the forward or torpedo compartment. The commander, with two other officers, remained in the middle compartment and turret and continued the work of emptying the forward tank by means of compressed air until the bow of the boat rose 20 inches above the surface of the water. The 28 men imprisoned in the torpedo compartment owe their lives to this wise and heroic action of Lieutenant Commander Fischer and to the stanchness of the collision bulkhead which separated them from the turret compartment.

At 11.30 a. m., 65 minutes after the accident occurred, an inspector of the torpedo service arrived on the scene and found the sunken vessel in the position described above, with the prow and the periscope emerging slightly from the water and the stern embedded in the clay bottom. Assuming that the crew had taken refuge in the forward compartment, he attempted their rescue by the method illustrated. The floating crane was anchored close to the weather side of the U–3 and made fast by a chain passed around the submarine with the aid of divers. Meanwhile other divers were working to attach the main tackle of the crane to the forward lifting hook of the U–3. The task was not accomplished until nearly 3 p. m. Soon after that hour the bow of the submarine was slowly raised by hauling on the main tackle and occasionally tightening the chain stirrup until the forehatch was just awash. The operation was then stopped in order to communicate with the imprisoned men by tapping, according to the Morse code, on the exposed part of the hull. The first attempts were frustrated by irregular knocking from the inside. It was afterwards learned that the imprisoned men were fastening the bulkhead doors, which opened inward (forward), and consequently did not entirely exclude the poisonous gases which were forced upward from the central compartment by the pressure of the water. After this work had been finished, communication in Morse signals was established, and the imprisoned men reported "All is well." When they learned that the bow was out of water they announced their intention of opening the torpedo-launching tubes. Boats provided with sounding lines were then stationed beneath the mouths of the torpedo tubes and the bow of the U–3 was lowered until these mouths nearly touched the water. Meanwhile the imprisoned men, working by the light of a single pocket lantern, had succeeded in opening the starboard torpedo tube. At 4.30 p. m. the first man was drawn out by means of the sounding line. The work of rescue proceeded smoothly until an increased influx of poisonous gases caused the man who was being drawn out to let go the line and fall back unconscious. A call was then made for volunteers to go down and attach the imprisoned men to the line. In this way several men were rescued by a boatswain's mate, who was finally drawn out unconscious. Two officers, carrying an electric lamp connected with a cable and a compressed-air tube from the D–5, which was moored beside the crane, then went down and rescued the remaining men, most of whom were unconscious. The work of rescue was completed at 5.20 p. m. The starboard torpedo tube was necessarily left open.

Nearly one-third of the men rescued from the forward compartment were unconscious. They were taken to the lower deck of the crane float and revived by oxygen inhalations and other treatment. In less than two hours they were in condition to be removed to a hospital, where most of them fully recovered in a few days.

During the work of rescue preparations were made to raise the stern of the U–3 in order to rescue the captain and the other two officers who were imprisoned in the turret. For this purpose a stout cable was attached by divers to the after lifting hook of the sunken boat. At the same time efforts were made to put into service the emergency ventilating apparatus, but the attempt failed because, as we learned afterwards, the valves in the middle compartment were closed.

Meanwhile, imperfect communication with the imprisoned officers had been established by means of a board on which questions were written and which was held in front of the periscope. The prisoners answered "Yes" and "No" by turning the periscope to left and right. This conversation continued from 2 to 5 p. m.

The hawser which had been fastened to the after part of the U–3 was attached to a second and more powerful crane. At 5.30 p. m., 10 minutes after the last man had left the torpedo tube, this second crane began hauling with great caution, pausing at intervals to give the stern of the U–3 time to work out of the soft clay in which it was imbedded while the forward crane exerted a steady pull of about 100 tons. When the stern of the U–3 had thus been raised about 4 feet, the hawser parted and the boat sank back. The divers then substituted two new hawsers for the broken one, and the work of raising the vessel was resumed at 6.30 p. m. but the operation was soon stopped and the fate of the imprisoned officers sealed by the breaking of a post of the after crane.

These two failures proved that the U–3 could not be raised in this way. Nothing remained but to raise the sunken boat by means of the salvage ship Vulcan, a sure but tedious method, which practically excluded all hope of saving the lives of the three heroic officers.

The Vulcan was used, in connection with the submarines U–3 and U–1, as a school of submarine navigation, the pupils and the crews of the submarines being quartered on the "mother" ship. There was good reason for her previous inaction and her absence at the moment of the disaster which need not be explained here.

On the morning when the accident occurred the Vulcan was in dock at Kiel, and for this reason the submarines were practicing in Kiel Harbor, one always remaining afloat when the other dived. The Vulcan arrived on the scene at 1.30 p. m., but remained idle because it would have taken her at least six hours to raise the U–3, which, even in its lowest position, was too high to allow the Vulcan to employ her usual and most expeditious method of anchoring, at bow and stern, to windward of the sunken vessel and drifting over it.

After the crane broke the best method of employing the Vulcan was discussed, and every detail was decided, while the divers detached the hawsers and the sling from the U–3. The disabled crane was removed and the other crane was drawn back about 40 yards. The scene was brightly illuminated by the searchlights of two vessels. The U–3 now lay entirely under water, though the top of the periscope could be seen just beneath the surface. The position of the periscope and the bow were marked by small boats.

The difficult work of the divers was not completed until 8.55 p. m. Then the Vulcan was brought alongside the remaining crane and attached by bow and stern lines. With the aid of these lines the Vulcan was swung around through a right angle, so that she lay parallel to the U–3, and was held in this position by the starboard stern anchor, which had been dropped midway.

The moorings of the Vulcan and the crane were then cautiously relaxed and the two vessels, retaining their relative positions, were allowed to drift toward the U–3, until the bow of the double-hulled Vulcan was directly over the stern of the sunken vessel and immediately behind the periscope. Now came the delicate task of moving the Vulcan forward with one of its twin hulls on each side of the U–3, without breaking the periscope and thus flooding the turret and central compartment. This maneuver, the difficulty of which was increased by a strong side wind, was successfully accomplished with the aid of the port stern anchor and several small steamers which served as bow anchors and tugs.

The Vulcan was thus brought into the position with her hoisting tackle directly over the lifting hooks of the U–3. The tackle was attached by divers—a task which occupied two hours—and the work of hoisting began at 4 a. m. The turret appeared above water at 4.35, and was opened 10 minutes later. The abnormal pressure in the confined space caused an outrush of foul air, which smelled strongly of chlorine. The turret was ventilated with compressed air, a lamp attached to an electric cable was lowered, and two officers entered. They found their three ill-fated comrades dead at their posts in peaceful attitudes, which appeared to exclude all possibility of a death struggle. Although they had evidently been dead for hours, two hours were employed in fruitless attempts at resuscitation.

After the bodies had been removed, the turret was closed and the U–3 was securely fastened to the Vulcan, brought into the inner harbor, and docked without difficulty. (Scientific American Supplement 1844, May 6, 1911, an article condensed from the Marine Rundschau.)
